

लाल बहादुर शास्त्री राष्ट्रीय प्रशासन अकादमी

L.B.S National Academy of Administration

मसूरी

MUSSOORIE

पुस्तकालय

LIBRARY

अवाप्ति संख्या

Accession No.

JD 1372

वर्ग संख्या

Class No.

328.415

पुस्तक संख्या

Book No.

In

v.4

DÁIL EIREANN

DÍOSBÓIREACHTAÍ PÁIRLIMINTE

(PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES)

TUAIRISG OIFIGIÚIL

(OFFICIAL REPORT)

IMLEABHAR IV.

(VOLUME IV.)

I gcóir na tréimhse ón 3adh Iúl, 1923, go 9adh Lughnasa, 1923, sa tSiosón, 6adh Mí na Nodlag, 1922—9adh Lughnasa, 1923.

(Comprising period from 3rd July, 1923, to 9th August, 1923, in Session 6th December, 1922—9th August, 1923.)

BAILE ATHA CLIÁTH
(DUBLIN)

ALEX. THOM & CO., LTD., CLÓDÓIRÍ,

A CLÓ-BHUAILEANN AGUS OIFIG AN tSOLATHÁIR A FHOILLSIGHEANN.

Printed by Alex. Thom & Co., Ltd., and Published by the Stationery Office.

PRICE 20/-

DÁIL EIREANN.

LUCHT AN RIALTAIS

(Members of Government).

(MI NA NODLAG, 1922.)

LUCHT NA hARD-CHOMHAIRLE :—

(Members of the Executive Council) :—

Uachtarán agus Aire Airgid—LIAM T. MAC COSGAIR, T.D.

(President and Minister for Finance—W. T. COSGRAVE, T.D.)

Leas-Uachtarán agus Aire um Ghnóthaí Dúithche—CAOIMHGHÍN Ó HUIGÍN, T.D.

(Vice-President and Minister for Home Affairs—KEVIN O'HIGGINS, T.D.)

Aire um Thiúscal agus Tráchtáil—SEOSAMH MAG CRAITH, T.D.

(Minister for Industry and Commerce—JOSEPH McGRATH, T.D.)

Aire Oideachais—EOIN MAC NÉILL, OLLAMH, T.D.

(Minister for Education—EOIN MACNEILL, D.LITT., T.D.)

Aire um Rialtas Áitiúil—EARNÁN DE BLAGHD, T.D.

(Minister for Local Government—ERNEST BLYTHE, T.D.)

Aire um Ghnóthaí Coigeríche—DEASMHUMHAIN MAC GEARAILT, T.D.

(Minister for External Affairs—DESMOND FITZGERALD, T.D.)

Aire Cosanta—RISTEARD Ó MAOLCHATHA, T.D.

(Minister for Defence—GENERAL RICHARD MULCAHY, T.D.)

AIRÍ NÁCH BAILL DEN ÁRD-CHOMHAIRLE :—

(Ministers who are not Members of the Executive Council) :—

Aire Talmhuíochta—PÁDRAIG Ó HÓGÁIN, T.D.

(Minister for Agriculture—PATRICK HOGAN, T.D.)

Aire an Phuist—SEUMAS S. BREATHNACH, T.D.

(Postmaster-General—JAMES J. WALSH, T.D.)

Aire um Iasgach—FIONÁN Ó LOINGSIGH, T.D.

(Minister for Fisheries—FINIAN LYNCH, T.D.)

Ard-Atúrnae—AODH UA CINNÉIDE, K.C.

(Attorney-General—HUGH KENNEDY, K.C.).

PRÍOMH-OIFIGIGH.

(PRINCIPAL OFFICERS.)

Ceann Comhairle—MICHEÁL Ó hAODHA, T.D. (Michael Hayes, T.D.)
(Speaker).

Leas-Cheann Comhairle—PÁDRAIC Ó MÁILLE, T.D.
(Deputy-Speaker).

Cléireach na Dála—COLM Ó MURCHADHA.
(Clerk of the Dáil).

Fo-Chléireach—GEARÓID MAG CANAINN.
(Assistant-Clerk).

Captaen an Ghárda—TOMÁS Ó BROIN.
(Captain of the Guard).

DÁIL EIREANN.

AINMNEACA TEACHTAI

Do toghadh i Mí an Mheithimh, 1922 ; agus a nDáil-Cheanntair.
(List of Deputies elected in June, 1922 ; and Constituencies).

(a) Teachtaí nár thóg a suidheacháin.—(Deputies who did not take their seats.)

(b) Teachtaí do cailleadh.—(Deceased Deputies.)

(c) Teachtaí do thug suas.—(Deputies who resigned.)

Altún, Earnán Ollsgoil Bhaile Atha Cliath. (Alton, E. ; Dublin University).
(a) Bartún, Riobárd Contae Chill Dara agus Chill Mantáin. (Barton, R. ; Kildare and Wicklow).
Béaslai, Piaras Ciarraidhe agus Luimneach Thiar. (Beaslai, P. ; Kerry and W. Limerick).
Blaghd, Earnán de Contae Mhuineacháin. (Blythe, E. ; Monaghan).
Breathnach, Séamus Buirg Chorcaighe. (Walsh, J. J. ; Cork City).
(b) Brughá, Cathal Tiobrad Arann Thoir, Portláirge agus Buirg Phortláirge. (Brughá, C. ; Tipp. E., Waterford Co. and City).
Buitléir, Seán Tiobrad Arann Thoir, Portláirge agus Buirg Phortláirge. (Butler, J. ; Tipp. E., Waterford Co. and City).
Bulfin, Próinsias Laoighis agus Ó bhFáilghe. (Bulfin, F. ; Leix and Offaly).
Burca, Séamus de Tiobrad Arann Thuaidh, Meadh agus Theas. (Burke, J. ; N., Mid. and S. Tipperary).
(a) Ceannt, Dáithí Corcaigh Thoir agus Thoir-Thuaidh. (Kent, D. ; Cork E. and N.E.).
(a) Cíosóg, Brian de Contae na Gaillimhe. (Cusack, B. ; Galway).
(a) Colivet, Micheál Luimneach Thoir agus Buirg Luimnighe. (Collivet, M. ; Limerick City and E. Limerick).
Craig, Sir Séamus, Ridire, M.D.	Ollsgoil Bhaile Atha Cliath. (Craig, Sir J., M.D. ; Dublin University).
Duram, Micheál de Contae Bhaile Atha Cliath. (Derham, M. ; Co. Dublin).
Éabhróid, Séamus Contae Chill Dara agus Chill Mantáin. (Everett, J. ; Kildare and Wicklow).
Faoite, Uinseann de Tiobrad Arann Thoir, Portláirge agus Buirg Phortláirge. (White, V. ; Tipp. E., Waterford Co. and City).
Fíges, Darghal Contae Bhaile Atha Cliath. (Figgis, D. ; Co. Dublin).
Mac a' Bháird, Peadar Contae Dhún na nGall. (Ward, P. J. ; Donegal).
Mac Artáin, Pádraig Laoighis agus Ó bhFáilghe. (McCartan, P. ; Leix and Offaly).
Mac Artúir, Tomás Liathdruim agus Roscomáin Thuaidh. (Carter, T. Leitrim and N. Roscommon).
Mac Cába, Alasdair Muigheó Thoir agus Sligeach. (McCabe, A. ; Mayo E., and Sligo).

- Mac Cárthaigh, Domhnall Cathair Bhaile Atha Cliath Theas. (McCarthy, D. ; S. Dublin City).
- (a) Mac Cárthaigh, Próinsias ... Muigheo Thoir agus Sligeach. (Carty, F. ; Mayo E. and Sligo).
- (a) Mac Cearbhaill, Pádraig ... Contae Mhuineacháin. (McCarville, P. ; Monaghan)
- Mac Cosgair, Liam T. ... Contae Cheatharlach agus Chill-Choinnigh. (Cosgrave, W. T. ; Carlow and Kilkenny).
- Mac Cosgair, Pilib ... Baile Atha Cliath Thiar-Thuaidh. (Cosgrave, P. ; N.W. Dublin).
- Mac Cumhaill, Uáitéar ... Contae Chabháin. (Cole, W. L. ; Cavan).
- (b) Mac Donnchadha, Seosamh Tiobrad Arann Thuaidh, Meadh agus Theas. (McDonagh, J. ; N., Mid. and S. Tipperary).
- Mac Eochadha, Maolmhuire Cathair Bhaile Atha Cliath Theas. (Keogh, M. ; S. Dublin City).
- Mac Eoin, Seán ... Contae Longphuirt agus na hIar-Mhidhe. (McKeon, Sean ; Longford and Westmeath).
- Mac Eoin, Tomás ... Contae Bhaile Atha Cliath. (Johnson, T. ; Co. Dublin).
- Mac Fheórais, Risteárd ... Contae Loch Garman. (Corish, R. ; Wexford).
- (a) Mac Gamhna, Pádraig ... Contae Cheatharlach agus Chill Choinnigh. (Gaffney, P. ; Carlow and Kilkenny).
- Mac Garaidh, Seán ... Baile Atha Cliath Meadh. (McGarry, Sean ; Mid. Dublin).
- Mac Gearailt, Deasmhúhain Contae Bhaile Atha Cliath. (FitzGerald, D. ; Co. Dublin).
- Mac Giobúin, Gearóid ... Ollscoil Bhaile Atha Cliath. (FitzGibbon, G. ; Dublin University).
- Mac Giolla Bhrighde, Seosamh Muigheo Thuaidh agus Thiar (MacBride, J. ; N. and W. Mayo).
- (b) Mac Haol, Seán ... Corcaigh Thuaidh, Meadh, Thiar, Theas agus Thoir-Theas. (Hales, Sean ; Cork N., Mid., W., S. and S.E.).
- Mac Liam, Risteárd ... Contae Chill Dara agus Chill Mantáin. (Wilson, R. ; Kildare and Wicklow).
- Mac Néill, Eoin ... Ollscoil Náisiúnta. (MacNeill, Eoin ; National University).
- Mac Niocail, Seoirse ... Contae na Gaillimhe. (Nicholls, G. ; Galway).
- Mac Sioghaird, Liam ... Muigheo Theas agus Roscomáin Theas. (Sears, W. ; S. Mayo and S. Roscommon).
- Mac Suibhne, Seosamh ... Contae Dhún na nGall. (McSweeney, J. ; Donegal).
- Mag Aonghusa, Liam ... Ollscoil Náisiúnta. (Magennis, W. ; National University).
- Mag Aonghusa, Próinsias ... Contae Longphuirt agus na hIar-Mhidhe. (McGuinness, F. ; Longford and Westmeath).
- Mag Craith, Seosamh ... Baile Atha Cliath Thiar-Thuaidh. (McGrath, J. ; N.W. Dublin).
- (b) Mag Fhionnghail, Labhrás ... Contae Longphuirt agus na hIar-Mhidhe. (Ginnell, L. ; Longford and Westmeath).
- Mag Fhionnlaoich, Seosamh Contae Dhún na nGall. (McGinley, J. ; Donegal).
- Mag Ualghairg, Pádraig ... Contae Dhún na nGall. (McGoldrick, P. ; Donegal).
- (a) Mag Uidhir, Tomás ... Muigheo Theas agus Roscomáin Theas. (Maguire, T. ; S. Mayo and S. Roscommon).

Nógla, Tomás de ...	Corcaigh Thuaidh, Meadh, Thiar, Theas agus Thoir-Theas. (Nagle, T. ; Cork, N., Mid., W., S. and S.E.).
(b) Ó Beoláin, Énrí ...	Muigheo Theas agus Roscomáin Theas. (Boland. H. ; S. Mayo and S. Roscommon).
(c) Ó Braonáin, Pádraig	Contae an Chláir. (Brennan, P. ; Clare).
Ó Briain, Liam ...	Cathair Bhaile Atha Cliath Theas. (O'Brion, W. ; S. Dublin City).
Ó Broin, Ailfrid ...	Baile Atha Cliath Meadh. (Byrne, A. ; Mid. Dublin).
Ó Broin, Criostóir	Contaetha Chill Dara agus Chill Mantáin. (Byrne, C. M. ; Kildare and Wicklow).
Ó Broin, Domhnall	Tiobrad Arann Thoir, Portláirge agus Buirg Phortláirge. (O'Byrne, D. ; Tipp. E., Waterford Co. and City).
(b) Ó Brolacháin, Mícheál	Corcaigh Thuaidh, Meadh, Thiar, Theas agus Thoir-Theas. (Bradley, M. ; Cork N., Mid., W., S. and S.E.).
(a) Ó Cathail, Pádraig	Giarraidhe agus Luimneach Thiar (Cahill, P. J. ; Kerry and W. Limerick).
Ó Ceallacháin, Domhnall	Contae Loch Garman. (O'Callaghan, D. ; Wexford).
(a) Ó Ceallaigh, Seán	Contaetha Lughmhaighe agus na Midhe. (O'Kelly, J. J. ; Louth and Meath).
(a) Ó Ceallaigh, Seán T.	Baile Atha Cliath Meadh. (O'Kelly, Sean T. ; Mid. Dublin).
(a) Ó Ceallaigh, Tomás	Cathair Bhaile Atha Cliath Theas. (Kelly, T. ; S. Dublin City).
(a) Ó Coileáin, Conchubhar	Giarraidhe agus Luimneach Thiar. (Collins, C. ; Kerry and W. Limerick).
(b) Ó Coileáin, Mícheál	Corcaigh Thuaidh, Meadh, Thiar, Theas agus Thoir-Theas. (Collins, M. ; Cork N., Mid., W., S. and S.E.).
Ó Conaill, Tomás	Contae na Gaillimhe. (O'Connell, T. J. ; Galway).
(a) Ó Corcora, Domhnall	Corcaigh Thuaidh, Meadh, Thiar, Theas agus Thoir-Theas. (Corkery, D. ; Cork, N., Mid., W., S. and S.E.).
Ó Cruadhlaoidh, Séamus	Giarraidhe agus Luimneach Thiar. (Crowley, J. ; Kerry and W. Limerick).
(a) Ó Cruadhlaoidh, Seán	Muigheo Thuaidhe agus Thiar. (Crowley, J. ; N. and W. Mayo).
Ó Cúlacháin, Aodh	Contaetha Chill Dara agus Chill Mantáin. (Colohan, H. ; Kildare and Wicklow).
Ó Daimhín, Liam	Laoighis agus Ó bhFáilge. (Davin, W. ; Leix and Offaly).
(b) Ó Daimhín, Séamus	Muigheo Thoir agus Sligeach. (Devins, J. ; Mayo E., and Sligo).
(a) Ó Dochartaigh, Seosamh	Contae Dhún na nGall. (O'Doherty, J. ; Donegal).
Ó Deaghaidh, Riobárd	Buirg Chorcaighe. (Day, R. ; Cork City).
(a) Ó Deirg, Tomás ...	Muigheo Thuaidh agus Thiar. (Derrig, T. ; N. and W. Mayo).
Ó Dóláin, Séamus	Liathdruim agus Roscomáin Thuaidh. (Dolan, J. N. ; Leitrim and N. Roscommon).
Ó Domhnaill, Tomás	Muigheo Thoir agus Sligeach. (O'Donnell, T. ; Mayo E. and Sligo).

- (a) Ó Donnchú, Tomás ... Ciarraidhe agus Luimneach Thiar. (O'Donoghue, T. ; Kerry and W. Limerick).
- (c) Ó Dubhthaigh, Eoin ... Contae Mhuineacháin. (O'Duffy, Eoin ; Monaghan).
- Ó Dubhghaill, Micheál ... Contae Loch Garman. (Doyle, M., Wexford).
- (a) Ó Dubhghaill, Séamus ... Contae Loch Garman. (Doyle, J. ; Wexford).
- Ó Dúgáin, Eamon ... Contae the Lughmhaighe agus na Midhe. (Duggan, E. ; Louth and Meath).
- Ó Duinnín, Scán ... Corcaigh Thoir agus Thoir-Thuaidh. (Dinneen, J. ; Cork E., and N.E.).
- Ó Faoileacháin, Seosamh ... Contae na Gaillimhe. (Whelohan, J. ; Galway).
- Ó Faoláin, Nioclás ... Tiobrad Arann Thoir, Portláirge agus Buirg Phortláirge (Phelan, N. ; Tipp. E., Waterford (Co. and City)).
- (a) Ó Fathaigh, Próinsias ... Contae na Gaillimhe. (Fahy, F. ; Galway).
- (a) Ó Fearáin, Próinsias ... Muigheo Thoir agus Sligeach (Ferran, F. ; Mayo E., and Sligo)
- (a) Ó Flaithbheartaigh, Somhairle Contae Dhún na nGall. (O'Flaherty, S. ; Donegal).
- (b) Ó Griobhtha, Art ... Contae Chabháin. (Griffith, A. ; Cavan).
- Ó Guaire, Donchadh ... Contae the Cheatharloch agus Chill-Choinnigh. (Gorey, D. J. ; Carlow and Kilkenny).
- Ó hAodha, Liam ... Luimneach Thoir agus Buirg Luimnighe. (Hayes, W. ; Limerick City and E. Limerick).
- Ó hAodha, Micheál ... Ollscoil Náisiúnta. (Hayes, M. ; National University).
- Ó hAodha, Peadar ... Contae the Lughmhaighe agus na Midhe. (Hughes, P. ; Louth and Meath).
- Ó hAodha, Risteárd ... Luimneach Thoir agus Buirg Luimnighe. (Hayes, R. ; Limerick City and E. Limerick).
- Ó hAodha, Seán ... Corcaigh Thuaidh, Meadh, Thiar, Theas agus Thoir-Theas. (Hayes, Sean, Cork N., Mid, W., S. and S.E.).
- Ó hAonghusa, Micheál ... Corcaigh Thoir agus Thoir-Thuaidh. (Hennessy, M. J. ; Cork E. and N.E.).
- Ó hÓgáin, Pádraig ... Contae na Gaillimhe. (Hogan, P. ; Galway).
- Ó hUigín, Caoimhghin ... Laoighis agus Ó bhFáilghe. (O'Higgins, K. ; Leix and Offaly).
- (a) Ó hUiginn, Brian ... Contae an Chláir. (O'Higgins, B. ; Clare).
- Ó Laidhin, Seán ... Contae the Longphuirt agus na hIar-Mhidhe. (Lyons, J. ; Longford and Westmeath).
- Ó Láimhín, Aindriú ... Liathdruim agus Roscomáin Thuaidh. (Lavin, A. ; Leitrim and N. Roscommon).
- (c) Ó Lideadha, Seán ... Contae an Chláir. (Liddy, J. ; Clare).
- Ó Loingsigh, Fionán ... Ciarraidhe agus Luimneach Thiar. (Lynch, F. ; Kerry and W. Limerick).
- Ó Máille, Pádraic ... Contae na Gaillimhe. (O'Maille, P. ; Galway).
- (a) Ó Maoláin, Seán ... Corcaigh Thuaidh, Meadh, Thiar, Theas agus Thoir-Theas. (Moylan, Seán ; Cork N., Mid., W., S. and S.E.).

- Ó Maolchatha, Risteárd ... Baile Atha Cliath Thiar-Thuaidh. (Mulcahy, R. ; N.W. Dublin).
- (a) Ó Maoldhomhnaigh, Pádraig ... Tiobrad Arann Thuaidh, Meadh agus Theas. (Moloney, P. J. ; N., Mid., and S. Tipperary).
- Ó Maolruaidh, Seán ... Contae Chabháin. (Milroy, Sean. ; Cavan).
- Ó Mocháin, Domhnall ... Corcaigh Thuaidh, Meadh, Thiar, Theas agus Thoir-Theas. (Vaughan, D. ; Cork N., Mid., W., S. and S.E.).
- Ó Muirgheasa, Domhnall ... Tiobrad Arann Thuaidhe, Meadh agus Theas. (Morrissey, D. ; N., Mid, and S. Tipperary).
- Ó Murchadha, Séamus ... Contaethe Lughmhaighe agus na Midhe. (Murphy, J. ; Louth and Meath).
- (a) Ó Néill, Lorcán ... Baile Atha Cliath Meadh. (O'Neill, L. ; Mid. Dublin).
- (c) Ó Ruairo, Domhnall ... Muigheo Theas agus Roscomáin Theas. (O'Rourke, D. ; S. Mayo and S. Roscommon).
- Ó Ruanaidh, Seán ... Contae Bhaile Atha Cliath. (Rooney, J. ; Co. Dublin).
- Ó Seanáin, Cathal ... Contaethe Lughmhaighe agus na Midhe. (O'Shannon, C. ; Louth and Meath).
- Ó Súileabháin. Gearóid ... Contaethe Cheatharloch agus Chill-Choinnigh. (O'Sullivan, G. ; Carlow and Kilkenny).
- (a) Pluingceud, Seoirse Uasal (Cúnt) ... Liathdruim agus Roscomáin Thuaidh. (Plunkett, G. N., Count ; Leitrim and N. Roscommon).
- (a) Róiste, Eamon de ... Ciarraidhe agus Luimneach Thiar. (Roche, E. ; Kerry and W. Limerick).
- Róiste, Liam de ... Buirg Chorcaighe. (Roiste, L. de ; Cork City).
- (a) Ruithléis, Pádraig ... Muigheo Thuaidh agus Thiar. (Rutledge, P. ; N. and W. Mayo).
- (a) Shuibhne, Máire nic ... Buirg Chorcaighe (McSwiney, Miss M. ; Cork City).
- (a) Stac, Aibhistín de ... Ciarraidhe agus Luimneach Thiar. (Stack, A. ; Kerry and W. Limerick).
- Stáineas, Micheál de ... Baile Atha Cliath Thiar-Thuaidh. (Staines, M. ; N.W. Dublin).
- (a) Stockley, Liam ... Ollsgoil Náisiúnta. (Stockley, W. ; National University).
- Thrift, Liam ... Ollsgoil Bhaile Atha Cliath. (Thrift, W. ; Dublin University).
- (a) Uí Cheallacháin, Cáit, Bean ... Luimneach Thoir agus Buirg Luimnighe. (O'Callaghan, Mrs. K. ; Limerick City and E. Limerick).
- Uí Dhubhthaigh, Seoirse Ghabháin. ... Contae Bhaile Atha Cliath. (Duffy, G. G. ; Co Dublin).
- (a) Valéra, Eamon de ... Contae an Chláir. (Valera, E. de ; Clare).

DÁIL EIREANN.

DÍOSBÓIREACHTAÍ PÁIRLIMINTE (PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES).

TUAIRISG OIFIGIÚIL (OFFICIAL REPORT).

IMLEABHAR IV (Volume IV).

DÁIL EIREANN.

DE MAIRT, 3ADH IUL, 1923.

(Tuesday, 3rd July, 1923.)

Do cromadh ar obair an lae ar 3.10 p.m. Bhí an Ceann Comhairle Micheál O hAodha 'sa Chathaoir.

GEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

[ORAL ANSWERS.]

DATES OF ELECTIONS.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the President if he will state whether a definite date has been fixed for An Dáil and Municipal elections; if so, will he now give the dates.

The PRESIDENT: The answer is in the negative as regards the Dáil election, and the date for Municipal elections is at present the 12th September. Both dates depend on the date fixed for the coming into force of the Register, and the printing is not yet sufficiently advanced to admit of the latter date being fixed with certainty.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Arising out of that, would the President be able to state whether, according to the present attitude of the Executive Council, it is intended to take the Dáil elections before the local elections, or vice versa?

The PRESIDENT: I believe the general impression is that the Dáil elections will take place first.

ALLOTMENTS BILL.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Minister for Local Government whether, with reference to reply given by the Minister for Agriculture on 20th June, 1923, it is intended to introduce an Allotments Bill during the present session of An Dáil; whether such Bill would apply only to the larger urban centres, as indicated, and whether he considers it expedient that the administration of allotments should be undertaken by separate Government Departments.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. E. Blythe): It is not proposed to introduce a general Allotments Bill this session. Pending the passing of such a measure, steps have been taken to secure the interests of all existing plot-holders.

The provision of allotments must necessarily be dealt with in Acts of Parliament relating both to land and to the functions of local authorities. No administrative difficulty is likely to arise.

Mr. A. BYRNE: May I ask the Minister whether he gave any promise to the Allotment Holders' Union that a Bill would be introduced this session?

Mr. BLYTHE: It is not possible, in view of the congestion of business, and the various difficulties that have been encountered in drafting the Bill, to have anything done this session.

Mr. BYRNE: That is not an answer to my question; it is an evasion. Was there any promise made to the Allotment Holders' representatives that a Bill would be introduced?

Mr. BLYTHE: I have no recollection of meeting the representatives of the Allotment Holders.

P.O. RE-ORGANISATION.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the Postmaster-General whether the scheme of re-organisation which was submitted by the Post Office Engineering Union to the Douglas Commission, at the request of the Chairman, has been considered; if so, will he state the result.

POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): The Engineering Union case has not been dealt with by the Douglas

[Mr. J. J. Walsh.]

Commission in the first part of its report now under consideration by the Executive. I am unable to say when this particular case will be taken up by the Commission.

Mr. BYRNE: Will the Minister give an assurance that the recommendations will be considered?

Mr. WALSH: I am afraid the Minister cannot give any such assurance.

CLOSING OF SUB-POST OFFICE.

MICHEAL DE STAINEAS asked the Postmaster-General whether and when he intends re-opening the sub-office at Finglas Road.

Mr. WALSH: I have gone into this personally and exhaustively and I find that the sub-office at Finglas Road was discontinued on vacancy as the needs of the district were considered to be fully met by the existing offices in the locality. The business at that office was comparatively small and unimportant, and I do not see any sufficient justification for re-opening it, especially in view of the general desire to avoid unnecessary expenditure.

Mr. STAINES: Does the Postmaster-General consider that it is in accordance with the advice of the members of the Government and Deputies that the traders and other people during the past twelve months carried on, and he is now closing up sub-offices and pillar boxes in Dublin?

Mr. WALSH: No pillar boxes have been closed in Dublin. A certain number of these have been injured by irregular activities and put out of action for the time being. These will be rectified in due course. With regard to the closing of sub-offices, as far as I know this is the first. It may be the first of a number, but it is the first, at any rate.

WATERFORD FARM DISPUTE.

CATHAL O'SHANNON (for Liam O Briain) asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that it is alleged that on Friday, June 15th, about 100 members of the I.T.G.W. Union, concerned in the County Waterford Farm Dispute, who were waiting to receive dispute pay on the roadside at Newtown, Co. Waterford, were ordered off the road by Drill Instructor McFadden of Carroll's Cross, who was in charge of a party of military; that on the men adjourning to an adjacent school, Drill Instructor McFadden followed them, and after placing a guard on both doors of the school, addressed the men, using very offensive and threatening language, and in the course of which he is alleged to have stated he was there to uphold the rule of the rifle, and that, if necessary, he would take out some of those present into the adjacent field, and put the red badge (the badge of the I.T.G.W.U.) through their hearts with a bullet, and to ask whether the Minister will order that an inquiry will be held into these allegations.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): I am not aware of the allegations and have had no representations on the matter from any person, nor any statement of the alleged facts. I am having inquiry made with a view to ascertaining to what extent, if any, any soldier on the occasion in question exceeded his duty. The troops are acting with tact and discretion in their very difficult task in Waterford. In view of the serious nature, and the possible inflammatory tendency of such suggestions as are contained in the question, I regret the Deputy should make a question in this particular form take the place of representations to me in some other way.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Will the Minister inform Deputy O'Brien of the result of the inquiry?

General MULCAHY: Certainly.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: When will it be likely that you can so inform him?

General MULCAHY: I cannot say. In the meantime it would help very much in making inquiries into these matters, if we could have plain statements of facts.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: May I ask the Minister if the evidence at the inquiry will be purely military or military and civilian?

General MULCAHY: It is alleged that a certain non-commissioned officer and certain men were at O'Carroll's Cross at this particular time. A question is put suggesting that a certain incident took place. I am going to take, from whatever soldiers were present at the time, statements of what occurrence took place. That is the extent to which I am going to make inquiry in the present matter.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Am I to take it that the Minister will not accept civilian evidence—evidence from people present who witnessed the incident?

General MULCAHY: If the Deputy will read the question he will probably consider that I am doing what is simply the natural and proper thing to do from my point of view, when a suggestion like this is made in this particular form.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I am precluded by the Standing Orders from expressing an opinion on that statement, but I will repeat my supplementary question. Will or will not the Minister allow civilian evidence to be tendered at the inquiry?

General MULCAHY: I am not going to approach civilians in the matter. A certain allegation has been made with regard to the action of certain soldiers. They are not even allegations. I am going to make an inquiry of the Army officials who were present at the time, as to what exactly took place. If, as a result of these inquiries, any further action on my part is necessary, that action will be taken. As a preliminary step, that is the action I am going to take.

RELEASE OF INTERNEES.

AODH O CULACHAIN asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that John Ryan, Martin Simpson, and Patrick Connor, of Athy District, are interned in Carlow Prison; whether he gave orders to have these men released about three months ago, and why they are still detained; further, whether these men have signed the form of undertaking a month ago, and to ask, as no charge has been made against them, that they be immediately released.

General MULCAHY: Orders were not given for the release of these men about three months ago. As regards Simpson I would refer the Deputy to my reply to his question on the 19th June. The cases against these men have been under consideration recently and they were released on the 30th June.

STAMPING OF INSURANCE CARDS.

RISTEARD MAC FHEORAIS asked the Minister for Defence if he has received repeated complaints on behalf of Patrick Kelly (Civilian), of Keeper's Lane, Wexford, to the effect, that for the period of nine months during which he worked for the 11st Battalion of the National Army at Wexford Barracks, his Insurance Cards were not stamped, with the result that since his discharge (about two months ago) he has not been eligible for Unemployment Benefit.

General MULCAHY: I have received several letters from the Deputy. I understand that Kelly was employed as a civilian mess servant which, it appears, is not an insurable occupation under the Unemployment Insurance Acts, and that, therefore, contributions were not payable in respect of him. As regards National Health Insurance I am arranging that the matter will be attended to at once.

ORANMORE (GALWAY) ARREST.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence (a) whether he is aware that John Joyce, a boy of 17½ years of age, of Gurrane, Oranmore, was arrested on the 10th March, while visiting his uncle's house at Castlegar; that he was imprisoned in Galway and afterwards removed to the Curragh; that he has signed the usual undertaking, and has secured two securities; and will the Minister, in the circumstances, have this boy released; (b) further, to ask the Minister whether William Shaughnessy was arrested on the 21st February, at Lackagh, Turloughmore, Galway, detained at Galway Jail, and afterwards removed to the Curragh; whether he has signed the usual undertaking, and got two sureties; and will the Minister say whether, in the circumstances, Shaughnessy will be released.

General MULCAHY: Joyce was released on the 25th June, and Shaughnessy on the 29th June.

COMPENSATION FOR MOTOR CAR.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he will state whether compensation has yet been paid to Mrs. M. Cassidy, of Main Street, Castlerea, on account of a motor car which was taken by the National troops on 21st July, 1922; and, if not, can he explain the great delay in dealing with this claim.

General MULCAHY: Compensation has not yet been paid to Mrs. Cassidy. Her claim is receiving attention. Its consideration has necessarily been delayed pending the handing back of the car and the receipt of a report on its condition when returned.

A CASTLEBAR PRISONER.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Michael Sweeney, of Ballyvary, Castlebar, has been arrested, and is still detained in Galway Jail; whether any charges have been proffered against him; and if it is the intention to release him on the usual conditions.

Gen. MULCAHY: Michael Sweeney was arrested on suspicion of looting. He has not been formally charged. He has signed the usual form of undertaking, and the question of his release is being considered.

A CO. MAYO ARMY CREDITOR.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that a sum of, approximately, £50 is due to Mrs. Stack, of Bellindine, Co. Mayo, for repairs to a motor car; that the bills and accounts have been repeatedly submitted to the military authorities, after being duly vouched; that the firm who executed the repairs is threatening Mrs. Stack with legal proceedings; and will he see that in order to prevent such proceedings payment of the account is expedited.

General MULCAHY: The settlement of Mrs. Stack's account is being expedited.

A MOUNTJOY PRISONER.

RISTEARD MAC LIAM asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that Thomas Donohoe (farmer's son and the only help of his father, now 95 years of age) has been incarcerated in Mountjoy Prison since 11th March last; and whether, in view of the fact that he signed the undertaking required by the authorities and produced the necessary bails as to his future conduct long since, the Minister can now see his way to release him.

General MULCAHY: Guarantees of Donohoe's good faith in signing the usual form of undertaking have been received from persons whose assurances are not acceptable to the Army authorities. In the circumstances it is not considered advisable to release Donohoe at present.

UNPAID ARMY ACCOUNTS.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he can explain the delay in having the accounts of the following traders in Woodford, Co. Galway, settled, viz.—James M'Mahon, butcher (amount due, approximately, £90); Raymond Hennessy, general provision dealer (amount due £135); Michael M'Carthy, general merchant (amount due £20); and whether, in view of the fact that these accounts are now several months overdue, he will take steps to have payment expedited.

General MULCAHY: Enquiries are being made. The settlement of any outstanding accounts will be expedited.

A BALLINA PRISONER.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that Mr. H. Kevany, Chairman of the Ballina Rural District Council, was arrested at a meeting of the Council held on 12th March last and that he has since been detained in Galway Jail; if he can state what are the reasons for Mr. Kevany's arrest, and whether it is proposed to formulate definite charges against him and put him on trial; or, alternatively, to have him released.

General MULCAHY: Mr. Kevany was arrested on suspicion of aiding and abetting the Irregulars. He has refused to sign the usual form of undertaking. It is not intended to formulate a definite charge against him, and it is not considered advisable to release him at present.

[WRITTEN ANSWERS.]CATTLE SEIZURES (WESTMEATH)

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that eight cattle, three of which were the property of James Malynn, three of Michael Brennan, and two of Joseph McGrath, were seized by National forces from the lands of Mr. Matt. Farrell, Ballymore, Westmeath; whether Mr. Farrell rented these lands to the above-mentioned persons for grazing purposes. Further, to ask whether the cattle in question have been sold, and, if so, will these men be compensated, or, if not sold, will the Minister see they are returned.

General MULCAHY: The cattle referred to in the question were seized by troops, as they were trespassing on lands which have been seized illegally by Mr. Farrell.

About two years ago Mr. Farrell forcibly took possession of these lands. His claim was subsequently adjudicated upon by a District Court in April, 1922, and was rejected. Mr. Farrell's appeal to the Circuit Court was dismissed with costs in June, 1922, and an ejectment decree was executed on Mr. Farrell in August, 1922. Mr. Farrell immediately resumed forcible possession of the lands and retained possession until the lands were again cleared by the military authorities on the 9th ult. There can be no doubt but that Messrs. Malynn, Brennan and McGrath were aware that they could acquire no legal grazing rights on the lands in question from Mr. O'Farrell, and that they were grazing the lands illegally.

The proceeds of the sale of the seized stock will be retained by the military authorities pending a decision by the Dáil on the general question.

QUESTION ON ADJOURNMENT.

SANITARY CONDITIONS OF JAILS AND BARRACKS.

Mr. EVERETT: I desire to give notice that I will raise on the adjournment the question of the sanitary conditions of jails and barracks in which prisoners are detained.

THE PREVENTION OF ELECTORAL ABUSES BILL, 1923.— SECOND STAGE.

Mr. BLYTHE: The Prevention of Electoral Abuses Bill of which I now move the Second Reading codifies the existing law with certain alterations and changes in relation to the prevention of corrupt practices. In the law as it stands at present are embodied sections of quite a number of Acts, such as the Representation of the People Act, 1850, the Corrupt Practices Act, 1854, the Ballot Act, 1872, the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883, the Parliamentary Election Corrupt Practices Act, 1885, the Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1895, and the Representation of the People Act, 1918. Besides codifying the law, certain changes that the experiences we have had in this country have shown to be necessary, are being made. There are new penalties for personation and new powers are given for arrest, and for other steps for the prevention of personation. Heretofore a police officer could only take a person in charge for personation if he were directed to do so by the Presiding Officer. Under this Bill it is proposed to give him power to act in the same way as he would in the case of any other offence against the law being committed. It is proposed, therefore, to indemnify the Returning Officer and policeman in case he acts without malice. Of course if there is malice proven, or if there is anything else wrong in that way the indemnity would not hold. The matter of personation has been regarded as almost a sort of legitimate practice in the past. Both sides have caused men personating to be arrested, and then there was a sort of exchange of prisoners at the end of the day, and the offenders on both sides were released. The thing continued in that way, and at the next election these people probably felt there was no danger in impersonating and they were quite ready to do it. Personation has become a habit, and it is a matter that it is very necessary to take such steps as we can to put an end to it. We also propose to provide that the offence of personation can be dealt with summarily. It is one of the things for which it is very difficult to secure a conviction if tried before a jury, and it would be more difficult if during the next few months people were brought before juries on charges of personation. There will be certainly a great likelihood that in any jury that might be empannelled there will be somebody who had been guilty of the practice himself. We feel it is even more important to have a certainty of conviction if there is evidence given that proves the case and that there should be a conviction rather than that the punishment should be very severe. If a man gets five or six months imprisonment it will serve to deter him quite as well from practising offences of this sort as if he got a much longer term. It is a matter in which people should feel that the risk of being detected and punished for it is very considerable. We have had to make provision in this Bill for the carrying out of a Referendum. It might be argued that there is no need for personating agents at a Referendum. I think in very many countries where the institution of the Referendum exists there is nothing in the way of personating agents appointed, but in view of recent practices we feel that some provision should be made that would allow machinery to be set up to detect and prevent personation. No sort of State machinery can be set up. If you take your Presiding Officer he will not do anything, ordinarily speaking, to prevent personation. The Presiding Officer is a man from the locality generally; he is paid a certain fee for acting for the day. He is not going to do anything in the ordinary way that will incur odium if he can avoid doing it, and any amount of personation might go on, and the Presiding Officer might certainly take no steps to stop it. He would allow it to go on. You cannot appoint from the State personating agents either, because you would be in the same difficulty. A man employed in four years for a day is not going, for the sake of the fee he gets or the hope of being employed again, to offend his neighbour or to take any strong action.

[Mr. Blythe.]

If agents were appointed and paid by the State the money would be spent without result. We have provided machinery in this Bill which we think will enable political parties to be brought into action. There can be appointed, if a Referendum is demanded, a man who will challenge the Bill. He will have power to get personating agents to attend in the booths and to stop people who are endeavouring to personate. On the other hand, if the Bill is passed—as it must be passed by the Dáil before there is a Referendum—there can be appointed somebody who will act as sponsor, who will appoint somebody as agent in each county who will have power to send people to act in the booths in case personation is attempted. The machinery is not perfect, but it seems the best that can be devised. This work that may be done by political parties in furtherance of their own politics, with a view either to have the Bill carried or defeated, seems to be the best that can be accomplished. It certainly does seem necessary, in view of the extent to which personation has been carried on in recent years.

Certain other changes have been made. For instance, in the past, it was illegal to hire cars for elections. Of course, cars were continually hired and the prohibition was rather in the nature of a farce. Then it was illegal to make payments for bands, ribbons, etc. It does not seem that there is any real objection to spending money on them, and in any case money was always spent in that way. We have withdrawn the limit of expenditure that a candidate may incur. It was very difficult to fix upon a limit that would be suitable in the present circumstances, with Proportional Representation. The limit which might be reasonable in a three-member constituency might be inadequate in a nine-member constituency, where there would be a large number of booths scattered all over the constituency. On the other hand, if you allowed the sum that would be reasonable for a nine-member constituency, it would be too much for a candidate who would seek support in a more restricted area. There is also the fact that the law was entirely ignored in this matter. The agents habitually made returns showing an expenditure of a few hundred pounds, whereas, the expenditure really amounted to £1,400, or £1,500. It seems to me to be better simply to insist on a return being made and to hope that in the future we shall have accurate returns—a thing that was not done in the past. In that way we could come down on people who expended money in a way that was forbidden in the Act, and we would not trouble at all so much about the entire amount of money spent. It is doubtful whether expenditure on the part of any candidate would be likely to influence the result in the same way that it might have done in the past, when there was a straight fight between two candidates. Those are matters that are new and that are capable of being improved.

There is not much new in principle in the Bill. It is mainly a codification of the existing law. The changes are chiefly changes of detail, and it seems to me that a good deal of attention might be given to the consideration of the clauses in Committee, but as the general principle of the Bill is one about which there cannot be a great deal of difference of opinion, I move the Second Reading of the Bill.

MINISTER for EDUCATION (Prof. MacNeill): I second the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the whole membership will be glad to support the Second Reading of this Bill. We have all expressed our views as to the necessity for some strengthening of the law, especially in regard to personation, and a few other practices. I think it is, therefore, not necessary to go into any considerable discussion on it at this stage. I desire to raise one small point that may be of importance or of no importance. The short title of the Bill is "The Prevention of Electoral Abuses Bill, 1923." The long title of the Bill deals with corrupt practices and illegal practices, and makes provision for "the prevention of such practices and abuses at elections to Seanad Éireann, and at a Referendum and for other purposes connected therewith." Presumably, that means connected with "abuses." I raise the point whether Section 50 is strictly within the title, and if it is not whether we should not amend the title so that there may be no ruling out of order later.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: This is a Bill on which there will be general agreement in the Dáil. One might go further and say that there will be general agreement in other places, even amongst those who might in the past have been professionally or otherwise responsible for a good deal of the electoral guile that this Bill is intended to counteract. The purpose of such a Bill must necessarily enlist general support. I remember being very deeply impressed at the last election by the statement of a foreigner at present in this country who happened to have witnessed a good deal of the wholesale impersonation that then took place. He was a Scandanavian, and he stated to me impressively, because of his ingenuousness in the matter, that in Scandanavia, whether in Norway or Sweden, any person guilty of impersonation would be regarded and treated as a criminal. Of course, such persons are criminals—they are not merely lying, they are robbing. They are robbing other people of what is their essential property, as citizens. The Minister in proposing this Bill justly stated that it was not, in fact, more than a consolidation of previous enactments in the matter, with certain slight amendments.

Without expressing any general disagreement with the Bill, or with that procedure, I would like to say that I would have liked to have thought that this Bill could have been so drafted as not merely to penalise offences which it does do, and adequately and satisfactorily does, but if possible to do what is admittedly a much more difficult thing to attempt to do, and that is to obviate some of those abuses. I think it would be admitted that any attempt to obviate abuses of this kind would be very difficult, but it would have been worth the attempt. It has been attempted in other countries with a great deal of success. Let me touch upon the single case of impersonation, a great evil which it is necessary to penalise and obviate if it is possible to obviate it. In other countries it has been found possible that a voter shall bring with him his attestation as a voter. Now, I know that is a very difficult thing to do. It has been done in several countries. Methods have been outlined by which it can be done in Ireland. I think it is not impossible to do it, and I suggest it would be worth while to get the voter when he comes to register his vote, to hand in some form of certificate which would be a proof that he or she was the person so certified on the register. That, however, has not been done.

One other omission I desire to draw attention to, which, I hope, it will be possible to obviate in the Committee Stage, but which it is right to refer to in this stage, because I think it is a very glaring omission. Inasmuch as it would be very difficult for any private Deputy to deal with the matter adequately by an amendment in Committee Stage, because of the lack of machinery, I suggest to the Minister that he might think over the question of intimidation in the meantime. Intimidation is not dealt with in this Bill. Intimidation has very markedly occurred not only in one election, but in several elections. I would like to have, in any prevention of Electoral Abuses Bill passed by this Dáil, a definition with a very stringent penalty that any person even professing to interfere with the normal course of an election should be held open to some penalty of a drastic kind, and that the parading of arms or of any weapons whatever during the course of an election should be penalised in a similar fashion.

Having studied the procedure adopted for the taking of referendums in other countries I am slightly surprised at Section 23, and the adoption of a definite sponsor and a definite challenger. It is undoubtedly a very carefully thought out matter in the Bill, and may be regarded at this Second Reading as a principle of the Bill, but I do not know that a procedure of this kind is adopted for referendums in other countries, and I am not sure that the principle is the right one. I think it would be very much better to leave the matter to the elector acting by referendum without bringing the question of personalities in at all. The Minister will perceive instantly what I am referring to. If you are going to get a challenger put down by name, and a sponsor put down by name under any motion carried by referendum, the question underlying that referendum will undoubtedly be tied up with the merits and demerits of the personal qualities of the sponsor. That is inevitable, and is a thing that is highly desirable to avoid. In other countries the question is put down so that it will be possible for an elector exercising the referendum to record his opinion, yea or no, in respect of a particular measure, having taken his or her conclusion on that matter without a very clear recognition of who might be the sponsor, or who might be the challenger. If it be possible to remove the question of those personalities it is very desirable that it should be done. It is a case of procedure, and I think what has been done in the Bill in this regard is not the very best that could have been done.

[Mr. Darrell Figgis.]

Certainly I am bound to say that so far as I am concerned, I regard it with a considerable amount of apprehension. I hope it is not the case that the procedure of the Referendum will be made any more cumbersome than it need be. It is unnecessarily cumbersome. It is adopted in all Constitutions, and in all Constitutions it is not confused with any question of who might be in favour of the Bill or who might be against it. There are two other omissions to which I wish to draw the attention of the Minister. The first is: Has it been decided that the returning officer or the presiding officer, whoever he may be, shall not be absolved from responsibility if, considering all the circumstances, he were to regard it as his duty, but without any advice from the personation agent, to cause an arrest for personation? I know a case that occurred at the last election in the constituency which I represent, County Dublin. I drew the attention of the Presiding Officer to the fact that personation was occurring on a very large scale, and he replied that he knew it was occurring on a very large scale, that within his knowledge three persons had on that morning come forward, purporting to represent certain persons, and he knew personally they were not those persons. I asked him why he did not cause their arrest, and he said: "Because I might be mulcted in certain fines." Now, I think that a presiding officer or a returning officer should be empowered to cause the arrest of any people for personation, and if he can show in any subsequent action that he acted on the reasonable belief that personation was occurring, he should be absolved from all penalty. I want to refer to Section 26, Sub-section (2), which seems to argue against the case that I have been making. It says: "No action or other proceeding, civil or criminal, shall lie against any Returning Officer or Presiding Officer in respect of the arrest by his direction without malice of any person on a charge of having committed the offence of personation." If I read that Sub-section correctly, I believe it is open to this interpretation, no presiding officer so acting would be supposed to have acted except under the first Sub-section of that Section, by which he is motivated, if I may use the word, by the personation agent in question. That is a matter of small change in wording, but it does incorporate a principle. The Minister can cause the wording to be so changed that the presiding officer need not act on any motive furnished other than his own reasonable presumption.

The last matter is with regard to registration. As I read this Bill, I have not found in it any reference to wrongful registration, which is one of the gravest evils in connection with elections. I know a constituency in which it was claimed, and rightly claimed, that at the last election six thousand persons who did not exist were registered. We know there are a number of persons who are supposed to have died and who vote. That occurs, but this is even more remarkable. Six thousand persons were registered who had never lived, and that has become a very considerable art in this country, the registration of persons who are fictitious but who, nevertheless, are very potent. I would like the Minister to state that he will regard unlawful registration of that kind as an offence to be punished in exactly the same manner as impersonation.

Mr. DAVIN: I think there is very little to be said about this Bill, except that it will be generally welcomed by everybody who wishes to see purity in the public administration or common decency in public life. It would be possible, under the different clauses of the Bill, to deal with people who are not prepared to accept that. I think that a Bill of this kind is equally desirable in the case of Local Government elections, and one cannot fail to notice that the title of this Bill only makes it applicable to elections for the Dáil. I would like to know from the Minister whether or not he intends to introduce a Bill of a similar kind to be applied to the Local Government elections which, we are now informed, will follow immediately after the elections for the next Dáil.

Mr. BLYTHE: I have noted the point that Deputy Johnson made as to whether Section 50 comes within the Title or not. I see that it is somewhat doubtful, because the removal of the limit for expenditure seems to me to help to take away the connection with the free postage as with the matter of electoral abuses. I will look into that matter. The object of course is to obviate abuse by personation. That is not so very easily done. We have taken certain steps as well as the proposal of penalties to obviate that. The most important of these has been the increase in the number of polling booths and having smaller compact areas around each polling booth so that a personating agent will have a good chance of knowing everybody in that area, and so preventing people wrongfully voting. The question of the identity card was considered by the Committee which was set up pursuant to a Resolution of the Dáil, and they reported against it. If in this country for police purposes everyone had to carry an identity card it would be easy to use that card for preventing personation, but when people have not cards we would find perhaps when we come to an election that only a small proportion of the electorate would be equipped with their cards and we would defeat the idea of the Constitution, and I think we would be going altogether along wrong lines. The ordinary bulk of the people, even if they did not interest themselves very greatly in politics, have as much title to take part in the election of representatives as the organised active bodies who, perhaps, have their own particular interests more in view than the inert mass of the people. Then if we have not a very elaborate form of identity card it has been felt that the abuse would be rather increased than diminished. A simple form of card might be traded and might be bought and sold for the purpose of making personation simple and safe. Intimidation is dealt with in the Bill; it is one of the forms of undue influence. Section 5 says "Every person who shall, directly or indirectly, by himself or any other person on his behalf, make use of or threaten to make use of any force, violence, or restraint" and so forth. I think those words cover intimidation quite sufficiently. One cannot look at any Bill that may be referred to a Referendum simply by itself. No matter what we do, regard will be had to the people who proposed it and to the people who opposed it. I do not think that the appointment of an individual to take charge of the organisation and the machinery to prevent personation either for or against a Bill is likely to prevent the electors dealing with the Bill on its merits any more than the debates that would have gone on in the Dáil or Seanad would so prevent them. I do not think there is really very much substance in that. It certainly was intended that the Returning Officer should be absolved from responsibility if he acted bona fide and without malice, in ordering the arrest of any person whom he found engaged in personation.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: May I mention that my point was not that he should act but that when he acted on his own motion.

Mr. BLYTHE: I meant that. With regard to wrongful registration, there are penalties in the Bill. Furthermore, a vote in the name of a fictitious person is personation, the same as voting for some living person, so that the people who cause wrongful registration can be punished, and people who vote under fictitious names can be punished in accordance with the provisions of this Bill. I would really like to know the constituency where there were so many as six thousand fictitious names.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would you stand for it?

Mr. BLYTHE: It would be a very good idea. Perhaps Deputy Figgis would stand for it. We intend to bring in a Bill dealing with Local Government elections, and the question of Local Government franchise, which has not yet been dealt with will be the subject of a separate Bill.

[Mr. Blythe.]

Question put: "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Agreed.

Committee Stage ordered for Thursday week.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.—THE LAND BILL.

MONEY RESOLUTION BY THE MINISTER FOR FINANCE.

The PRESIDENT: The formal notification has come from the Governor-General, and I move:—

Chun forálacha aon Achta a rithfar sa tSiosón so chun leasuithe na dlí a bhaineann le sealbhúocht agus únaereacht talmhan do chó-líona, go bhfuil sé oiriúnach:—

(a) a údarú go ndéanfar roimh-foc sealadach as an bPrímh-Chiste in aon tsuini is gá chun aon easnamh ar Chiste na mBannaí Talmhan do dhéanamh suas agus chun ús Bhannaí Talmhan d'foc agus chun suimeanna d'foc is gá chun Bannaí Talmhan d'fhuascailt;

(b) a údarú go n-íocfar as airgead a sholáthróidh an tOireachtas suim is leor chun an t-ús d'foc ar Bhannaí a tabharfar amach chun go n-íofaídh an Stát cuid den phraigheas agus i gcóir Ciste na gCostaisí;

(c) a údarú go roimh-focfar as airgead a sholáthróidh an tOireachtas suimeanna a chaithfídh Coimisiún na Talmhan le hath-dhéanamh aon bhealaigh uisce, dréin, puirt no oibre eile, no le cuid den ath-dhéanamh san;

(d) a údarú go n-íocfar as airgead a sholáthróidh an tOireachtas suimeanna is gá do Choimisiún na Talmhan chun a chomhachtanna féin Acht san d'fheidhmiú no chun éinní eile do dhéanamh chun an tAcht san do chur in éifeacht maraon le suimeanna is gá chun luach saothair do thabhairt d'aon ghníomhaire talmhan, Aturnae no cléireach talmhan mar gheall ar dhualgaí do chó-líona thar ceann únaera aon talmhan i dtaobh forálacha an Achta san;

(e) a údarú go n-aistrefar, chun ainm an Aire Airgid chó maith le hainm an oifigigh sin do Choláiste na Tríonóide, Baile Átha Cliath, a ainmneoidh colucht rialúcháin an Choláiste, chun úsáide an Choláiste, an ciste atá i gcimeád ag an Iontaobhaí Puibh fé Alt 39 den Acht Talmhan Fireannach, 1903, agus go n-íocfar deontas trí mhíle punt sa bhliain leis an gColáiste as airgead a sholáthróidh an tOireachtas.

That, for carrying out the provisions of any Act of the present Session to amend the law relating to the occupation and ownership of land, it is expedient:—

(a) to authorise the temporary advance out of the Central Fund of any sum that may be required for making good any deficiency in the Land Bond Fund for the payment of interest on Land Bonds and for the payment of sums required for the redemption of Land Bonds;

(b) to authorise the payment out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas of a sum sufficient to pay the interest on Bonds raised for contribution by the State to the price and for the Costs Fund;

(c) to authorise the advance out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas of sums to be expended by the Land Commission in or towards the reconstruction of any watercourse, drain, embankment, or other work;

(d) to authorise the payment out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas of sums required by the Land Commission for exercising its powers under such Act, or otherwise for carrying such Act into effect, including sums required for the remuneration of any land agent, solicitor, or land clerk, in respect of duties performed on behalf of an owner of any land in relation to the provisions of such Act;

(e) to authorise the transfer into the joint names of the Minister for Finance and such officer of Trinity College, Dublin, as may be designated by the governing body of the College, for the use of the College, of the funds held by the Public Trustee under Section 39 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, and the payment to the College out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas of an annual grant of three thousand pounds.

The first four clauses of this resolution concern matters which are already familiar to Deputies from the text of the Bill as printed, and from the explanations which have been given in the Dáil. The clauses indicate the specific charges on Public Funds to which the general provisions of the Bill may give rise.

Clause (a) covers the provision which will be found in Sub-section (5) of Section 1 of the Bill. The advance which may be made under this clause from the Central Fund to the Land Bond Fund will arise only in the event of the Guarantee Fund being insufficient to meet the demands upon it. Any advance so made would be subsequently recoverable from the Guarantee Fund, so that ultimately the provision would entail no charge on the Central Fund. The provision is, however, important as affording the best security that the State can offer to the holders of Land Bonds.

Clause (b) is intended to cover the provision which will be found in Sub-section (7) of Section 10 of the Bill.

Clause (c) relates to the expenditure for which provision is made in Sub-section (5) of Section 37 of the Bill.

Clause (d) covers the general provision made in Section 58 of the Bill for enabling the Land Commission to have the necessary Funds for carrying the Act into effect, and it also covers the minor provision appearing in Sub-section (7) of Section 34 of the Bill of which any Land Agent, Solicitor, or Land Clerk, who performs duties on behalf of the owner of any land will be remunerated out of Public Funds as may be directed by the Land Commission with the assent of the Minister for Finance.

Clause (e) of the Money Resolution is new and Deputies will no doubt desire that I should explain it at somewhat more length. It will be remembered that when the Land Act of 1903 was being passed a special provision was inserted for the purpose of safeguarding Trinity College, Dublin, from the hardship which it was apprehended the College would suffer through having superior interest in land belonging to it redeemed on terms which would involve a loss of income to the college. It was felt at the time that it would not be proper that an educational institution should be allowed to suffer in this manner by reason of the adoption of the scheme of Land Purchase, and, accordingly the Act provided that a sum of £5,000 should be paid every year by the Government to the Public Trustee so that he might make use of this money in order to indemnify the college against such loss of income.

Payments under this arrangement have been made annually to Trinity College since 1903. The greater part of the money provided was, however, not required for this purpose, and a considerable balance has accordingly accumulated in the hands of the Public Trustee.

The college have for some time been bringing to the notice of the Government the general needs of the institution for further financial assistance, and also the possibility of their existing resources being impaired by the further steps which are being taken under existing Acts, and which are proposed to be taken under the present Bill for the completion of Land Purchase. In this connection the College have also pointed out that before the Treaty the British Government had endeavoured to provide that the college should be given additional financial assistance to the extent of an annual State grant of £30,000. This whole question has been very fully examined for some time past on the part of the Government and it has now been possible, subject to the approval of the Dáil, to obtain an agreement with Trinity College on the lines indicated generally by Clause (e) of this resolution. In consideration of the terms here indicated the college have formally undertaken that they will not approach the Government for financial assistance for at least a further three years, and, of course, no assurance is given on behalf of the State that an application even after that time can be entertained. It is part of the settlement that the college waives any further claim to indemnity in respect of the future operations of Land Purchase.

I should mention that the Ministry of Finance has agreed to put to the Dáil as part of this arrangement that a sum of £5,000 out of the University Vote should be devoted to the College also. Last year the sum so allocated amounted to £6,000, and in the previous year Trinity College received, I think, £12,000 from the British Government. I accordingly move the Resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move the deletion of paragraph (b) from this Resolution.

[Mr. Johnson.]

tion. I take it the proposals of the Bill, of which this Resolution is an essential preliminary, are divided into two parts, one of which is the transfer to the Land Commission, that is to the State, of rentals, as the Minister for Agriculture pointed out in his speech on the introduction of the Bill, and the giving of legal power to draw rent for certain lands. Those powers having been transferred to the State, then the process of re-transfer to the tenants, or to such other persons as may be agreed to, takes place, with the abrogation of the right to draw rentals. I take it, in agreeing to decide to bring in this Bill for the compulsory transfer from the present landlords of tenanted land, that the Government intends the Bill to provide for the payment, to these present landlords, of a certain sum as compensation for the compulsory abrogation by the State of a right which, for many years, has been exercised with the consent of the State. The State gave and the State will take away. The Bill provides for certain compensations for the landlords from whom this power to extract rent is being taken, and it is a fair question to ask, what is the basis on which the compensation is to be calculated? That brings me to the second, or correlative, part of the Bill. An inquiry is to be made, and it is assumed that the tenants will be able to pay for a certain number of years a certain sum of money annually. That is to be the basis of the compensation to be paid to the landlord. I want to know, therefore, why anything additional should be paid to the landlords? The right to extract rent which is being cancelled under this Bill is a right which was given by the State. The rental which they have been authorised to extract and to collect, has been fixed, in most cases, by Judicial Courts, and the State in its wisdom, at least the Minister in his wisdom, has put forward in the Bill a certain suggestion as to what is a reasonable charge to levy upon the future tenants. Now, presumably, that charge which is for a period of years, is to be levied on the future owner, the present tenant, and has been arrived at on some basis of reason. It is presumed to be what the tenant in the ordinary course of operations will be able to pay. I assert that it is a guess, that a rental of this kind, fixed in the way that is provided, is simply a leap in the dark, and is to be either a charge upon the tenant, the future owner, or upon the agricultural community, or upon the consuming public in favour of those persons who have in the past had a legal sanction to extract rent. It is not based upon any knowledge of what the future will be. You cannot predict the course of prices, you cannot predict the course of nature, or future harvests. You simply assume that the harvests, given good culture, will produce at least as much as in the past, and chance the question of prices. Having decided, as a matter of convenience, that the price to be charged the tenant towards the purchase shall be so and so, the proposal in this Motion is that there shall be added to that which the Minister and the State consider a fair charge upon the occupier—the man who does the work on the land—a sum, at the expense of the average taxpayer and the common fund, in the interest and for the benefit of the present land owner. It seems to me if the demand of the tenants for purchase is being fairly met and that the tenants agree to pay a price, that that is the sum and no more which ought to be paid to the present landlords. I do not see the justice nor the equity in calling upon the general taxpayer to hand over to the landlords this sum of 10% on the purchase money with an additional 2% for the costs fund. Whatever is a fair price to charge the tenants that is the fair price to pay the landlords. If it is a fair price to charge the tenants anything more than that is an unfair price to charge upon the common Exchequer, and is unfair to the community, for the benefit of the present land owners. If the argument were to run that the price that is fixed for the transfer of this right to extract rent for the landlord is the price fixed in the Bill, and if that is a fair price to pay the landlord, then that is a fair price to charge the tenant. I think the proposal in the Bill to ask the common taxpayer to pay the extra 10 per cent. is not justified by the facts. Inasmuch as the Minister has fixed the sum of money which for a period of 60 or 70 years will mean an annual charge upon the produce of the land, if that is a fair price, then again I say that is the price that ought to be paid to the landlord on the basis of the Bill that has been presented to us. That, in short, is the reason I have put forward for the deletion of paragraph (b) of this Resolution. I think no case has been made in favour of imposing this charge upon the taxpayer, and taking the figures that have been quoted, it will run to something over £100,000 a year, and in a few years considerably over that as a matter of fact. I do not know whether the Minister for Finance can promise that that amount is likely to be available to hand over as a gratuity to the landlords. I agree with Deputy Gorey in his interjection some time ago that this 10 per cent. was in strict truth a bonus to the landlord rather than an assistance to the tenant. I am sure the Bill will be greatly improved by the deletion of the clauses which are foreshadowed in this paragraph of the Resolution, and I propose to ask the Dáil to support its deletion.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE

(Mr. Hogan): I am quite willing to admit that Deputy Johnson has put the case against the 10 per cent. very fairly. At the outset in order to avoid misunderstandings we will have to christen certain things in the Bill. The Bill itself refers to the purchase money that the vendor is getting as the price. Let us take this old case of £100 rent. £1,505 is the landlord's money. That is called the price. £65 capitalised at 4½ per cent. is £1,368. That is called the standard price in the Bill. The price is the standard price plus the addition of 10 per cent. I merely want to have the names quite clear, so that we will not be at cross purposes when we are referring to the price and the standard price. The standard price is the tenant's annuity capitalised. The price is the standard price plus 10 per cent. Deputy Johnson stated the case in one sentence. He said if the money for which the tenant is making himself responsible is a fair price, then that should be paid to the landlord and no more. But if the money which under the Bill the landlord is actually getting is the fair price, then that is the price which should be paid and that is the price the tenant should make himself responsible for.

I think that is fairly stating what he said on the question. There is a lot to be said for that point of view. I will be equally frank with Deputy Johnson, and

I will say that if this were a new problem, or even a problem which had come into existence within the last five or six years, if it were not, in fact, a very old and very embittered problem, and a problem around which a great number of vested interests have grown up, and if, in addition, the European war, which has upset the money market all over the world, had never taken place, then I would say, and I have no hesitation in saying it, that the tenant should pay the full price that the landlord is getting. But we are back to the old difficulties that even a new Parliament, after a very short time, begins to find itself up against—we cannot legislate in a vacuum. This is a very old problem. It is the historic Irish economic question. It was our only economic question for the last 30, 40, or 50 years, and, of course, it is even much older than that. A great number of vested interests have grown up around it. It is a sort of common consent in the country that different considerations should apply to the land question than to any other economic question. That is the fact that is well fixed in people's minds. It is well fixed in the tenants' minds. The small farmer, or his son, who lives in the country thinks—and it has been taught to him—that he has some better title to the land that adjoins his boundary fence and which happens to belong to a landowner than, let us say, the workman in the docks, who sees the ships of some big shipping company coming in every week, thinks in regard to these ships. The workman in Dublin never dreams of going to the State and asking for the loan of money in order to get a share in some ship that comes into the docks. It is altogether different. There is a totally different atmosphere, a totally different point of view. These are the expediences—

Mr. O'CONNELL: Thanks for the hint.

Mr. HOGAN: We have got to recognise that. It may be illogical, it may not square with Deputy Johnson's rigid notions of economics, but the facts are there, and we have got to face them. We cannot afford to legislate in a vacuum. Deputy Johnson states that in his opinion this price is a guess. I hope I have made it clear that I do not agree with him, either that the price which the tenant is making himself responsible for is the fair price, or that the price which the landlord is receiving should be paid by the tenant, and I have given my reasons. I will examine these reasons in a minute. I come to the point now which he makes, namely, that this price is a pure guess. That is not very helpful. If the Deputy would give us his idea in figures of what the price should be and give his reasons—

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. JOHNSON: I will.

Mr. HOGAN: I suppose he will, at a later date—and give his reasons, then we could put one figure against the other and we could decide which of us was guessing. But I have not that advantage. The Deputy has not yet given the figures, but I daresay we shall receive them when we come to the price Sections of the Bill. For the moment I simply reiterate the statements which I made on the First and Second Reading in regard to this particular question.

We fixed this price to the landlord on its merits, and on the merits of the question itself. We fixed it in view of the fact that we cannot afford to acquire property compulsorily and to pay a price for it which would be less than its price to a Banking Institution, especially having regard to the fact that the particular property with which we are dealing was a favourite investment for Banking Institutions, Insurance Companies, Charitable Institutions and private individuals here, in England, and in America. That is a matter of fact. It simply does not admit of doubt, not for one moment; that was partly because the price or value of property itself had been, since 1881, regulated by the Land Courts. That was a very important matter from the investor's point of view. From the point of view of the Bank, he had definite figures to go on. He knew where he was in regard to them. Having regard to the fact, also equally important, that the value of this property regulated by law had not increased, had not shared in the general inflation in the value of property caused by the war, we had to keep that in mind. We had to fix a price which would not eat into the security value of this land. Otherwise we would be giving notice to the investor here and elsewhere that Ireland was not a place in which to invest money. We fixed the price from that point of view, and we fixed the price. I repeat it, from the point of view of giving justice to the landlords, and when I say giving justice to the landlords I mean exactly what I say, giving justice to the landlords, all the circumstances of the case being taken into consideration. I do not think I have any other political dogma, except that one man is as good as another. I think that is the only political dogma worth fighting for. I hope, though there may be many Deputies here who have a great many more dogmas, that they will at least share that with me. We will begin with that.

Now, with regard to the standard price to the tenant. I pointed out on the First Reading that Land Purchase was essentially a Stock Exchange transaction—that is, the State borrows money from one individual or body and lends it to another. The State has to borrow money at four and a half per cent. at least for this purpose, and when you borrow money at that price you cannot lend it at less. I pointed out also, that if we could borrow money on the terms on which money was borrowed for the purposes of the 1903 Act and the 1909 Act, we could pay the landlords very nearly £1,600, and yet leave the tenant paying an annuity of £65.

The tenants put up a very strong case from their point of view. I do not admit their case for a moment. They have put up a case, a very vocal case, that they should have purchased under the previous Acts. I pointed out before the reasons of their failures to purchase under the previous Acts. These reasons are many and complicated and I need not go over them now. No doubt we will have them from others. I was willing to go a certain distance to meet them, and the Government was willing to save them from the consequences of the dearness of money due to the war. To do that we had to find just this 10 per cent., having previously settled the price as a fair price. That 10 per cent leaves them paying an annuity which is considerably less than the annuities paid by previous tenant purchasers. We had to take all this into account. We had to take expediency into account to some extent. It might be easier to deal with these 70,000 unpurchased tenants if 400,000 other tenants had not purchased already. But they have purchased. A man is living in a parish down the country; he knows the annuities his neighbours are paying, and the conditions of previous Land Purchase Acts, and naturally gets prepossessions and prejudices which, by the strict logician might be waived aside, but for which we are inclined to make allowances, commensurate with the case. It was to make up to the tenants that money remember, for reasons over which we had no control, that we paid this 10 per cent.

I do not agree that the tenants, having regard to all the facts, particularly to the fact that they did not purchase previously, and having regard to the present conditions of agriculture, should not be allowed this 10 per cent., and that the State should not make some concession in this direction. It will only cost us £50,000 a year, which is only a small price to complete Land Purchase. That it costs only £50,000 is the answer. Everyone who knows the country, everyone who knows the reactions of this question, the artificial reactions, will admit that £50,000 is a very small price to pay for this settlement.

With regard to the costs, I do not intend to enter into an argument with Deputy Johnson as to whether the landlords are entitled to the land, or whether as a matter of expediency they should get a certain compensation for taking it away from them. That argument will lead us nowhere. There is a lot to be said for both sides. Parliament is entitled, I take it, to acquire any property it requires in the National interests. I do not think there was ever an Act passed for the compulsory acquisition of property, except, perhaps, the 1909 Act, that did not pay the cost of making title for the owner from whom the property was being taken. Surely if the price is a fair one, you should not compel a man to go to a solicitor, to go to a barrister, or conveyancer and put him to all the costs of making title. It is for the State he is asked to do it. It is for the benefit of the State he is making the title. It is the State is compelling him to make title. If the price itself is fair, if it makes no allowance for costs, then, surely, in the interests of ordinary equity and justice, the State should make some contribution to the costs. I hold that the State should pay the full cost if the price is fair. Again, expediency intervenes. We have not as much money as we would like to have, and we have not made provision for the whole costs.

We have only given them 2 per cent. That 2 per cent. will be allotted at the discretion of the Judicial Commissioner, and I certainly think that that discretion should be retained. Because there are many cases of very poor landlords. After all, we are dealing with the landlords who did not sell, and who did not sell in many cases because their estates were heavily encumbered. The price under previous Acts would be no good to them. Hence, they did not sell. We are dealing with them now, and it is only right that the Judicial Commissioner should be in a position, in a very bad case where a price is causing hardship, to give a bigger proportion of costs than in the case of a really well-off landlord into whose pocket the whole price was going. In any event, the price does not include the costs.

We are taking the land compulsorily and compelling the owner to make title. In that state of affairs it is the duty of the State at least to make a contribution towards the cost. The price here does not include the cost. The price under the 1909 Act more than included the cost, and in connection with the price mentioned in the case of every other Act, for instance the Acquisition of Land Act for railways or any other purposes, full costs were always paid.

Mr. WILSON: I would like to make the case a little clearer from my point of view. From what Deputy Johnson has stated one would imagine the State is going to assist a great deal towards the settlement of this land question. What the State is really doing is this: it is going to issue a million pound notes, if you like, with the name of, perhaps, the Minister for Finance or the Minister for Agriculture—

Mr. JOHNSON: "Cosgraves."

Mr. WILSON: and they are going to hand those to the seller of the land. All the State is going to lose on the whole business is £45,000 per year, but there is a provision in the Bill under which 5/- per cent. is to be paid by the tenant, and nobody has yet told us whether that 5/- per cent. is not making provision for this advance of interest. We have not seen the figures of the Sinking Fund. My belief is the tenant is paying the whole lot later on, before the 68 years have elapsed. However, we will hear about this from the Minister. What really is being done is that papers are being printed and handed to the landlord, and $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. is being paid for a certain number of years. There is no talk at all about the State subsidising the landlord or the tenant. I do not believe we should make the Sinking Fund. We in the farming line do not want doles. We want to base calculations on actual facts, and we would like to see that our industry will not be a claim on the State. I should like to repudiate the statement which Deputy Johnson, inadvertently I admit, made. It was to the effect that we are being subsidised by the State. We are not being subsidised, and I believe a Sinking Fund is based on the fact that the £45,000 will be paid by the tenants.

[Mr. Wilson.]

The PRESIDENT: I would like to relieve the Deputy's mind on that matter, if he has any misapprehension about it. It is not the case. Clause (b) is part of the bargain. There were two parties to the bargain and they could not meet. The State, realising the difficulty of this problem, realising the importance of having it settled, surveying the whole situation and finding that one party would only give a certain price, and that the other party could not accept less than a particular price, makes up the difference. I do not subscribe to the statement made by Deputy Johnson that what the State gives the State can take away. If you establish that principle you make the legislation which would be enacted by the State the scope of every political chance that is conceivable. You damage the credit of the State. What the State undertakes to pay to-day it may possibly repudiate to-morrow. That is a rather serious proposition for a young and a new State.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is an eternal one.

The PRESIDENT: I do not think it is an eternal one. I never heard of it before. I never heard it of any State which prospered and never heard it of any State which would honour its bargain, and make its bargain and keep it. We have got to give evidence of our good faith. In this particular case you might as well say: "The day after we will take away from the tenants what they have bought from us; we will dispose of any contributions they have made towards the liquidation of this Land Bond Fund, and we will hand over to another order of the State the property we have already taken from the landlords." It would be within the power of a Capitalist Government coming here to say: "We will stop work, as far as labourers are concerned, for one day in every week so as to punish them for looking sulky some mornings or not turning up to their work in time." That is a bad system to go on. It is the old absolutism of the Czars and it is time it was rubbed off. The State has many liabilities and responsibilities towards every section of the community and every section of the community has liabilities and responsibilities towards the State. The State has not got absolute power with regard to this. It has powers within the limitations of natural justice, and it dare not go a single inch beyond those limitations. The question in this case is, are the tenants getting off too cheaply or are the landlords getting too much? I think an examination by an unprejudiced person will give but one answer. That is that in one case they are giving all they can afford and in the other case they are getting as little as it is possible to give them with any degree of justice. Deputies smile, but if they consider and look at the bargains made under the 1903 or 1909 Acts, the smile will be the other way. In those cases there was option of purchase and option of sale but there is no option in this case. You are ramming it down people's necks whether they like it or not. You are passing an Act to acquire land and finish what has been done up to this. If the case be that this is improper and that it is too much and that you are asking the State to contribute too much towards the solution of a problem that has baffled very able legislators for more than 50 years, then I make you a present of your judgment. Take it criticised from another point of view—that it is too much to one particular section of the community, the landlords and the tenants. They might equally retort that the half million we have struck for Unemployment Insurance is too much. Manufacturers of light and heavy commodities might come here and say: "we are being taxed too much and you ought to pay us; we should get a contribution from the State instead of having our particular manufactures taxed." It is the business of the legislator to distribute the burden evenly, to relieve it where it is too heavy, and make it light wherever it is possible. It is a very popular thing to attack the landlords' interest—very popular. There are very serious reactions in that, if that be the line of policy that is going to be taken. The success of this particular Bill depends upon the success and the credit of the State. Damage that, and there is no use in your trying to pass any Act to finish up land purchase.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Johnson has, of late, indulged himself and us in the enunciation of quite a number of interesting, though not original, theories with regard to property. It would not, of course, be quite fair to twit him with the fact that the doctrines he professes in one session are not quite consistent with those which he advocates in another. In his speech on the Second Reading of this Bill he uttered words which excited my inward applause. I regret to find him to-day drawing away from the position that he took up then. I had understood from many of his previous remarks that he believed the land belonged to the people, that the land was the property of the Nation. Very good! That is still apparently the opinion on the 3rd July. On a certain date in June, Deputy Johnson was willing to take the sane, practical man's attitude, and declare, that, after all, he was not going to stand by the doctrinaire view too steadfastly, that so long as the land was cultivated he was well satisfied. Very well. Here is the way to have the land cultivated, and cultivated in the interests of the Nation. Give it to the peasant proprietor. I still have the assent of the benches on my left. The way to have the land cultivated is to give it to the peasant proprietor, but notwithstanding Purchase Acts—and one great Act as late as 1903—there are still 70,000 unpurchased tenants in the country. How are we to secure proprietary rights in the land for these 70,000 tenants if the infamous tribe of landlords, mortgagees and all the rest stand between the realisation of that great benefit for the Nation and the former class? Must the sale remain an uncompleted thing? Are no inducements to be offered? The Minister for Agriculture made an absolutely complete case just now when he pointed out the business aspect of this transaction. I am trying, as I have stated, to learn the great art of taking notes. I wrote down: "The price fixed was fixed on its merits; we could not take land at less than a bank would give." The land is the very type of investment which banks seek after and all those who are looking for a safe security, such as religious orders, love to have their funds invested in the land. That is a solid fact which even Deputy Darrell Figgis in his most imaginative moments would not seek to controvert.

The one thing which I always expect to hear propounded from the Labour benches is the right of man to justice. Let me quote Burke:—"Justice is the great standing Policy of Civil Society." It is not Policy written with a little initial letter "p," but written with a capital; not policy in the common "politician" sense of mere devices of expediency, but Policy in the best and highest sense—the National Policy of equitable treatment according to the natural rights and the acquired rights of mankind. If justice is the great standing Policy of Civil Society, the next question to ask is: The Policy of what; and what is Society? Obviously the Policy of the State. Deputy Figgis is beginning to be afraid that I shall launch out, more Figgis, on a disquisition on the State and on Society. It is sufficient, for my purpose, to mention them and pass on. The State is merely the citizens in their collective and corporate capacity. The citizens in their collective and corporate capacity exercise control over each citizen and over all citizens in the name of the common sense of most citizens. Amongst those citizens to whom the equities have to be exercised are landlords. Deputy Johnson asked us to go into the history of landlordism and to see how the landlords of to-day came to be here. Surely, there is no sense in that. It is to invite us to behave as children. Are we to go back to the beginning of the world, and to reverse all the reverses of the battle fields, to overthrow all dynasties and to begin all over again? That is simply a proposal to substitute anarchy for civilisation. I am not a bit more enamoured of landlordism as a thing, or of the landlords of Ireland as a class than Deputy Johnson is. Neither am I enamoured of the National weather. I take the Irish [Professor Magennis.] weather as I find it. I saw in an American paper recently the remark of a politician that he took politics as he found them, and he found them particularly rotten. I take facts as I find them, though they may be particularly rotten. Here is the solid fact, that land is the great sought-after investment, and that the land is owned or professed to be owned by a certain class of men, some of them unable to sell, though willing to sell, because of incumbrances. Transfer of the land from these men could, no doubt, be secured by absolute spoliation. I wonder does Deputy Johnson, who claims the doctrine of justice being the great standing Policy of Civil Society, propose spoliation—taking the land by violence and giving naught.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The suggestion is that the State should not pay anything towards the price. That is the exact point at issue.

Professor MAGENNIS: With all respect, I have not lost sight of that. The doctrine upon which this proposal, with regard to 10 per cent., is founded was enunciated, and I am dealing with that. I am coming from the source of it in the Deputy's mind to the fact at which he arrives. I am passing along by the same route as I conjecture he travelled.

His objection to the 10 per cent. in other words is a deduction from his theory with regard to what the landlord is entitled to get. His contention is apparently that the landlord should get nothing. That is either a gratuitous assumption or it is founded on something which appeals to the Deputy's mind as reason.

Mr. JOHNSON: Were you present when I spoke?

Professor MAGENNIS: No, I was not present at the beginning of the Deputy's speech.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We are not going to discuss whether the landlord should get any price for his land. That was not suggested in Deputy Johnson's speech. The question at issue is that paragraph (b) be deleted from this Money Resolution, and the effect of the deletion would be that the State would pay no contribution towards the price.

Professor MAGENNIS: I must be particularly dull, and particularly confused if the Chairman is under the impression that I have lost sight of that being the proposition. The proposition, as I understand it, is that this payment of 10 per cent. shall not be made to the landlord.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: A contribution shall not be made by the State towards the price. That is a different thing.

Professor MAGENNIS: No. I heard sufficient of Deputy Johnson's speech to know that he argued that if the price to be paid by the tenant was a fair price, then that was the price the landlord was to receive. If the price the landlord was to receive was a fair price, then that was the price the tenant was to pay. According to that argument, there was no room for a plus or for that 10 per cent., because there was equality. That is what I think I heard the Deputy argue. Am I not right?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Professor MAGENNIS: My contention, not rebutted, is what lies behind his mind is the idea to which he gave full and explicit expression before. However, I will pass away from that. I suppose I have said more than is sufficient on it. Why should not the State bear the ten per cent.? As the Deputy argued it, or as it appeared to me at any rate in this unhappy frame of mind in which, according to the Ceann Comhairle, I at present stand, he argued that this ten per cent. was in the nature of a bonus. Did he not repeat with approval the interjection of Deputy Gorey that it was a bonus, and that bonus is to be paid according to him out of the taxpayers' pocket. Now, all the time the argument is made agreeable to the public by being presented in this light, that the citizens of Ireland are to be subject to a financial contribution for the relief of the landlord. I invite him to put it the other way—although my friend Deputy Wilson will not allow it to be put in that way—namely, it is a levy upon the citizens of Ireland for the relief of the unpurchased tenant. And why? Because, as the Minister has just shown, £1,505, the purchase price to the vendor at £100 a year, if reduced by ten per cent., the plus, gives £1,368, which is the standard price or the price the tenant is to pay. So the tenant has to pay a considerably smaller amount and the reason is because the amount which is sufficient to induce the vendor to sell is made up by this contribution of ten per cent. Therefore, the proper way to look at it is, it is an expenditure of public moneys in securing that there shall be no more unpurchased tenants, and now that brings me to the point which the Chairman, I am sure, will insist is the point, should the State provide that ten per cent.? That is precisely one of the functions of the State, if you accept the account which I ventured to give of it a few moments ago. The State is the individual citizens in their collective and in their corporate capacity, doing for the individual what he cannot do for himself. The individual, as a unit of ordered organised society, is invested with the power to do to himself an advantage which, as an isolated individual, he would never be in a position to secure. The State here comes to the relief of that section of the citizens, the unpurchased tenants, and secures for them a benefit which so many of their neighbours secured twenty years ago, and from which they were shut out. Now, in all those bargains, in all payment of price, we look to see what has been purchased. What is bought here is peace, not for the farmer merely, but peace and quiet settling down to industry to the benefit of the entire nation. The contribution of this ten per cent. secures a huge benefit, not to-day or to-morrow, merely, but for all the succeeding years, and not to the farmer, merely, but to every citizen. Is it not right and fair that we should not put this ten per cent. contribution upon the farmer, who is hard set, even now, to meet the price so reduced? The farmers make a case—I am a diligent student of the case they put up in all its various forms—that those terms which the Minister for Agriculture thinks so good, but does not pretend that they are either delightfully or extravagantly good, are harsh ones. I dare say, in the case of some farmers, they are. Certainly, to many they are not tempting. Is it from these men we are to exact, by legislation, that additional contribution which induces the vendor to part with the land? I think, in every fair, broad, and long view of the situation, it is really the duty of the State in this case to supply the wherewithall that will enable this transaction which brings peace and advantage to the nation to be carried through.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Before Deputy Gorey begins, I may say the effect of paragraph (b), if it remains in the Money Resolution, if it is passed in Committee, and subsequently agreed to by the Dáil, will be that the State can pay a contribution to the price. Deputy Gorey may keep in mind the fact that an amendment could be moved in Committee, making the State contribution to the price 99.9 per cent. If paragraph (b) is deleted in accordance with Deputy Johnson's amendment there would be no provision for the State making any contribution to the price. That is the exact effect.

Mr. GOREY: I thank you for this guidance, but I do not think I need it. About the State contribution—I refrained from commenting on it on the First Reading and on the Second Reading, and I refrain from contributing to the debate now, except in so far as to mention something that may, perhaps, be interesting. Under all our previous purchases we had State bonuses—bonuses very far in excess of the 10 per cent. proposed in this clause. I am not able to give you the exact figures, but I am right in saying it was very much in excess of 10 per cent. Under the 1909 Act the less the price was the more the bonus was. Under the 1903 Act the more the price was the more the bonus was, so that I do not think anybody can contradict me about it, because they do not know enough about the figures. To say 12 per cent. would not be strictly a fact. But what I want to say is that those 70,000 unpurchased tenants as citizens of the State contributed their share of this bonus. They are a very small proportion of the State, but they have borne their share. Perhaps their Minister for Agriculture could give me the number of purchased tenants.

Mr. HOGAN: 400,000.

Mr. GOREY: Is it a great crime to ask these 400,000 to do by the 70,000 as the 70,000 have done by them? The 70,000 bore, and will continue to bear, their share of those bonuses under the past transactions, and I do not think that a great hardship or a great load is put on the State by asking them to do for these 70,000 what they have done for them. I have said I will not refer to the case that is made for this 10 per cent. I see that bank charges are named, investments of charitable institutions are named, and I think we are really getting at the actual facts when we mention some of these concerns. I am not going to refer to them; it may be good policy for the State, and I do not intend to stand in the way of the State if it thinks it is right, and I make no comment on the figures.

[Mr. Gorey.]

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the Minister for Agriculture put the case fairly when he said that the object of this 10 per cent. is to try to bring about some sort of peaceful settlement of this question, and that it is more or less of a gift, the purchase price of peace.

Mr. HOGAN: A gift to whom?

Mr. JOHNSON: A gift to the landlords, the purchase price of peace.

Mr. HOGAN: On a point of explanation, I did not say that. Even though I drew that particular statement from the Deputy now, I did not say it was a gift to the landlords. What I did say was that it was a contribution in order to relieve the tenant from the high rates of money current now as a result of the war.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to remind the Minister when he refutes with indignity—with indignation—perhaps I was right in saying indignity——

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Very proper; very right.

Mr. JOHNSON: Certainly it was not exactly delicacy when he spoke of this Bill being a compulsory Bill. He was running down the people's necks the proposition of purchase. They could not help themselves. This State, which has not a right to undo that which a previous organisation of the State did, is applying compulsion to make landlords give up their lands to the tenants at a price fixed by the State. Well, if that is not the State undoing that which the State did, I do not know what it is, and for the President to deny so fiercely the proposition that the State, having passed laws allowing landlords to draw rents from occupiers, and saying "Henceforward you shall not be allowed to draw rent from occupiers except on the terms that we lay down, and then only through our operation, for a limited number of years,"—if that is not undoing what was done, I do not know what it is. It is quite a common practice, of course, for the State to come along and say that something that was done once shall be repealed, and that something being done now may be repealed at some other time. Because, to make an assertion that a State can do these things does not mean to say that it ought, at the first opportunity, to do so. I am sufficiently a conservative, Deputy Magennis will be pleased to know, as to realise the necessity for something like continuity in a State policy. I am afraid of the Ceann Comhairle or I would attempt to follow Deputy Magennis. The question at issue is whether this sum, or any sum,, should be paid out of the common Exchequer to the landlords, over and above the annual sum for a certain number of years which the tenants are called upon to pay. I consider, in all the circumstances, bearing in mind the history of land purchase, the fact that the landlords have had long notice that there would be, at some point, a compulsory deprivation of this power which the State gave them to extract rent from their working tenants, that there is no injustice in saying to these landlords, having had such notice, that the price which may be considered to be fair for the tenants to pay out of the annual produce of the soil—that part of the produce of the soil which the tenants can, year by year, afford to pay in annuities—may be for a number of years handed over to the landlords in compensation for this compulsory acquisition. That is a fair proposition, and to my mind would be in justice and equity quite sufficient compensation for the compulsory re-acquirement by the State of these lands. Ministers think otherwise. They think it is necessary that something additional should be paid. Well, that is purely a matter of expediency, a matter of consideration, whether it is enough or too much, or whether anything should be paid at all. Landlords say it is not enough. None of them have come along and said that it was too much, but some of them feel that it is better than they might have had, and they are prepared to accept it for fear that the next Dáil might not be so generous. There is no question of principle in it, no question of justice, only the question of a bargain. The proposition as stated by the Minister for Finance was, that if the buyer and seller of a beast in a fair cannot agree, and the State thinks that the prospective purchaser ought to have that beast as he could make better use of it, then the State comes along and says "We will split the difference by paying the difference ourselves." I quite agree with the President that that is a position which might frequently be taken. I am not disputing that as a principle, but I think that in this case, in view of the position of the landlords to the State and to the tenants, and in view of the notice they have had in regard to the coming of compulsion, and in view of the rents they have drawn during the last 20 or 30 years, awaiting this day of compulsory acquisition, in view of all these circumstances, there is no necessity in justice for this extra 10 per cent. to be paid out of the State coffers.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before the matter is finally put to the vote, one point occurs to me. I had not the opportunity of listening to all the speeches, but in those I have heard, with the one exception of Deputy Gorey's speech, the assumption was always taken that this 10 per cent. contribution by the State, in order to complete and make possible this purchase, is a contribution that is to be given to the landlords. That has been confidently assumed, both in the case made, and also in the case responded to. Why is it not assumed that this 10 per cent. contribution is a contribution being made to the tenant in order to enable him to purchase satisfactorily under the present conditions?

Mr. JOHNSON: Satisfactorily to whom?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Satisfactorily to the tenant. That is an assumption that I think would entirely alter Deputy Johnson's case which has been addressed purely upon the point that the landlord is to receive this benefaction instead of the farmer, and, as Deputy Gorey already pointed out, that those who still remain unpurchased tenants will have a contribution made in their assistance by those who have purchased, just as they in their turn in times past made a contribution to those who purchased at an earlier stage. That, I take it, is the assumption under this Section of the Financial Resolution, and I believe, if it be looked at from that point of view, the entire case made by Deputy Johnson disappears.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I am in favour of the State bridging the difficulty, but I think the amount that should be fixed for that purpose would be more equitable as regards the bonuses that have been given in this respect under previous Land Purchase Acts, which covered the kingdom as far as I know, if the portion of them now which are attributable to the area outside us were commuted, and that amount placed as a bonus at the service of the unpurchased tenants. That I think would be more equitable than any bonus sum. However, I suppose the difficulty will be met in the Bill, but I think that it is not a remission of taxes, as far as I can see, and I think it could even afford to be higher than it is.

Question put. The Dáil divided.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If Deputy McCarthy wishes to have his vote recorded he must take his seat within the Dáil, in accordance with Standing Order 43.

Deputy McCarthy not attending in his place, his vote was not recorded.

The voting was:—Tá, 11; Níl, 47.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Tomás Mac Foin.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.

Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Risteárd Mac Fheorais.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghéasa.

Nil.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
 Donchadh Ó Guaire.
 Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
 Uáitéar Mac Cumhaill.
 Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
 Seán Ó Duinnín.
 Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
 Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
 Séamus Breathnach.
 Pádraig Mac Ualghairg.
 Seosamh Mac Suibhne.
 Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
 Darghal Fíges.
 Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
 Micheál de Duram.
 Seán Mac Garaidh.
 Micheál de Staineas.
 Éarnán Altún.
 Sir Séamus Craig.
 Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
 Liam Thrift.
 Eoin Mac Néill.
 Liam Mac Aonghusa.
 Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.

Pádraic Ó Máille.
 Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
 Piaras Ócaslaí.
 Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
 Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
 Críostóir Ó Broin.
 Risteárd Mac Liam.
 Proinsias Bulfin.
 Séamus Ó Dóláin.
 Aindriu Ó Láimhín.
 Liam Ó hAodha.
 Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
 Éamon Ó Dúgáin.
 Peadar Ó hAodha.
 Séamus Ó Murchadha.
 Liam Mac Sioghaird.
 Alasdair Mac Caba.
 Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
 Éarnán de Blaghd.
 Uinseann de Faioite.
 Domhnall Ó Broin.
 Séamus de Búrca.
 Micheál Ó Dúbhghaill.

Amendment declared lost.

Main question put and agreed to.

DAIL RESUMES.

Resolution Reported.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move that the Dáil agrees with the Committee in this Resolution.

Agreed.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.LAND BILL, 1923.*SECTION I.

(1). In order to provide for the payment of the sums which under this Act are to be paid in Bonds the Minister for Finance shall have power to create and issue, when and as required for the purpose, Bonds to be called $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds, of such denominations (not in any case less than one pound) as the Minister may determine.

(2) The Bonds shall bear interest at the rate of four and one-half per cent. per annum on the nominal amount thereof payable in equal half-yearly instalments at such times in each year as may be fixed by the Regulations under which they are issued.

(3) For the purpose of the redemption of the Bonds, a sinking fund shall be established by setting aside at the close of each half-year within the Land Bond Fund established under this Act a sum equal to one-nineteenth of the purchase annuities for the time being payable under this Act.

(4) The Bonds shall be redeemable at par together with the payment of all arrears of interest, and the Minister for Finance shall make arrangements for the redemption thereof by means of periodical drawings, and may make regulations for the drawing of such Bonds. Such regulations shall provide for the immediate redemption of Bonds transferred by order of the Judicial Commissioner in satisfaction of Death Duties.

Provided that any Bonds may at any time after the expiration of thirty years from the issue thereof, if not previously redeemed, be redeemed at par at such time and either by drawings or otherwise as the Minister for Finance may direct.

(5) The interest on the Land Bonds and the Sinking Fund payments in respect thereof shall be paid out of the Land Bond Fund, and if the same shall be insufficient shall be charged upon and paid out of the Central Fund of Saorstát Éireann or the growing produce thereof as a first charge thereon after any charges created before the passing of this Act.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move as an amendment to delete Sub-section (3):—"For the purpose of the redemption of the Bonds, a sinking fund shall," etc.

This sub-section provides for the establishment of a sinking fund, and for the payment into that fund of certain moneys. There are other moneys which should properly find their way into that fund. There will be cases in which tenants who purchase under this Bill instead of continuing to pay their Land Purchase annuities will come in and redeem them, and obviously that redemption price should find its way into this fund. There will also be cases of persons who purchased, and who paid part of their purchase money in cash, and that should also come into this fund. Lower down on the Order Paper Deputies will see another amendment which is to add a new sub-section in place of this sub-section which I am now proposing to delete.

Amendment put and agreed to.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE
took the chair at this stage.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move to add in Sub-section (4) the words "or in redemption of Land Purchase annuities charged on the lands acquired by the Land Commission under this Act."

There will be cases arising under this Bill where the Land Commission will acquire land in the hands of purchasing tenants, and subject to the payment of annuities to the Land Commission. In such cases it will be necessary for the Land Commission to provide for the redemption of the annuities, and the object of the amendment is to give them the necessary power to do so.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move amendment to add to Sub-section (5) the following:—"Any sums so paid out of the Central Fund shall be treated as a temporary advance to the Land Bond Fund, and shall be made good out of the Guarantee Fund."

I think the amendment explains itself.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I think there will want to be some slight further amendment about this later on. We have just deleted Sub-section (3), which was the sub-section that created the fund called the Land Bond Fund. Now, in this new sub-section we refer to this Land Bond Fund as if it existed although we have really deleted the sub-section which created the Land Bond Fund.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Would it not do after the words "Land Bond Fund" in the amendment if we inserted the words "established under this Act?"

Mr. HOGAN: I think that might meet the case. We can make the necessary amendment between this and the Report Stage.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: Yes, it would be a great deal better if it were made to fit in between now and the Report Stage.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move to add a new sub-section as follows:—

"For the purpose of redemption of the Bonds there shall be set aside in the Land Bond Fund at the close of each half year the amount of the interest and payments in respect of Sinking Fund payable by the Land Commission, in accordance with the provisions hereinafter contained, together with any sums paid by tenant purchasers in redemption of purchase annuities payable under this Act, and any sums paid in cash by a purchaser on the sale to him by the Land Commission of any land vested in them under this Act, subject to the following deductions:—

(a) the amount of the interest on the Bonds so issued, and for the time being outstanding;

(b) the amount, if any, required for the payment off of any bonds which under this Act have been transferred by order of the Judicial Commissioner, in satisfaction of Death Duties or in redemption of Land Purchase annuities.

This new sub-section is intended to take the place of Sub-section (3), which we have deleted. I have already explained the purpose of it.

Question put and agreed to.

Motion made and question put:—"That Section 1, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Section 2 put and agreed to.

SECTION 3.

The redemption price of all superior and intervening interests, incumbrances and other claims attaching to purchase money paid by means of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds together with all arrears of and interest on such interests, incumbranches and claims and the vendor's costs of sale and the cost of making title to such interests, incumbrances and claims, so far as the same are payable out of the purchase money, shall be paid and discharged by transferring to the person entitled thereto, out of the Land Bonds representing the purchase money, Land Bonds of equal nominal value, and such payment shall be deemed to be satisfaction to the extent of the nominal amount of the Land Bonds so transferred.

In fixing the redemption price of superior interests the Judicial Commissioner shall have regard to the price received by the vendor for the lands out of which such superior interests issue.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move as an amendment to insert after the word "Bond" the words "or payable out of such interest, incumbrances, and claims."

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 3, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed

SECTION 4.

(1) For the purpose of recouping vendors in whole or in part for the costs of sale including costs of owners of superior and intervening interests, incumbrancers and other claimants against the purchase money advanced under this Act there shall be established a Costs Fund amounting to 2 per cent. on the total purchase moneys advanced under this Act.

This Fund shall be raised by the Minister for Finance by the issue of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds as and when required, the interest on the Bonds to be from time to time invested in $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds and added to the Costs Fund.

(2) There shall be payable to the vendor out of the Costs Fund such sum in $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds as the Judicial Commissioner shall certify to be reasonable having regard to the amount of work done in connection with the sale and the manner in which it has been done.

Provided that no payment shall be made under this section until all the lands of a vendor to be acquired or vested on the appointed day under this Act shall have been vested, unless and to the extent that the Judicial Commissioner shall direct.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I beg to move to insert a new section before section 4 as follows:—

"From and after the first gale day in the year 1920, interest upon any mortgage charge or incumbrance charged upon or payable out of the purchase money of lands taken under this Act shall be and be deemed to have been payable and recoverable at the lowest rate only, if more than one, reserved by the instrument creating such mortgage charge or incumbrances."

It is a common practice, in drawing mortgages, to provide that the interest shall run at 5 or 6 per cent., or whatever the rate may be at the time, and then to provide that on prompt payment, or within a week or a month of the date on which the interest is due, that interest at a lower rate, say $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., will be accepted in full discharge. During the last two years there has been a general cessation of the payment of rents, and the consequence is that those landlords whose estates were encumbered have been unable to pay interest to their encumbrancers, with the result that what is known as penal interest, that is to say interest at the higher rate, has been accumulating against them, not through any wilful default of their own, but because they were unable to obtain the means to discharge their own liabilities. That, of course, is a considerable hardship upon those landlords who are now compelled to sell and from whom, but for some such amendment such as I suggest here, that penal interest would be recoverable in full for the period during which they were unable to discharge it. Also, while sales are going through, during the investigation of titles, there will be a cessation of payment to the landlord of the interest on his bonds until the title is clear, and of all payment on the mortgages until they will have cleared their title of the encumbrances. During that period also through default, interest at the penal rate will be accumulating against the fund which is ultimately to go to the landlord. I have discussed the matter with representatives both of the encumbrancers and of the landlords, and I think it is only a reasonable thing that these encumbrancers, who were entitled to charge the higher rate of interest by reason of default, should be compelled to forego that charge where the default was not the default of the landlords. It was not a case with the landlord of collecting his rents and putting the money in his own pocket and not paying the interest to the encumbrancers. It was a case that he had not got the money for the time being to meet the interest charges, and now, especially as the arrears of rent upon which that interest was charged, are going to be paid to him subject to a considerable reduction, it seems fair to me, and I suggest to the Dáil it is only fair that that reduction should fall also upon those encumbrancers who, in many cases, have been the cause of preventing the landlords from selling their lands earlier. I suggest that this amendment is fair, and should be accepted.

Mr. HOGAN: I agree with the object Deputy Fitzgibbon has in view—that is to say, that mortgagors should not be met by penal interest. That, I think, is what he aims at. He points out that there may be a normal rate of interest mortgaged in the deed with a penal rate becoming payable on account of delay, but I think his amendment goes somewhat further than he intends. The Deputy, I think, will agree that there may be a third rate of interest in the deed—that is to say, a normal rate, a penal rate, and a lower rate. If his amendment were accepted, payment would be in accordance with the lowest rate of interest, and I do not think he intends that. I have drafted an amendment which I think meets the case he puts forward. It read as follows:—

“Where the instrument creating any mortgage charge or incumbrance payable out of or charged upon the purchase money of lands taken under the Act provides that interest shall be accepted at a reduced rate upon prompt payment, no higher rate shall be due or recoverable in respect of arrears of interest or on account of any default or delay in payment of interest upon such mortgage charge or incumbrance pending the completion of the sale.”

That, I think, makes it clear that only penal interest is barred, and that the normal rate of interest runs. If the Deputy moves that amendment, I am prepared to accept it.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: That amendment seems to me to cover the cases I have in mind, and with the permission of the Dáil I desire to withdraw the amendment that I moved originally.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I now beg to move the amendment submitted to me by the Minister.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question put: “That the new section stand part of the Bill.”

Agreed.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: The next amendment is No. 7.

Mr. JOHNSON: It would be more satisfactory to take No. 8 first, because if it passes there will be no need to discuss No. 7.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I think we had better take No. 7 first.

Mr. HOGAN: I would suggest that we should take No. 8, because if it passes there will be no necessity for No. 7.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Very well.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move the deletion of Section 4. The matter was discussed a little while ago on the Resolution, and I do not propose to repeat the arguments. It is simply a matter of principle, that there is no case in equity and in justice for this claim that there should be this 2 per cent. Costs Fund charged upon the State.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: On a point of order, is not that exactly what was being discussed on the Financial Resolution, and has it not been decided by the Dáil?

Mr. JOHNSON: We are in Committee on the Bill now.

Mr. HOGAN: I do not think I need repeat what I said on the Financial Resolution. I do not think the Deputy himself would, for instance, ask the Dáil to pass a law acquiring land for a public building or a railway, and compel the owner to make title without at least paying him his costs. As I said, the price we have calculated does not include [Mr. Hogan.] costs. We are making the owner liable for the costs of making title, and, as the price does not include costs, I put it to the Dáil that in equity we should at least make a contribution towards the costs. It will be helpful also to relieve the owners of heavily encumbered estates.

Amendment put and declared lost.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:—

"In Sub-section (2), before the proviso, line 39, to insert a new proviso: 'Provided that no payment under this section shall exceed one-half of the costs actually incurred by the vendor; and ' "

This is a provision that the payment under the section shall not exceed one-half of the costs actually incurred by the vendor. The Minister has told us that the 2 per cent. will not be enough, and that being so, it is clear that the proposition is not to bear the whole of the costs. Then the question is, what proportion of the costs is to be borne out of this Costs Fund? My amendment is that not more than one-half should be borne. We are not now dealing with the question of principle. Notwithstanding the argument of the Minister that it is customary in the purchase of other classes of property for the costs to be borne by the purchaser, in this case the costs are not to be borne by the purchaser, but only part of them. What part of them? What proportion? My proposal is that the proportion should be limited to one-half. There is no other limiting motion. It is to be left to the discretion of the Commissioners as to whether they will pay one person 50, another 75, another 90, and another 100 per cent. This amendment is that there shall be a definite limit of one-half of the actual costs incurred.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I suggest that in very many cases one half of the actual costs incurred will be considerably more than the Land Judge would be likely to allow. The late landlord ought not to be limited in this case as is proposed. But for the compulsory taking of what we must regard, at any rate, as his property by the State for the purpose of resale to the tenants, these costs would not be incurred at all, in most cases the en-cumbrancers have been perfectly ready to leave their encumbrances as they stand and draw their interest or annuity, whichever it might be. In many cases that has gone on for 50, 60, or 70 years. It is not making the title to the Land Commission that really costs so much as the clearing by the landlord of the people above him who have to be paid out of the purchase money before he can get the balance, whatever it may be, that is left to him out of what the State has paid him for his land. The landlord converts what is an annuity, in the shape of rent, into a capital sum, and all the other people who have capital charges upon that annuity that the landlord has hitherto received from his tenants have to be paid off in capital sums out of the capital sum into which his annuity has been converted. It is in the clearing up of the title to these and getting rid of them, in order that he may get the residue for himself, that the costs are really incurred. That is expense which has been directly forced upon him by the State by its act in taking the property from him which produced the annual sum, and giving him a capital sum instead. If there is anything in the Bill which ought to be borne by the State, which for public purposes has altered the character of his property, it seems to me that it is the costs put upon him to enable him to get the property in its new form. The 10 per cent. is another matter. The 10 per cent. bonus was justified by the Minister. I agree that it did require justification. He made a case, which the Dáil accepted, for the contribution by the State of 10 per cent.—part to the landlord and part to the tenant, one or the other as the case may be—but a contribution to bridge the difference between the price which the vendor was willing to take, or is being compelled to take, and the price which the purchaser was willing to give. This Costs Fund seems to me to be an entirely different matter, and to stand on the pure principle of justice. Where you put a man to expense by taking his property, which he would otherwise not have been put to, you ought to shoulder that responsibility just in the same way as a railway company or a corporation which takes land for public purposes have to pay the costs of showing title. This is not so much a question of showing title by the person from whom the State has taken the land as clearing up the title by him for the purpose of getting his own property.

Mr. HOGAN: I do not think the Deputy really realises what the effect of the amendment would be. We have now agreed to the Costs Fund, and his amendment suggests that nobody should receive more than one-half. Take a small estate which would be more likely to be heavily encumbered than a large estate. When you come to make title the probabilities are that it is more difficult to make title, as perhaps there are more mortgages, more superior interests, more complications of all kinds. It might be much harder and much more difficult to make title to an estate of £2,000 or £3,000, heavily encumbered, than it would be to make title to an estate of £5,000, £8,000, or £10,000 not encumbered at all. It is only right that the Judicial Commissioner should be able to exercise discretion and give more costs to such an owner, because he has been put to much more difficulty and to more expense to make title, and also because he is less able to bear the expense of making title. I do not see anything against that. In all equity it is the fair course.

Amendment put and lost.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 4 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 5.

The provisions of Section 48 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, shall not apply in respect of any land, whether tenanted or untenanted, purchased by or becoming vested in the Land Commission under or by virtue of this Act.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: What is the position where lands are taken over that have been purchased under the 1903 and other Acts?

Mr. HOGAN: I do not understand the Deputy's question.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: The Land Commission are to take over land that was previously purchased under the Act of 1903. Does this clause permit the Land Commission to abolish the percentages that existed under the 1903 Act?

Mr. HOGAN: Does the Deputy mean by percentages the annuity?

Mr. McGOLDRICK: Bonus percentages. I have not the Act before me, but I understand this clause of the 1903 Act deals with percentages, which I assume is the bonus.

Mr. HOGAN: This Section states—"The provisions of Section 48 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, shall not apply in respect of any land, whether tenanted or untenanted, purchased by or become invested in the Land Commission under or by virtue of this Act."

Section 48 of the Act of 1903 provided for the bonus. We are abolishing it. This Bill, Deputies must remember, is an amendment to previous Acts. Previous Acts, so far as they are not amended, will hold good. This abolishes the bonus. If there is any doubt or difficulty, as the Deputy seems to have, about completed sales, because he refers to our taking power to take over land already purchased, of course the landlord has got his purchase money, and there is nothing on the holding except the annuity, and the Land Commission will redeem the annuity as provided by an amendment just put in.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 5 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Sections 6 and 7 put and agreed to.

SECTION 8.

Subject to the provisions of this Act every advance made in pursuance of a subsequent purchase agreement shall be repaid, in the manner and at the times prescribed by the Minister for Finance, by means of a purchase annuity calculated at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the amount thereof.

The purchase annuity shall be paid until the whole of the advance in respect of which it is payable is ascertained in manner prescribed by the Minister for Finance to have been repaid.

Mr. WILSON: I move: To insert after the word "thereof," line 59, the following: "provided that if the option of redemption in Sub-section (4) of Section 1 be exercised by the Minister for Finance, any advantage gained by that transaction be used to reduce annuities to tenant purchasers."

[Mr. Wilson.]

The object of this amendment is, in case the Minister for Finance thirty years hence exercises the option he has to purchase these Land Bonds at par—and presumably he will not undertake that transaction if money is dearer, but only where a profit would be made, and we assume that he will make a profit—that that profit should be passed on to the tenant purchaser. As the Bill now stands the purchaser must pay $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Supposing that the Minister for Finance thirty years hence could raise money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., he would be able to save 1 per cent. to the State. That would be a profit. On twenty millions that one per cent. would amount to £200,000, which would go into the Central Fund from the pockets of the tenant purchasers. In order to be just I think that these people, who will be the last in Ireland paying rent, as nearly everyone on the land will then own it, should get the benefit of that £200,000 to enable them to get some decadal reductions. I have not made a calculation, but I am pressing the amendment as the Minister has provided for contingencies. We are legislating for thirty or sixty years in advance, and we should make some provision for contingencies. The contingency in this case would amount to the enormous sum of £200,000 or, spread over 30 years, to £6,000,000. That should be passed on to the tenants.

The PRESIDENT: I do not know that the terminology of this particular amendment is acceptable. In essence the principle of it is practically in operation at the present moment, and has been for a considerable time. That is to say, any person reducing an annuity practically gets the sum owing in respect of a particular purchase transaction. It is practically extinguished in Stock, so that, instead of paying cash, you practically extinguish whatever is due by the purchaser by an equivalent amount of Stock. It might cost a little more, as there are certain expenses incidental to and inseparable from a transaction of that kind, which are added on. This particular amendment would perhaps involve the State in a loss or prevent the State from getting a small, or a relatively small, sum which they are entitled to at the present moment. I do not think the Deputy intends that in any transaction that takes place under this Bill that the person purchasing would get an advantage which is not enjoyed by persons who bought under the 1903 or under the 1909 Acts. I know something about this, as I was interested for the last couple of years in finding out what it would cost to redeem an annuity. I found it was possible to purchase Land Stock at a very considerably reduced price, and that some little advantage would accrue. You got practically an investment at something like five or six per cent., and I think that is all the Deputy intended when he put down the amendment. Subject to what I have said with regard to certain small costs that are consequential and inseparable from a transaction of the kind, at present any person has the right who has bought under the 1903 or 1909 Acts, and the same thing would apply as regards this Bill.

Mr. WILSON: The Minister, I think, has missed my point. I am not asking that the State should lose any costs. My amendment is that, if there is a profit, it is to go to the tenants.

The PRESIDENT: Well, that is what the tenant gets at the present time, and it is not proposed to take that from him.

Mr. WILSON: There is no provision made for the tenants in the event of a profit. Nor is there a provision to buy these Land Bonds at par. That is a contingency that will arise, and the Minister for Finance, who may be here at the time will use the profit that will accrue to the State not for the benefit of the tenant purchaser, but for the benefit of numerous applicants. I want to earmark that particular profit for the benefit of the only people who will be paying rents, because everyone else will have all their annuities extinguished.

Mr. JOHNSON: I wonder if the Deputy will accept the view that after the ten per cent. and two per cent. will be wiped out, any profits then accruing will go to the tenant purchasers? If he accepts that I think the general principle will be acceptable.

Mr. GOREY: Deputy Wilson's argument has helped to disabuse Deputy Johnson's mind if he is under the impression that he is making a gift of this money to the seventy thousand tenants. In the 1903 Act the purchasers were not paid in stock; therefore the provisions could not apply. They were paid in cash. They got money. The State proposes, when the new Chancellor of the Exchequer will arrive in twenty or thirty years time, to make considerable profit out of this. Deputy Wilson proposes that the State should act as an honest clerk and begin to be honest.

The PRESIDENT: Any honest Chancellor of the Exchequer or Minister for Finance would be glad to see people redeeming any loan. The Minister for Finance, or Chancellor of the Exchequer, will not be looking for a profit to get such loans reduced. You may take it it will be a business proposition for him. But there are certain variations to this business here that might certainly be repugnant to a future Minister for Finance, and we have not the right to bind him.

Mr. WILSON: The Minister for Finance has forgotten one point. If money is cheap twenty or thirty years hence the Land Bonds of £100 will be worth from £120 to £130. If three per cent. were the value of money then, the Bonds would be worth £130 or, as I am told, £150. I want the Minister for Finance to exercise this particular option of buying £130 stock for £100, and passing the benefit to the people whom I have referred to. He is entitled to do this. These tenant purchasers will be the only people in Ireland who will then be paying rent—

The PRESIDENT: Will the Deputy explain how that transaction will arise—that you buy £130 for £100—

Mr. GOREY: It will be a profit.

The PRESIDENT: A loss is sustained by someone. For example, the Deputy has bought his land and he owes, let us say, £600 annuities. That represents at its face value £720. That is in the possession, let us say for the sake of argument, of Deputy Gorey, and the Minister for Finance is to come along to Deputy Gorey and say: "You have £600 worth of stock. It is valued in the market at £720. Here is £600." And Deputy Gorey, being a meek, humble individual, hands over the £720 worth of stock for £600. Where is the profit? Deputy Wilson holds there is a profit of £120, which is to be handed to the tenant. I cannot understand his point. Is the figure £480 or £720? It appears to me to be a financial puzzle which can only be elucidated by Deputy Wilson or Deputy Gorey.

Mr. WILSON: The matter is a little bit confused. If the Minister for Finance 30 years hence can get money at $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.—that is quite probable—it is his business to pay those people off at par. It does not matter who holds the Bonds. It is the Minister's duty to reduce the amount of interest payable to those people. He will gain by that probably 1 or $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. One per cent. will realise about £200,000, which is really too much to give to the State, and which is taken out of the pockets of 70,000 or 100,000 people, who will possibly be the last people in Ireland paying rent. I think that is a fair proposition, and I hope the Deputies will vote in accordance with pure justice.

Mr. GOREY: Is there not a Section in the Bill under which the Government will be enabled to redeem anything at par? What is the Minister for Finance talking about?

The PRESIDENT: The Minister for Finance is talking about Deputy Wilson and yourself.

Mr. GOREY: I do not think you are answering the question. Your contention seems to be in direct contradiction to the terms of the Bill. Everybody knows what par means—even the Minister for Finance.

The PRESIDENT: I am at a loss to know where is the profit. I have been trying to find out, and I cannot, and I have not been told. As far as I see, this amendment is not a sensible one: it does not lead us anywhere. There are three parties to this transaction—the people selling, the people buying, and the State. Whatever the people who are selling get, and whatever the people who are buying get, certainly the State is getting nothing for the liability. The representatives of one of the three sections come forward here and say that if there is to be any profit out of this transaction—and they have not indicated where the profit is to be—a certain party to that transaction is to get that profit. If the matter were to be dealt with equitably it ought to be dealt out between the three sections, granted that the three were beneficiaries. It appears to me that there is one section badly served by a burden which the other two sections have enjoyed putting upon it. Thirty years hence, supposing money is cheap, this section that has borne the brunt may possibly be repaid to some advantage. We are told if there is any profit it is a section other than this section that is to benefit. I could not recommend that from the point of view of the State.

[The President.]

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: If the State issues a certain sum at £100 that hereafter stands, let us say, at £120, and the State redeems at £100 what stands at £120, and which it originally issued at £100, the State is only getting back what it originally issued, and could only realise the extra £20 if it could reissue. Therefore, it seems to me that there is no profit.

Mr. WILSON: Would I be permitted to speak again?

 AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: No. You have already spoken three or four times.

Mr. JOHNSON: If I can buy a £1 note for 15s., and if I can go and borrow the fifteen shillings in the market, I am making a profit, and that, I think, is Deputy Wilson's case.

Mr. WILSON: Quite so.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 19; Níl, 38.

Tá.

Donchadh Ó Guáire.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Tomás de Nogla.
Liam de Roiste.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cálacháin.
Seamus Eabhróid.

Risteárd Mac Liam.
Liam Ó Dainhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Broin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Risteárd Mac Fheorais.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Suileabháin.
Uaitéar Mac Cunnhaill.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghairg.
Seosamh Mac Suibhne.
Peadar Mac A' Bháird.
Darghal Fíges.
Micheál de Duran.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Staines.
Domhnall Mac Cártaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Sir Seumas Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobhúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Neill.

Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Seoirse Mac Níocaill.
Piaras Rénsal.
Fíonán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaioich.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dóláin.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Liam Ó hAodha.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamón Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Alasdair Mac Caba.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Fáite.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move the following amendment:—

To add at the end of the section a new paragraph as follows:—"The provisions of the Provisional Government Transfer of Functions Order, 1922, shall not apply to purchase annuities payable in respect of advances made under this Act."

That amendment is necessary to ensure that the money should find its way to the Guarantee fund.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 8, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 9.

(1) There shall be established a Land Bond Fund under the control of the Minister for Finance, out of which shall be paid the dividends and Sinking Fund payments in respect of all Bonds issued under this Act.

(2) Accounts of the receipts and expenditure of the Land Bond Fund both as regards capital and income shall be kept by the Minister for Finance, and those accounts shall be audited by the Comptroller and Auditor-General, and the accounts when audited shall be laid before the Oireachtas.

(3) For the purposes of this Act the Land Commission shall keep such accounts containing such particulars and entries as the Minister for Finance may direct, and shall furnish those accounts to the Minister for Finance as and when required by him, and the said accounts shall be audited in such manner as the Minister for Finance may prescribe.

Mr. SEARS: I move Amendment 11:

To delete in Sub-section (1), line 3, the words "and Sinking Fund payments," and in line 4 to add, after the word "Act," the words "together with the sums required for redemption of Bonds under this Act."

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. SEARS: I move Amendment 12:

To add a new sub-section as follows:—"Any balance to the credit of the capital or income account of the Land Bond Fund may be temporarily invested by the Minister for Finance in such manner as he may think fit."

The object of this amendment is that there shall be no money lying idly on hands.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I draw attention to a word which I suggest is misused? The point really arises under a later amendment. The word "dividend" in such a case is not the correct word. It is a question of the correct use of the English language. Strictly speaking, dividend is the result of that which is divided, and in the case of interest on bonds, dividend is not the correct word to use. Perhaps the point would be noted for next Reading.

Mr. HOGAN: If the Deputy prefers the word "interest," I am quite agreeable. We can arrange that on Report.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is not a matter of preferring it. I think it is more accurate. If the grammarians at your disposal think differently, I am satisfied.

Mr. HOGAN: The word "dividend" is the word used in the same connection in all the other Land Acts. It is distinctly useful in the case of an Act which has carried out its intentions—to use the same words when you want to carry out the same intention.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think they were not quite the same.

Mr. HOGAN: They were.

Mr. WILSON: In this case it seems to be the intention that the money that will be temporarily lying to the credit of the Land Bond Fund will be applied to redeem Free State Loans. In that case you will be making a profit, and I think it is not doing justice to our side if you make a profit in that way and not put it to the credit of the Sinking Fund in connection with the Land Bill. I think the proceeds of the investment should go towards the Sinking Fund.

Mr. HOGAN: If the Deputy would read the provision in the Bill which states that the accounts shall be audited by the Comptroller and Auditor-General and laid before the Dáil it would allay his suspicions. The accounts will be audited each year and laid before the Dáil, and when the time comes for the Dáil to deal with them they will have a discretion as to what to do, and they will have all the facts before them.

Mr. GOREY: I hope they will be more explanatory than some of the Estimates.

Mr. HOGAN: It is not a question of the Estimates not being explanatory, but of its being impossible to explain them to some people.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 9, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 10.

(1) Interest at the rate of four and one-half per cent. per annum shall be paid by the Land Commission to the Land Bond Fund on the nominal amount of all Bonds issued under this Act by the Minister for Finance to the Land Commission and not certified by the Minister for Finance to have been repaid.

(2) Where advances are made by the Land Commission the Land Commission shall, until the advances are ascertained to have been repaid, pay to the Land Bond Fund in respect of those advances five shillings per cent. per annum in respect of Sinking Fund.

(3) Where the Land Commission purchase any land, no sums in respect of Sinking Fund shall be payable until the Land Commission have disposed of that land to purchasers.

(4) If at any time the said annual payments shall be in arrear for forty days, the amount in arrear shall be charged on, and forthwith made good out of, the Guarantee Fund.

(5) The powers conferred by the Land Purchase Acts for raising such sums as may be necessary to recoup the Guarantee Fund for payments made thereout shall henceforth be exercised by the Minister for Finance in manner prescribed by rules made by him under this Act.

(6) Payments by the Land Commission under the preceding sub-sections shall be made at such times in each year as may be prescribed by the Minister for Finance.

(7) A sum sufficient to pay the dividends on the Bonds issued under this Act for contribution to price and for the Costs Fund shall be paid in each year to the Land Commission out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move Amendment 13:—

“To delete Sub-sections (2) and (3), and to substitute in lieu thereof the following Sub-sections:—

(2) The Land Commission, where land is vested in them under this Act, shall, until the purchase annuities charged on the land cease to be payable, pay to the Land Bond Fund in respect of sinking fund five shillings per cent. per annum:—

(a) in the case of tenanted land on the standard price thereof from the appointed day;

(b) in the case of untenanted land on the amount of the advances made in respect of such land from the date on which such advances become repayable, and, in so far as such land has not been disposed of within a period of five years from the appointed day, on the amount of the price of such land from the expiration of said period until the lands have been resold.

(3) The Land Commission shall pay to the Land Bond Fund all sums received by them for the redemption of purchase annuities payable under this Act, and all sums paid in cash by purchasers on the sale by the Land Commission of any land vested in them under this Act.

The new sub-section (2) elaborates the wording of the old sub-sections (2) and (3), and differentiates between the case of tenanted and untenanted land. The new sub-section (3) is consequential on Amendment No. 4, already agreed to.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON: I move Amendment No. 14:—“In Sub-section (2), line 24, to delete the words ‘five shillings’ and to substitute therefor the words ‘a quarter of one.’” This is another amendment that would have come better from Deputy Magennis. I bring it forward as providing a better expression than that in the Bill. Five shillings per cent. strictly means 5s. per 100 shillings, and that is not what is intended.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Johnson seems to be quite correct, but, strange to say, that is exactly the term used in the 1903 and the other Acts, only 10s. is the figure in the 1903 Act, instead of 5s., as in the Bill before the Dáil.

Mr. JOHNSON: They are not always very accurate in those Acts.

Mr. HOGAN: When you want to achieve a certain purpose you are always perfectly safe in going according to an Act which has achieved that purpose. There is then no danger that a Judge will misinterpret the wording. I would rather give this matter a little more consideration and deal with it on Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move Amendment 15:—“To delete Sub-section (5).” The matter covered by Sub-section (5) will be included in the new Section 11, which will be proposed under a subsequent amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment No. 16:—"In Sub-section 7, line 40, to delete the word 'dividends' and to substitute in lieu thereof the word 'interest.'"

Mr. JOHNSON: I have already raised this matter. It is quite a formal matter, and as the Minister has undertaken to consider it I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 10, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 11.

All sums collected in respect of arrears of purchase annuities in repayment of advances made in pursuance of purchase agreements lodged prior to the passing of this Act shall be paid into the Guarantee Fund.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move Amendment No. 17:—

To delete the section, and to substitute therefor the following new section:—" (1) The powers declared in Section 6 of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, to be exercisable by the Lord Lieutenant or by the Treasury, shall henceforth be exercised by the Minister for Finance, and the notice provided for by Sub-section (2) of the said Section shall cease to be required. (2) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the Provisional Government Transfer of Functions Order, 1922, all sums collected after the 31st day of March, 1923, in respect of arrears of purchase annuities in repayment of advances made in pursuance of purchase agreements under the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, or any later Land Purchase Act, other than subsequent purchase agreements, shall be paid into the Guarantee Fund."

With the permission of the Dáil I would like to propose this amendment in slightly altered form, and exclude from the last two lines the words "other than subsequent purchase agreements." These words are unnecessary, and are slightly confusing.

Amendment, as altered, agreed to.

Mr. GOREY: I move Amendment 18

To add to the Section the following words:—"Provided, however, that where grants have been withheld from County Councils, in consequence of the non-payment of annuities, such arrears of grants shall be forthwith paid to the County Councils concerned before any of the sums so collected shall be paid into the Guarantee Fund."

This section has been deleted and a new section has been put in. At present the rates are held responsible for arrears of purchase annuities. The County Council has to make good the amount of the annuities in arrear, with the result that the funds of the County Council suffer. I want to provide that before the money is paid into the Guarantee Fund the loss to the County Council will be made good.

The PRESIDENT: I do not understand the purpose of this amendment. As far as I can see, it means that whatever guarantee you have had by the setting up of the Guarantee Fund goes by the board. The State is putting up a considerable contribution towards the solution of this problem. We look for some guarantee in respect of annuities that should be paid. Where they are not paid we call upon this Guarantee Fund. The Guarantee Fund is made up of moneys which in the ordinary course would be paid to local authorities in relief of rates. In order to secure that the Guarantee Fund will have moneys, certain sums are paid into it. This amendment would take out those sums.

Mr. GOREY: No, it would not.

The PRESIDENT: "Such arrears of grants shall be forthwith paid to the County Councils concerned before any of the sums so collected shall be paid into the Guarantee Fund." If the dispute be regarding certain delay which took place by reason of the fact that annuities are not paid, I think it is unreasonable, because those Land Commission annuities are generally just a month or so in arrears. That month or so may be a period during which the charge will fall upon the Central Fund, unless there is some other method of finding the sums necessary to pay the dividends on the Sinking Fund. If there be a loss, that loss ought to be shouldered by those responsible for it. I do not understand the amendment, unless it be to discount the value of the Guarantee Fund, or to compensate people living in the neighbourhood, or to compensate County Councils in the neighbourhood of which Land Commission annuities are not regularly paid. If they are not paid, on whom should the responsibility lie?

[The President.]

Mr. GOREY: On the Land Commission.

Mr. WILSON: On those who do not pay.

The PRESIDENT: If it should fall on the Land Commission, what is the strength of the Land Commission to bear it? The Land Commission must be fed from somewhere, and it is not even fed from here. This fund only feeds when the land annuities are not paid. The time arrives when the land annuities are paid. If the purpose of the amendment be that directly they are paid they should be sent back at once without delay, I say there is no unreasonable delay, having regard to the fact that normal Government machinery is thrown out of gear when people do not discharge their debts. The State is security for most of those things, and the State naturally looks to something on which it can draw in the event of those land annuities not being paid. If the dispute then be as regards delay in restoring moneys to the Guarantee Fund, I say there has been no unreasonable delay.

Mr. GOREY: I take it that the formation of the Guarantee Fund under this Bill will be responsible for any laxity of payment, and not the County Councils. This amendment is dealing with the machinery that held good under the previous Acts, and we want the County Council to be relieved, and the first payments made into their funds for any of those annuities out of the Agricultural Grant. The operation was that a certain amount of money had to be withheld from the Agricultural Grant to make good the deficiencies on annuities. The common impression through the country is that the Land Commission was not stringent enough in exercising its rights in collecting its annuities. We do not refer to the people who were only a month or so in arrears. We refer only to bad debts, and we want to get the defaulters in that respect dealt with more energetically. If the Central Authority had all the responsibility instead of the County Council, they would be more energetic. This amendment is not dealing with the operations of this Bill, but with the operations of the previous Act.

The PRESIDENT: I do not agree with this amendment. I do not agree with it, because it reduces to some extent the central administration. There is no use in telling me that only certain people do not pay. Within the past few days we had to draw very heavily on this Guarantee Fund to pay the interest due on the 1st July. Just imagine what our position would be if there was not a fund to draw on in order to make up the sum necessary to discharge the interest honourably due by us in connection with the previous Acts. The whole finance of this would break down, and our credit would be very seriously damaged. We had that Guarantee Fund to draw on, which made it different. The local authorities in the area under the jurisdiction of which those particular holdings are situate, will feel this change. There is no other way that we know of to bring it home to them equitably. A sum of over £1,000,000 is distributed from the funds raised in taxation to relieve local taxation. A certain amount of that is ear-marked as a sort of security for the payment of those Land Commission annuities. It is so used to make good whatever has been drawn out of the Guarantee Fund to make up the difference of the sums we have collected in respect of Land Commission annuities and the sums we have to pay to discharge the interest and sinking fund charges on land stock taken up by people in good faith, believing we would pay interest on the sinking fund to pay them their dividends, and make good the ultimate taking up of the land stock that has been issued.

If you in any way weaken that Guarantee Fund, you are weakening the credit of this transaction; you are weakening any confident anticipation that we had from the beginning that this Stock would remain at a fair price. It is most essential that it should remain at a fair price, because the basis of the Act was that it would be practically par. If you reduce the security a person has by taking away the security of the Guarantee Fund in any way, you are reducing the security that the person has who invests in Land Stock. "Arrears of Grants shall be forthwith paid to the County Councils concerned before any of the sums so collected shall be paid into the Guarantee Fund." Arrears of Grants in that case means something that has been withheld. Very good. These arrears of Grants shall forthwith be paid to the County Councils from what?

Mr. GOREY: From the Agricultural Grant.

The PRESIDENT: The State, in the first instance, collects this from all the taxpayers. It divides it into certain compartments. One compartment is called the Guarantee Fund. When the Land Commission annuities collected are insufficient to discharge the interest and the Sinking Fund, we take it from a particular compartment and make good that amount, and we hand out the interest and the Sinking Fund. That is now what happens. "Arrears of Grants shall be forthwith paid to the County Councils concerned." You have got to pay them and you find an empty box. Where is the money to come from?

Mr. WILSON: You collect it from the man who did not pay. He will probably pay two months later, and it will go into this box.

Mr. CORISH: Is it usual for the Government to withhold a Grant in the case of a county in which the annuities are completely paid, because in County Wexford we went to the trouble of finding out what annuities were due, and we found there was a very small proportion due compared with the amount of money the Government owes the County Council?

Mr. O'DONNELL: I think it is a most degrading thing, and I think it does not become the dignity of the Dáil that in this Land Bill, in which the Nation's credit is pledged, we should be looking for loopholes for any Party to seek to evade just and lawful debts.

Mr. GOREY: I take this as an insult from an ignorant Deputy.

SEVERAL DEPUTIES: Withdraw.

Mr. GOREY: I will not withdraw unless he withdraws the word "evade."

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy really should withdraw that, because he should not make any personal reflection on any Deputy. I ask Deputy Gorey to withdraw that remark.

Mr. GOREY: Very well, I withdraw it, but I ask you to ask the Deputy to withdraw the word "evade."

Mr. O'DONNELL: No.

Mr. GOREY: Has Deputy O'Donnell the right to insult any other Deputy here?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I did not take Deputy O'Donnell's remark as being insulting to any Deputy.

Mr. GOREY: Perhaps you do not take his remark seriously, no more than any of us do. The President has established under this Bill a Guarantee Fund. Under previous Acts it came out of the Agricultural Grant. Very well, if it comes out of the Agricultural Grant, then it cannot come out of the Guarantee Fund.

The PRESIDENT: I see that the Deputy does not quite understand. There is, first of all, the Agricultural Grant. There is a period of suspense during which it is not known whether or not this particular Fund will be called upon to discharge any sums to make up the unpaid Land Commission annuities. Before it is made available for County Councils at all the money passes through a Guarantee Fund into the compartment I have mentioned, the box or the fund, or any other means of keeping it for the time being. While the Land Commission annuities are in jeopardy that sum is locked up and the County Councils cannot get it.

Mr. CORISH: Even if one county has completely paid its annuities?

The PRESIDENT: I should say so. When the time comes to release that in order to make up the difference the box is emptied. It must again be paid, and it will be paid when the Land Commission annuities are paid, but until that a consequential delay occurs, and there is no means of filling the box until the

[The President.] annuities are paid. When they are paid then we discharge at once. So far as I know there is no unreasonable delay in emptying that Fund once it is made good.

Mr. CORISH: Surely if a County Council, or two or three County Councils interest themselves to the extent that they would try to get the annuities paid, they should get some encouragement?

The PRESIDENT: So far as I know, they do, but there may be cases where, if three or four counties do not pay, practically the whole of the Fund may be in jeopardy. If there be a particular county in which no annuities have been paid at all, then that county will get nothing. I do not think the Deputy ought to press that amendment.

Mr. GOREY: I withdraw the amendment, not to evade it, but to enforce payment, in order that the Government may be more energetic. We do not want to evade anything. We want to have it paid.

Mr. CORISH: Deputy Gorey raised a very good discussion.

Mr. GOREY: It has been going on for years.

Mr. DOYLE: To back up that argument I may say that we go so far in Wexford that we get a list of those who are not paying their annuities and publish them in the newspapers.

The PRESIDENT: That is right. I admit that.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 11 as amended stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Sections 12, 13, 14 and 15 put and agreed to.

SECTION 16.

(1) In the case of every holding to which this Act applies, rent and arrears of rent accrued due up to and including the gale day next preceding the date of the passing of this Act shall not be payable by the tenant, and no proceedings against the tenant for recovery of arrears of rent shall be begun, continued or enforced after the passing of this Act. There shall be payable by the tenant to the Land Commission a sum hereinafter referred to as "compounded arrears of rent" ascertained as provided in the sub-section following.

(2) Compounded arrears of rent shall be a sum equivalent to the total rent and arrears of rent due on the gale day next preceding the passing of this Act in respect of rent accrued since the first gale day in the year 1920 less a deduction of 25 per cent. In any case where a hanging gale is customary any payment of rent shall be deemed to have been made in respect of the gale next after the gale in respect of which it was actually made.

(3) Compounded arrears of rent shall be payable as to so much thereof as does not exceed 75 per cent. of the annual rent, immediately after the date of the passing of this Act, and as to the balance, if any, on such date or dates before the appointed day as may be prescribed by the Land Commission.

(4) Compounded arrears of rent shall be collected and accounted for to the person or persons entitled thereto by the Land Commission in accordance with rules made by them: Provided that the Land Commission shall when paying over the amount collected first deduct therefrom income tax and such sum to go towards costs of collection as the Land Commission consider reasonable and proper.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to move this amendment:—

In Sub-section (1) to add after the word "Act" the following:—"And any sum, including costs and expenses, which has been levied or recovered under or in consequence of any such proceedings begun, continued or enforced between the 28th day of May, 1923, and the date of the passing of this Act, in excess of the sum hereinafter referred to as 'compounded arrears of rent,' shall be deemed to have been overpaid by the tenant and shall be set off against the moneys to become payable by the tenant to the Land Commission in lieu of rent, as hereinafter provided, and the equivalent payment of the Land Commission to the landlord shall be proportionately reduced." This amendment is in order to give effect to the demand that I made on the Second Reading, and to the promise made by the Minister. Since the Second Reading things have not mended. On last Thursday I saw a judgment asked for and decree given on behalf of a landlord named McArthur against a tenant in County Dublin. On Tuesday last two bailiffs were sent into the house of a farmer named O'Neill, also in County Dublin, at the instance of a landlord named Caulfield. Two or three seizures of cattle have been made in County Tipperary against unpurchased tenants. I will not refer to the numerous cases that occurred previous to the Second Reading of the Bill, but they have been numerous and they have been all over the country, and I think it would be a national shame if this Legislature that proposes to deal honestly between man and man and section and section were to allow a few people of any particular section to get at the back of the Bill, to get in front of their neighbours, to get in front of the people of their class and do what I cannot regard as anything else but a crime against the State and a crime against the intentions of the Legislature. The Bill provides for nothing but to put these people on the same level as the rest of their kind, but they tried to evade the Bill. There is nothing unreasonable in this Amendment, and the promise of the Minister confirms us in this view. It is only just, equitable, and right.

Mr. HOGAN: I do not propose to accept the amendment in that form. What I said the other day, I think, in answer to a question by Deputy Gorey, was that if it became clear that there was a policy amongst the landlords to get in in front of the Bill, I would put in a provision in the Bill making it retrospective so far as rent was concerned as from the date of the introduction of the Bill. Retrospective legislation is absolutely unsound except in very special circumstances. I think the Dáil will agree with that, and it would be necessary to have very special circumstances, such as a general policy on the part of the landlords to negative the arrears provisions in the Bill, before we would be justified in legislating retrospectively at all. Now, there has been no such policy. First of all, the Dáil should remember that this section is only affected by decrees that have been enforced. It makes no difference to a tenant if a writ has been issued, or if legal expenses have been incurred before the passing of this Bill, provided that the decree has not been enforced. If a writ is issued, judgment marked, and everything ready for the enforcement, but no enforcement or execution takes place, and the Bill passes while that state of affairs is in existence, then the landlord only gets his compounded arrears of rent. There is no question of costs or expenses. Let us not confuse the issue by dealing with writs that have been issued, and judgments marked, and legal expenses incurred.

Mr. GOREY: We are not dealing with that at all.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy mentioned that he saw three or four cases where judgments have been marked.

Mr. GOREY: I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy quotes cases.

Mr. GOREY: I quoted one particular case where judgment was marked. I quoted another case where the bailiffs were sent into a man's house, and I quoted two other cases where cattle were seized. I quoted only one case where judgment was marked.

Mr. HOGAN: So I am right, the Deputy did quote a case where judgment was marked. I am entitled to disabuse the mind of anyone who has not had the advantage of Deputy Gorey's knowledge on this subject that these provisions are not affected in any way by proceedings that have not been executed, by the fact that writs have been issued and judgment marked, provided that they have not been enforced. Let us stick closely to the decrees that have been enforced. I have returns that in 75 per cent. of the counties not a single decree for rent has been executed. The Deputy knows that. He will not contradict that, and he is capable of a good deal of contradiction at times. I am sure if I looked into the figures I could say more than 75 per cent., but I will put it now at 75 per cent. There have been only one or two decrees executed on an average in other counties. I think Galway is the highest, and there were seven there. I suppose there are at least 1,000 cases where rent is due for the last two years. Let us be fair to landlords. I do not say what their reasons were, but as a class they have not executed decrees. That is a fact, and the talk about execution of decrees and putting the farmer out of his home, all this loud talk that would give the impression that evictions were taking place all over the country, has simply no relation to the facts.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. GOREY: Nobody said evictions were taking place.

Mr. HOGAN: They are not, and what is more, all this loud talk as well about what the farmers would do if we tried to execute decrees does not impress us a bit. Landlords have not tried to execute decrees, and there is no use blustering about it. We will not discuss the question of what we would do if we tried. It would lead nowhere. It is absolutely unsound to say that a man should not take advantage of his legal rights while these legal rights are in existence. A man is entitled to take advantage of his legal rights while they are in existence, and a man is not entitled to assume that every Bill that goes before the Dáil will be passed. As a general principle I think that is sound. I hope a good many Bills will be introduced into the Dáil between this and the disappearance of the Irish nation from the face of the earth that will not be passed, but the mere introduction of a Bill does not hold up a man's rights at all, and as a corollary from that it is unsound to legislate retrospectively. We cannot close our eyes to the fact, and I want to put this seriously to the Dáil in the interests of justice, that we are dealing at least with about 10 per cent. of landlords who are pulling the devil by the tail, who are in an extremely bad way, who perhaps are owed two or three years' rent, and who I know as a matter of fact, if the mortgagee came down on top of them—and the mortgagees have a great many inducements to do so—and forecloses he gets the whole estate, and he probably makes a bit out of the sale of the estate. Many of the mortgagees are fully alive to that, and everyone here knows as well as I do that at least ten per cent. of the landlords who have not a penny, and whose mortgagees are pressing them, are in a desperate position, whatever the reasons may be. That is the present position, and I think it is only fair to assume that the small percentage of decrees that have been executed have been executed by landlords of that sort. That is only a fair assumption.

Mr. GOREY: It would be, if you did not know the facts.

Mr. HOGAN: Let the Deputy give us different facts. You may get a landlord who will execute a decree out of pure cussedness. I am talking about the general body of landlords who have not executed decrees as a body, and where they did execute decrees it is only fair to assume that they did it absolutely under compulsion of their own creditors, and that they had no alternative but to let in their mortgagees to foreclose and get the estate. Hence, all the equities are not on one side, if you take the facts and leave out the question, for the moment, whether the landlords have even an academic right to their rents—take the circumstances as you find them. Any fair-minded man—even Deputy Gorey himself in his cooler moments—will agree with me that there is a certain amount to be said on both sides in all the circumstances, in view of the fact that so few decrees were executed, and in view of the fact that there are so many landlords absolutely on the rocks. Now, on the other hand, though I am doubtful of the wisdom and justice of doing it, I will go this distance with the Deputy—I will agree that any rent paid since the introduction of the Bill should be adjusted and should be appropriated towards the payment of arrears under the Bill. I will not agree that the costs should be recovered. This is purely a bargain, and I put it forward as a bargain. The landlord who had to execute his decree did not get ready money, and it is not such a hardship upon him. Let us take a case, say, where the rent is £100, and that that has been recovered. The arrears would be £75, so that that sum of £100 can be appropriated towards a year-and-a-quarter instead of a year. It would not mean payment in money; but to recover the cost from the landlord now, in a great many cases, would really be looking for blood out of a turnip. So I go this far with the Deputy—and I think it is a fair proposition, in all the circumstances—I will agree to accept an amendment in this form:—

“ Any judgment or decree obtained in any proceedings against the tenants of a holding to which this Act applies for the recovery of rent or for the recovery of the holding for non-payment of rent after the 20th day of May, 1923, shall be vacated, and if any rent, or arrears of rent, shall have been levied or recovered under or in consequence of any such judgment or decree in excess of the sum to which compounded arrears of rent would have otherwise amounted, the amount of such excess shall be set off against the moneys to become payable by the tenant to the Land Commission in lieu of rent as hereinafter provided, and the equivalent payment by the Land Commission shall be proportionately reduced.”

That leaves out the costs, and deals with the rent only. It is a sporting offer, and I hope the Deputy will accept it.

Mr. GOREY: This may be a sporting offer, put forward by the Minister on behalf of the landlords who have sent out these writs, but there is nothing sporting about it for the people against whom the writs have been issued. The Minister began by telling us that if it was the policy of the landlords to issue these writs he would accept the amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: To execute their decrees, I said.

Mr. GOREY: If it was wrong as a policy, how can the Minister justify it in the case of the individual? If it was wrong for the landlords, as a body, to take this action, how can it be right for the individual to do so?

Mr. O'CONNELL: When does it become a policy?

Mr. GOREY: If the policy is wrong, the act of the individual is wrong, and therefore cannot be justified even by the flippancy of the Minister. To my mind the Minister is merely clapping on the back the individual landlord who has enforced his writ. He has done more; he has actually issued an invitation to all the landlords who have a judgment marked to enforce that judgment between this and the time the Bill becomes law. He is really issuing an invitation to the landlords to go on and enforce their writs and that at least they would get their costs.

Mr. HOGAN: The solicitor would get the costs.

Mr. GOREY: It does not matter who would get the costs, because the costs do not begin to mount up until the Sheriff goes out. I want to have the Minister's reasons as to why the individual is right, and the general body of the landlords wrong. The Minister made the statement that the issuing of writs did not operate in 75 per cent. of the cases. We have only 26 counties, and in the counties of Cork, Wexford, Carlow, Kilkenny, Meath, Tipperary, Galway, Dublin and Donegal writs have operated. It does not matter if the Sheriff had not to go out, but I can produce Sheriff's letters and threats, and the Minister can produce some that I handed to him. It is perfectly true that in these counties writs have been made good, even though the soldiers were not actually called out to assist in their execution; the writs were made good by terror and threats. It is true in the case of one landlord that he was driven by his creditors to take action, and it was about time that the creditors drove him. That was the case of Leader in Cork.

Mr. HOGAN: That is the man who keeps greyhounds.

Mr. GOREY: No, he trains grey hounds. In Kilkenny, Wexford, Galway, Carlow and Tipperary the writs were made good by landlords who were not in want, but they did it through pure cussedness and malignity. I admit that the Cork case was a pressing case, but none of the others were. I have made myself acquainted with the particulars in all these individual cases, and I can say that the Minister's contention about creditors pressing falls to the ground absolutely except in the Cork case.

The Minister has made an offer to adjust the rents, but what about the costs? The costs, once the soldiers are sent out, are practically in all cases much in excess of the reduction that the tenants would get. In almost all cases you would have a small rent with big costs. I repeat that, except in the Cork case, the making good of these writs was done through pure malignity and cussedness. This is the sort of thing that the Minister claps on the back, the class of individual landlord who has created chaos in the country for generations, and who, because of his actions in the past, has made it necessary for the Government to introduce a measure of compulsory land purchase. That is the class of individual who has been the curse of this country for generations. I am not satisfied, nor are my people satisfied, with the amendment which the Minister has suggested we should accept. I hope Deputies in the Dáil who represent agricultural districts in this country will not follow the Minister's lead, but will speak out on behalf of the people they represent. I propose pressing my amendment to a division, no matter what alternative amendment the Minister may bring in.

[Mr. Gorey.]

Mr. LYONS: If Deputy Gorey presses his amendment to a division, it is my intention to vote for it. At the same time I would like to remind the Deputy and his Party that when the Bill giving the Sheriff power to bring out the military to execute decrees against tenants for the arrears of rent was going through this Dáil, they voted for it. It was only yesterday they gave their support to what is known as the Flogging Bill, and now they speak as if they regretted having done so. I think Deputy Gorey's amendment is an honest one, and for that reason I intend to support it. I stood up merely to remind the Deputy, in case he should forget it, that he voted for the Bill which gave the military power to go out and seize cattle. I am sure he regrets that now.

Mr. DOYLE: I regret extremely the attitude taken up to-day by the Minister for Agriculture. Listening to his speech to-day and to the speech he delivered on the Second Reading of the Bill, one would be almost inclined to think that it was not the same man who was in it at all. In my opinion, his speech to-day is an invitation to the landlords to do their utmost against the tenants. The landlords actually have the machinery ready, and it seems to be an invitation to them to put it in motion against the unfortunate tenants. On the last day he more or less told us that he would bring in a clause somewhat on the lines of the amendment put forward to-day by De puty Gorey, but, judging from the speech he has just delivered, he wants now to get the whole lot of the landlords throughout Ireland to enforce their decrees.

Mr. HOGAN: What I suggested was that I would accept an amendment by Deputy Gorey if it proved to be the policy of the landlords to execute decrees and get in before the Act. I said that in these circumstances I would make the terms of the Bill retrospective as from the date of its introduction, and that is exactly what the amendment I have read does. I have not been guilty of any deceit, as, I think, has been suggested.

Mr. DOYLE: I never mentioned the word "deceit." You say you would do that if it proved to be the policy of the landlords. From my experience, a considerable number of them have made it their policy to get writs executed.

Mr. HOGAN: How many of them?

Mr. DOYLE: I did not interrupt you. I say that many landlords are getting writs executed in several parts of Ireland. Deputy Gorey gave the Dáil several examples. In my opinion, the arguments of the Minister for Agriculture put forward in the Dáil to-day will be a great incentive to landlords to execute the decrees they have broadcasted all over the country. I do not care what the Minister himself may think, but his attitude to-day towards this amendment is altogether different to what it was on the Second Reading of the Bill. He has put up the case of the impoverished landlords from the North to the South, but he never mentioned the cases of the impoverished tenants—not a single one. I say, with all due respect to his impoverished landlords, that there are many tenants vastly more impoverished than the landlords, and they have got absolutely no way of making a living. The depressed condition of the agricultural industry for the last two years has left many a tenant in a very impoverished state indeed. I do not care how hard set a landlord may be, his position cannot be near as bad as that of an unfortunate tenant. I am certain you would find very few landlords lying hungry in nooks and corners around Dublin, but I can assure Deputies in this Dáil that there are many tenants in that position.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I think a very fair case has been made out in favour of this amendment by the Deputies on my right. I have listened carefully to the reasons given by the Minister for Agriculture for his refusal to accept the amendment, and I must say they do not convince me. He has stated that if he discovered it was the policy of the landlords as a body to get in before the Act he would take measures to prevent that. I confess that is all the more reason why he should take those measures. If there were only two or three, or even a dozen, who must be the very worst of the landlords, that is all the more reason why they should be restrained, and why they should not be allowed to get the benefits. There are some benefits to be got—benefits which the more decent of the crowd refuse to take advantage of. I think that is all the more reason why Deputy Gorey's amendment, as it stands, should be accepted.

Mr. WILSON: I must confess that I read into the Minister's speech, and I generally read aright, that his statement here in the Dáil carried costs. I read that into it, and I saw a letter from a very high-class solicitor to tenants telling them to tender their rents, less 25 per cent. At the top of the letter the Minister's statement was quoted, to the effect that the amount claimed would include costs. I have here a case where one and a-half year's rent was collected, and the costs amounted to £60. If the landlords through the country begin to collect these rents, and act as in the cases I have mentioned, the costs will really amount to as much as rent. Having regard to what was said on the Second Reading, and having regard to what the solicitor read into the Minister's statement in the Dáil, which was quoted in the letter I referred to, that costs were included, I think a very good case has been made for Deputy Gorey's amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the case made by Deputy Gorey and his friends is a convincing one, and is also a very moderate one. After all, the object of this Bill has been before the Dáil for quite a long time—long before the 28th May—and where actions were taken and costs incurred on processes up to the 28th May, that must have been done with the intention of getting an advantage over the tenants before this Bill came into operation. They knew the Bill was coming, and knew it would be compulsory. They knew it would be compulsory, provided they did not agree, ultimately. They knew there would be compulsory purchase in the absence of formal agreement, and that to me is pretty convincing that when a landlord adopted the policy of proceeding in the Courts he was trying to take advantage of the interregnum. Now, it may be that the Minister does not care to legislate retrospectively. That is what he has said, and he has a very good precedent, but there is no good reason why in this case the principle of the moratorium could not have been enforced. I think Deputy Gorey's amendment ought to be supported, and I propose to vote for it.

Mr. HOGAN: I have seldom listened to as much patent humbug as I have heard from the Farmers' Party this evening. I heard Deputy Doyle get up and work himself into a passion, and more or less suggest that I was running away from the terms I had promised some time ago. I think the whole tone of Deputy Gorey's speech was to that effect also, but the climax was reached when Deputy Wilson got up and said he read into my statement an intention on my part of including costs. Now, I will take the Dáil into my confidence. I discussed this matter with the Farmers' Party. I discussed it with Deputy Gorey, and I told him, not once, but twice or three times, that I would not include costs in any retrospective legislation if I accepted such an amendment. So that all these mock heroics, all this simulated anger, is mere bluff. It would suit me to get up and talk about half-starving tenantry, like Deputy Doyle—there is nothing so easy—the poor fellows that are lying in corners and I do not know what other places he mentioned, and who have not the price of next morning's breakfast. I could do that as well. Every member of our Party could get up and carry out the same performance and, I suppose, get the same advantages from it. I do object to patent humbug of that sort after I had discussed this amendment and made it perfectly clear that I was not going to accept an amendment including costs.

Mr. WILSON: The Minister never said a word to me about that—absolutely never.

Mr. HOGAN: That is quite correct.

Mr. WILSON: I had one of the most eminent solicitors in Ireland reading this statement, and he said that that would carry costs.

Mr. HOGAN: That is quite correct. I did not see Deputy Wilson, but I discussed it with Deputy Gorey.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of explanation, I contend that what the Minister has said is an absolute falsehood.

DEPUTIES: Withdraw.

Mr. GOREY: I withdraw the word "falsehood," but it is not true.

Mr. HOGAN: I do not know whether that is in order.

Mr. GOREY: When I stand up I will give it a flat denial, and I will give an explanation.

Mr. HOGAN: Is the Deputy entitled to state that what I said is untrue?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: It would be better if the word was not used.

Mr. GOREY: What word will I use to express a fact? If the Minister will supply me with a word to express a fact I am ready to use it.

Mr. DAVIN: Secret diplomacy.

Mr. HOGAN: A terminological inexactitude. I will leave it at that. I will not enter into the question any further. I will leave it to the Dáil. I am inviting the landlords to go ahead, notwithstanding my statement that "Any judgment or decree obtained in any proceedings against the tenants of a holding to which this Act applies for the recovery of rent or for the recovery of the holding for non-payment of rent after the 20th day of May, 1923, shall be vacated, and if any rent, or arrears of rent, shall have been levied or recovered under or in consequence of any such judgment or decree in excess of the sum to which compounded arrears of rent would have otherwise amounted, the amount of such arrears shall be set off against the moneys to become payable by the tenant to the Land Commission in lieu of rent." That is the invitation to the landlords to go ahead. If Deputies think that is an invitation to landlords to go ahead I am sure I could not convince them. But the plain meaning of it is, and the intention is, that any rent that is recovered now will be adjusted later on, and the tenant will get the credit for anything which he has paid over and above what he should have paid under the Bill. I made the point before, and I make it again, that only an extremely small proportion of the writs that have been issued have actually been executed. I had the lists from the Sheriffs, and I read them out to Deputy Gorey and other Deputies at a meeting which I had with them. Deputy Gorey is as good a judge as I am, having seen these returns, as to what the exact proportion is. I have not them with me at the moment. The returns I had at that time were dealing not with writs issued or writs that had been executed since the 28th May, but writs that had been executed this year. Only an extremely small percentage were executed, and in most of the counties no writs had been executed at all. So there is no question about it. There was no policy. As a matter of fact, in spite of all these mock heroics and of all these appeals for the poor impoverished tenants, for whom I have just as much sympathy as the people who talk so loud, there has been no such policy. That is the fact. That is the truth, and it is right that the truth should be stated even where it does not suit. It is a fact, and every man who thinks out the question for himself and looks at the question squarely and does not deceive himself about it, knows it is a fact that the likelihood is that in the few cases where writs have been executed they have been executed by landlords whose mortgagees have been pressing them. That is a fact, and any amount of mock heroics will not hide it, or any amount of talk about the impoverishment of the tenants will not hide it. I do not know what we ought to be afraid of. I do not see any reason for it. The time has passed when it was necessary to get up and do a certain amount of tub-thumping. If we want legislation passed we have our own Parliament now; we are not dealing with an English Parliament with a Tory majority. We can pass any Act we like. There is no occasion to make misstatements in order to get an Act passed—none whatever. The fact is, the truth is, the equity of the case, if anyone cares to look at it, is this, that it is only right to assume that in the few cases where writs have been executed it is by reason of the fact that their mortgagees have been pressing these particular men. These two facts, apart from any histrionics, bear examination, and I invite any Deputy who disagrees with me to examine them and to show that they are wrong. If they are wrong, then let us alter our policy, but if they are right let us base our policy on that. I say that these facts are facts, and are there. In order to meet the case—it is purely a bargain—I made an offer to Deputy Gorey to accept that amendment as a pure matter of expediency. Any Arrears Act is a matter of expediency. You cannot treat an Arrears Act in the same way that you would treat any other Act. The legislation connected with an Arrears Bill has always been based on a question of expediency. We all know that. We can chop and change and discuss that, and draw deductions from it, but that is the fact. We were trying to make a bargain, and when you are dealing with arrears you do it on the same principle that you make any other bargain. I want to make a bargain. The Government regard themselves here as the trustees of fair play in the matter, and to my mind the facts which I have stated represent fair play, and no amount of histrionics will alter the facts.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I am satisfied that the proposal that the Minister has made is one that, as far as possible, meets the equities of the case put forward on behalf of the tenants. I am sure that the Minister, like other Deputies here, is in sympathy with the claims put forward on behalf of the tenants. He has had that sympathy all through his career, as most of us here have had, and that sympathy would lead him to go as far as he possibly could, in the circumstances of the case, to meet the claims of the tenants. But, at the same time, he is confronted with the position of the landlord who is beset by incumbrancers and who is being pressed by them. In these circumstances he has got to consider the equities of the situation, seeing that the landlords are now being handed over to the State without anybody to look to for sympathy, and are supposed to be out of touch with things as they are at present in this country, and to have no means by which they can get their side of the case considered. Unfortunately in the past the landlords had all the weight and all the influence, and were able to order and direct in whatever way they liked the destinies of the tenants under their control. Now the position is reversed, and we are placed in the position which the landlords formerly occupied. The question for the Minister then is, is he to pursue the same policy that they pursued in the past? I think he cannot consistently or logically pursue that system, and I think he has gone as far as he possibly could. Undoubtedly some landlords who have not been beset by incumbrancers have pressed recently.

Mr. GOREY: And you stand up and defend them.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I know of instances in the county I represent where landlords have pressed without being forced by stress of circumstances. Unfortunately they are landlords who reside in another area that at present is not acting in co-operation with us, and who thought they saw an opportunity of giving vent to the sympathy which they have for that area and the aversion which they have for our area by acting as they did.

Mr. GOREY: And you backed them up.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I did not back them up. I believe that the proposal the Minister lays down, that from the 20th May any such action taken, decrees enforced, sought or obtained will be adjusted, and that whatever money is received on foot of these decrees will be on the condition that the tenants will get the full benefit as if they were not decreed at all, is a very fair interpretation of the situation, and that the Minister has gone as far as he could. We would all wish that landlords had not the power to execute decrees to recover money. There may be instances, however, where, unfortunately, it would be necessary. With a great number of tenants it has not been necessary, as they have done their best to meet their obligations, and it is only when force of circumstances prevented them that they held back. Some of the tenants unquestionably are deserving of our sympathy

[Mr. McGoldrick.] and consideration, but others amongst them are people who took advantage of the situation, and they are not in sympathy with us or with the nation. I think the Minister has steered a course so as to meet the situation all round. I think the farmers, if they persist in an extreme view, are not guided by the requirements of the situation or by the real merits of the case. That is not advisable in an Assembly like this, where every member should feel some sense of the responsibility that is placed upon him, apart from his predilections, and should take into account all the circumstances and not be guided by one side only. I think the Minister has met the case in a very fair and reasonable way.

Mr. GOREY: I have only one regret in connection with this debate, and that is that the Minister and I have two distinct views or recollections of our interview on this matter. It is true that I met and talked to the Minister confidentially.

Mr. HOGAN: Not confidentially. I met a deputation, but there was nothing confidential about it. Otherwise I would not state it here.

DEPUTIES: Withdraw.

Mr. GOREY: I will not withdraw. I have heard the words "secret diplomacy" flung across by Deputy Davin, from whom we are in the habit of having remarks flung at us.

Mr. DAVIN: On a point of order, I did not fire anything at the Deputy.

Mr. GOREY: We had a talk with the Minister about this matter of having the Bill made retrospective with regard to over-payment, and also with regard to costs. If no other member of the Farmers' Party or the Unpurchased Tenants' Association accepts responsibility, I will accept responsibility. I have spoken to the Minister about it.

Mr. HOGAN: On a point of order, it might be well to clear this matter up. Deputy Gorey used the word "confidential." I want to make it clear that I am not in the habit of revealing confidential conversations. I am quite sure he did not mean that. Deputy Gorey, and I am sure other Deputies, as well as members of the Farmers' Party know that I met a deputation from the Unpurchased Tenants' Convention, and discussed this question with them without any reserve of any kind and without any confidence.

Mr. GOREY: Quite right. It was representatives of the Unpurchased Tenants, and not representatives of the Farmers' Party that met the Minister. The Minister never gave me a flat denial about the question of costs.

Mr. ROONEY: We want to make it quite clear that we had no interview with the Minister.

Mr. GOREY: The most the Minister said was that he did not think it would be fair to preclude men from taking advantage of the law that they would be entitled to take. He thought the question of costs would be extreme. I thought I convinced the Minister that he should adopt a reasonable view of including the costs. I was convinced when proposing this amendment that he would have accepted it, not only for over-payments, but for costs also. When I put it down I was not inspired by extravagant statements or wild claims. I brought the amendment up to the most reasonable point, and that was the date of the introduction of the Bill. That should be sufficient warning to any landlord, whether he was encumbered or whether he was driven by creditors or by those who lent him money. I did not make any extravagant claim, but confined myself to the last possible date, May 28th, which this could date from. I have no regrets or recantations to make as to the attitude I took up with regard to the Public Safety Act. What I did then I would do again. Our Party would not question this matter at all, only to make their position clear. Deputy Lyons probably was not here at the time, or I do not think he would have referred to the subject. We hear too much about impoverished landlords. A good many Deputies talk for political reasons, and not on the merits of the case. I am surprised that men who know so much about the circumstances should go out, including Deputy McGoldrick, who has now gone to the Lobby. Probably other Deputies will come back and vote on the Division after listening to the speeches beyond in the bar.

Mr. HUGHES: I think that statement should be withdrawn. This thing is going too far.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I think you ought to withdraw that expression.

Mr. GOREY: I will withdraw the remark about the bar.

Mr. HUGHES: A statement of that kind should not be made here. The Deputy should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. GOREY: I say that Deputies who are going to vote should be here to listen to the arguments. There is 100 per cent. of our Party here.

Mr. HUGHES: It should be said in a decent way.

Mr. GOREY: It does not really matter about the way. We have been listening to too much of this kind of machine talk, when Deputies who hear nothing of the debate come in and vote.

Mr. HUGHES: They know enough.

Mr. GOREY: They do not know enough.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Order.

Mr. GOREY: If the Deputy will conduct himself so will I.

Mr. HUGHES: I know how to conduct myself, and when I am finished with Deputy Gorey he will know how to conduct himself. I will not take lessons in manners from him.

Mr. GOREY: I am not a bit impressed by the argument of the Minister about these landlords, because with the exception of one man I know that they are not impoverished. I have personal knowledge of the facts. A certain section of these landlords go and take advantage and enforce these decrees after the introduction of this Bill. Why should they be let off scot free, and why should the others be in a worse position? Why should one law apply to the men who have executed decrees and another law apply to the men who have not? The men who have executed these decrees are the cream of the bad ones. If this is a question of costs, it is a big thing for some tenants, because you have the most vindictive of the landlords—men like Dobbyn, of Waterford, men who have gone into the Bankruptcy Court and heaped costs upon the tenants, which is quite different from going into the Civil Courts. These are more serious matters perhaps than the Minister considers. But the facts are there; I do not think that we are unreasonable in this amendment. As a matter of fact, I think we brought it down to the last date to which we could bring it down. It is absolutely reasonable. It is not for political reasons we are pressing this amendment. It is for pure justice. A certain element in the State has endeavoured to evade the Legislature, and we ask the Dáil to penalise them for that meanness and for endeavouring to get at the back of the Bill and the back of the common law. I do not think we are unreasonable. These men did what they did with their eyes open. I do not think that it is just that they should be permitted to evade the law. It is not reasonable. It is not for the purpose of politics that this amendment has been put up; it is in the interests of justice between man and man that I press this amendment.

Mr. ROONEY: I do not think that there is anything unreasonable in this amendment or anything that ought prevent the Minister from accepting it. There is nobody knows better than he does the position with regard to the farmers and agriculture. You have it in the evidence that has been put before us in the Agricultural Commission. If you take up Stubb's Gazette you will find lists of farmers there, and you have lots of the tenants in a more impoverished state and unable to meet their liabilities than the landlords. There was another case made by the Minister that there were only a few cases of tenants in different districts in which seizures had been made. Of course, there were only a few seized, but these would be seized to intimidate the remainder of the tenants in the districts.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I was not here when Deputy Gorey was speaking, but I have been informed of the friendly references made by him. I must say that I do not measure my sympathy for the tenant farmers of Ireland, or my knowledge of the land question, by all that was said by the Deputy who has blatantly given forth on his right to pronounce upon the capability of any other Deputy here, or upon his right to do as he thinks proper in the interests of his constituents. With regard to Deputy Gorey's references to visits to certain places—

[Mr. McGoldrick.]

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

There is no necessity to revert to that.

Mr. CORISH: Are we debating the Land Bill, or is it something else we are debating?

Mr. MCGOLDRICK: I am making a reply to Deputy Gorey on a reference, I have been informed, he made.

Mr. GOREY: Not about you.

Mr. DAVIN: On a point of order, the Deputy who is speaking now is referring to a matter which happened when he was not here. Is it right that he should go into that?

Mr. MCGOLDRICK: I have been represented, I understand, as having known about the position of the impoverished landlords.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

I think it better to let the matter drop, because any reference the Deputy made that was uncomplimentary has been withdrawn by him.

Mr. MCGOLDRICK: I wish to say that I do know about the impoverished condition of the landlords as well the tenants, and Deputy Gorey knows them too as well as I do. He knows the value of investments and how they have depreciated. His sympathies are like our own, with the tenant. My sympathies are with the tenants too, but that does not compel me to overlook all things else. I have to consider all the merits of the case. I consequently stated that I believed the Minister has met the situation in a way that seems to me to be just and equitable, and in that way I am prepared to accept the Minister's recommendation and to vote against this amendment of Deputy Gorey, seeing that it is not in any sense proportionate to the equities of the case at the moment, and that it cannot have any chance of being accepted.

Mr. HOGAN: Apparently there has been considerable misunderstanding about this matter, and, possibly, other people may be in the same case as we have been. I certainly never believed that I had given the impression to anybody—I am not talking now about the Dáil but outside—that we would not only recover from them any rent which they had recovered, but that we would recover the costs as well. However that impression may have got abroad, it is a revelation to me that it did. To meet that case I will make a slight modification. I will make another offer. I will change the date from the 20th May to this date. Everybody will have sufficient notice after this debate.

I will alter it to read as follows: "Any judgment or decree obtained in any proceedings against the tenants of a holding to which this Act applies, for the recovery of rent or the recovery of the holding for the non-payment of rent, after the 3rd July, 1923, shall be vacated, and if any sums shall have been levied or recovered under or in consequence of any such judgment or decree, in excess of the sum to which compounded arrears of rent would have otherwise amounted, the amount of such excess shall be set off against the moneys becoming due."

Mr. GOREY: That will be worse still.

Mr. HOGAN: It gets in any sum recovered, either for rent or costs, as from to-day's date.

Mr. GOREY: If the Minister will change the date in regard to arrears from the date of the introduction, and the date of the costs incurred as from to-day, it would be better; as it is, he is taking away more than he is giving.

Mr. HOGAN: I am not.

Mr. GOREY: We could not accept that alteration. It is between those days nearly all has been done.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy is perfectly free to refuse it, as I am free to refuse any amendment. My suggestion will have the effect of taking in any rent paid, or any costs, as from this date, and that will be set off against the rent becoming due as compounded arrears of rent.

Mr. GOREY: In other words, what has been recovered in excess would still remain with the landlord before to-day?

Mr. HOGAN: Yes, he has from today. That is to meet the point that some of the Deputies made, that this was an invitation for landlords to go ahead and execute decrees.

Mr. GOREY: If the Minister will allow the original wording of his amendment with regard to rents recovered in excess of what is mentioned to stand in the Bill, and the recovery of costs to date from to-day, then he will meet the situation fully.

Mr. HOGAN: I can do that.

Mr. GOREY: Then I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think this motion ought to be pressed to a division.

Mr. GOREY: I would press it if I was not in danger of losing the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: Chance that on the next reading.

Mr. GOREY: If I was not afraid I would lose the amendment, I would press it very quickly. I would ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: I wish to divide the Dáil on this motion.

An Ceann Comhairle, at this stage, resumed the chair.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 19 has not been put. Deputy Gorey, I understand, desires to withdraw it.

Mr. JOHNSON: The position, if I may say so, was that Deputy Gorey agreed to withdraw the amendment on the promise of a counter proposition. He asked leave of the Dáil and the Dáil is not unanimous in granting such leave.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then I am afraid I must put the amendment.

Mr. GOREY: In that case, I propose the amendment.

Mr. MILROY: The Deputy who proposed this amendment asked the leave of the Dáil to withdraw it, thereby breaking the new Coalition, I am sorry to say. Must it not now go to a division in order to obtain leave to withdraw?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I do not think we can have a division on the question of withdrawal.

Mr. MILROY: If the Deputy asks the leave of the Dáil to withdraw, surely the feeling of the Dáil must be taken on whether he can or not?

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Is there any provision in the Standing Orders which makes it necessary to have a majority vote for permission to withdraw an amendment?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No. What really is asked for is general agreement for withdrawal. That has been the practice all the time both in the Dáil and in Committee. If it is desired to withdraw a motion which has been discussed, there should be general consent, or else the matter should go to a vote.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Gorey put a certain amendment which was debated, and I made a suggestion which he saw his way to accept. I have proposed to put that as an amendment, and was prepared to put it in a few minutes. Now, the position is that Deputy Gorey proposes to go ahead with the amendment.

Mr. GOREY: I cannot now withdraw. The explanation as to why I did withdraw was that I did not want the amendment defeated, and have the Section stand as it was.

Mr. JOHNSON: The position, as it appears to me, is that the Deputy has convinced me, at any rate, of the necessity of this amendment as it stands. If the Deputy withdraws it, I propose to move it, with permission. Inasmuch as there is not general agreement for withdrawal, that is the position that is created. Therefore I desire there should be a vote taken.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment in the name of Deputy Gorey has not been, and cannot be, withdrawn under the circumstances.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 20; Níl, 36.

Tá.

Donchadh Ó Guaire.
 Seán Ó Duinnín.
 Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
 Tomás de Nógla.
 Liam de Róiste.
 Tomás Mac Eoin.
 Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
 Liam Ó Bríain.
 Tomás Ó Conaill.
 Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Eabhróid.
 Risteárd Mac Liam.
 Liam Ó Daimhín.
 Seán Ó Laidhin.
 Cathal Ó Seanáin.
 Domhnall Ó Muirghoaí.
 Risteárd Mac Fheorais.
 Mícheál Ó Dubhghaill.
 Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.
 Domhnall Ó Broin.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
 Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
 Uáitéar Mac Cumhaill.
 Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
 Séamus Breathnach.
 Pádraig Mac Ualghair.
 Seán Mac Garuidh.
 Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
 Pilib Mac Cosgair.
 Domhnall Mac Cártaigh.
 Éarnán Altún.
 Sir Séumas Craig.
 Gearóid Mac Giobuin.
 Liam Thrift.
 Eoin Mac Néill.
 Liam Mac Aonghusa.
 Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
 Pádraic Ó Máille.

Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
 Piaras Béaslai.
 Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
 Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoid.
 Christóir Ó Broin.
 Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
 Proinsias Bulfin.
 Séamus Ó Dóláin.
 Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
 Liam Ó hAodha.
 Éamon Ó Dúgáin.
 Pearlar Ó hAodha.
 Séamus Ó Murchadha.
 Liam Mac Sioghair.
 Alasdair Mac Caba.
 Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
 Éarnán de Blaghd.
 Unseann de Faoite

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. HOGAN: I beg to move that we report progress.

THE DAIL RESUMES.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Progress is reported. When is it proposed to sit again?

Mr. HOGAN: To-morrow.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE DAIL.

SANITARY CONDITIONS OF JAILS AND BARRACKS IN WHICH PRISONERS ARE DETAINED.

The PRESIDENT: I move the adjournment until Wednesday, 4th July, at 3 o'clock.

Mr. EVERETT: I desire to draw the attention of the Dáil to the insanitary condition of the jail in Wicklow. On account of rumours the Wicklow Council directed their Sanitary Officer to inspect the gaol, and admission was refused. The reason that I bring forward this motion is that my town is a seaside resort, and we are afraid of an epidemic. I also wish to state that the most friendly relations exist between soldiers in the barracks and the civilians in the town, as also between the prisoners and the Governor and soldiers in charge. In the interests of all concerned, an inspection should be made of the gaol, and those grievances should be removed. This jail had been condemned by the British military authorities for over fifteen years. The windows and doors are broken, so what must the inside be like? The prisoners are confined, three in each cell. Seventeen out of 103 have mattresses. The remainder of the prisoners in the cells are sleeping on the bare floor, and it is only within the last week that some straw has been brought into the prison. A number of these prisoners have been ill owing to the stench coming from the bottom cells. One is in hospital from double pneumonia, and if a death takes place it will not be in the interest either of the Government or the townspeople. The happy relations hitherto existing will cease to exist if a crisis takes place. This being a seaside resort, the people are dependent on the holiday makers who come to Wicklow. As this is very warm weather, and such a number of prisoners are confined, the matter is a very serious one. I am not aware that any Act has been passed which denies the right of the Sanitary Authority to visit the prisoners. As to the relationship between the prisoners and the Governor, it is of the best. The prisoners cook for themselves, but, unfortunately, the food that sick prisoners require is not available. There are seventeen prisoners in very ill-health at the present time. An appeal was sent by the Commandant of the prisoners to the Governor for some extra exercise in a larger space, and also they asked for more lavatory accommodation. The water supply is insufficient. They also appealed for milk for the sick patients. The doctor, who visits the place, resides in Gorey, and at the present time a doctor should give a daily visit when the number of prisoners is so large. Out of 103 prisoners one is in hospital suffering from pneumonia, 14 are ill in bed; 24 are ill, but not in bed, and about 30 are generally unwell.

These prisoners have appealed to the Governor, but up to the present they have received no reply. While we hold the Ministers here technically responsible they may not be aware of those complaints generally, and I am sure when they are brought to their notice they will have a number of prisoners removed to a more suitable place. There are 30 of the prisoners in—merely for their political opinions—and the majority of this 30 have signed an undertaking over two months ago. One man is up to 70 years of age, and there are amongst them, young boys. I ask that those men should be released as they have signed their undertakings, and as there are no charges against them. The space for exercise is a very small one for men able to take exercise. It is 45 yards by 25 yards for a number of prisoners. We appeal to the Ministers to have an inquiry into the whole matter, and it would not only be in the interest of the prisoners, but in the interest of the town. As I have explained, we are of opinion in Wicklow that if something is not done immediately an epidemic may break out. The Medical Officer of Health said to the prisoners that he could not do much for the men who were either lying in bed or lying on the floor. He suggested to give them iodine and something else. On the 25th June an appeal was sent from the Commandant of the prisoners to the Governor.

What is bad for the prisoners is equally bad for the soldiers on guard, because they have to live in the same cells. I believe the Governor, to show his friendship, and because of the good feeling that existed between the soldiers and prisoners, gave up his own bed to some of the prisoners who were ill. The following letter was sent by the Commandant:—

I enclose herewith a list of men who are now ill in bed and who are otherwise unwell, and I must draw your special attention to the following, which require immediate remedy, as, otherwise, I can only inform you that very many men will have their health permanently injured, if detained under existing conditions, for a very much longer period.

He goes on to explain about the lavatory and all the other things that are in a bad way. There are no washing facilities, and all the conditions tend to ill-health. I am sure it is not the intention of any man—though people outside may say otherwise—or of the Government, to injure the health of any prisoner while in their charge. I would ask them to have inquiry made in this case and to have the grievances remedied, not alone in the interests of the prisoners, but in the interests of the civil population. I am referring only to the jail in my own constituency, and when I bring forward the question, I trust that the wrongs will be righted, and that the prisoners will have little to complain of in a short time. It is impossible to improve the conditions of the jail. Under the British system prisoners were not asked to remain there over-night. If the trial of a prisoner did not come off before the County Court Judge in time, he was brought to Dublin. We do not want to treat prisoners in a way in which criminals were not treated under the British law. We should treat them in a way which would enable them to forget the past, so that each one would work for the benefit of the country in the future.

Mr. LYONS: I wonder whether I am in order or not, or whether the Deputy raised this question only in connection with the gaol in his constituency?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: He raised the question generally, but he confined himself to Wicklow.

Mr. LYONS: I would like to voice my opinion with regard to the visits of sanitary officers to the different jails. In the town of Athlone there were about 900 prisoners at one time. I see the Minister for Defence shakes his head at that which gives me the impression that he disputes the figure. In any event, there were between 700 and 800 prisoners, and the space for exercise was not sufficient. The washing facilities were inadequate. General McKeon got the prisoners to be a little more careful with themselves, and through doing so, probably they have succeeded in improving the conditions. However, I would like that the Sanitary Officers and the Visiting Justices should be allowed to inspect all these prisons and see how the prisoners are being looked after. They are prisoners of the Army Council, and the Army Council must be responsible for them while under their charge. If any of these men contract disease through neglect, bad food or bad sanitary arrangements, and if they die, then there is nothing else but to accuse the Army authorities. I do not want to say harsh things, because I anticipate that in the near future the prisons in Ireland will be empty. I certainly want the Minister for Defence to release as many of those prisoners as possible.

[Mr. Lyons.]

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Everett did not give notice of that.

Mr. LYONS: On the question of their health, they cannot possibly be looked after in a prison where there are such numbers of them. They could be much better cared for at home. I would ask the Minister for Defence to see that visiting justices, sanitary officers and outside doctors should be allowed to visit all the jails.

Mr. EVERETT: I hope I made myself perfectly clear that most friendly relations exist between the prisoners and their guard. They have no complaint but on the question of food. In other places the treatment may be different, but in Wicklow Jail the food is of the best and their relationship with the guard is of the very best. They only complain that the food is too coarse for sick men.

Mr. CORISH: As I understand Deputy Everett, while he may have the idea of the welfare of the prisoners in mind, he has brought this matter up, not so much from the prisoners' point of view, as in the interests of public health. Some time ago a discussion took place here on which some of us requested that the sub-sanitary officers in the various towns should be allowed into the barracks. I am still of opinion that that is absolutely necessary in the interests of public health. Apart altogether from the prisoners, the soldiers in the different barracks are living under intolerable conditions. I know that in Wexford the medical officer attached to the barracks resigned because of that fact.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: "The sanitary conditions of jails and barracks in which prisoners are detained." Now, Deputy Corish succeeded himself one evening in getting a very strict ruling on this question, and if it hits Deputy Corish now he must be satisfied.

Mr. CORISH: I quite understand that, but if the soldiers and prisoners are in the one barracks, I think I can raise this matter. I think if I can prove that, in consequence of prisoners being housed in barracks, it is not beneficial to the health of the soldiers, I will be in order in raising it. Some time ago, as I said, the medical officer attached to the Wexford unit resigned because some of his representations in connection with this matter were not listened to, and the sanitary arrangements were not, according to what he thought, in the interests of public health. Another doctor was appointed and there was no more about it. If the sanitary officers appointed by the councils were permitted to visit barracks and prisons this sort of thing would not go on, and I say again that it is in the interests of public health that these people should be allowed in. During the period which we have gone through, officers and people in charge of barracks were not able to give the attention to these matters that they required. That is quite understood. But if you have visits from sanitary officers these things could be attended to. The English Government used to permit their barracks to be visited by the sanitary officers, and I do not see any reason why the Irish Government, which ought to be more interested in public health, would not do the same. I would press this point again and hope that the Minister for Defence will reconsider the matter from this point of view, and allow the sanitary officers to visit the barracks.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: I would suggest to the Minister for Defence that if he released all the prisoners it would relieve congestion in the various jails and he would save himself a lot of trouble.

General MULCAHY: There are such a large number of prisoners that we are necessarily restricted in our accommodation for them. The Government has spent a very large sum of money in providing suitable and adequate accommodation. If there are any places in which prisoners are housed in anything like unsuitable conditions it is principally as a result of the shortage of accommodation produced by the destruction carried out by the prisoners themselves in other places. Wicklow Jail would not be used for prisoners but for that particular destruction. We are quite aware of the unsatisfactory condition of things existing in Wicklow Jail. The matter has been under special observation and investigation by us, and it is not proposed to continue it as a prison. An idea of the shortening of accommodation for prisoners produced by destruction by prisoners is given by the figures which I have here. In Newbridge damage to the premises was £8,500; at Maryborough damage to the extent of £5,500 was done; at Mountjoy to the extent of £9,000, and at Hare Park Camp to the extent of £130.

As I say there are places where the present conditions are not ideal. Just as the conditions in Wicklow are not ideal for the prisoners, neither are the conditions in Wicklow ideal for the troops. We want to give as little as possible unnecessary inconvenience in taking buildings from the people generally, and Wicklow Jail being there, we have made the best use of it up to the present, and it has not been satisfactory, but we could have provided better accommodation for the prisoners there if this particular destruction had not taken place. We are, at the present moment, clearing out for the purpose of handing them back to the civil authorities certain of the jails. For instance, Waterford Jail has been entirely cleared out yesterday. The greater portion of Mountjoy has been evacuated also, and it is proposed to clear in a very short time Limerick Jail. The necessity for putting the Ministry of Home Affairs in a proper position for dealing with their particular side of the question has delayed rather longer than we anticipated the clearing out of Wicklow Jail, but the conditions there are kept under close observation, and it is anticipated it will be cleared shortly. On the question of the general sanitary and other conditions in prisons, a very considerable amount of propaganda—and propaganda is described in Irregular documents as the art of spreading the truth, “truth” underlined—has been carried on as regards the present general conditions. I feel it necessary, therefore, to place before the Dáil, as this particular question has arisen here, the report by the International Committee of the Red Cross, who sent a mission here recently, and who were permitted any facilities that they required to visit any of the prisons. I propose to put the whole document on the Records of the Dáil, but there are certain extracts I would like to read here now. The Report states that:—

“As a result of numerous representations made to it on the subject of the treatment of prisoners in Ireland, the International Committee of the Red Cross, appointed MM. Schlemmer and Haccius to go to Dublin to obtain authority from the Irish Government to institute an inquiry of a purely non-political and technical nature into the position of the said prisoners.

“The delegates of the International Committee of the Red Cross were received by Mr. Desmond Fitzgerald, Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Walshe, Secretary, and General Morrin, Director of Army Medical Services. A mutual understanding was arrived at as to the nature of the facts to be investigated, and as to the character of the intervention of the International Committee of the Red Cross so as to determine the exact lines in which the activity of the Delegates should be directed.

“Considering that the character of the International Committee of the Red Cross confers on it the right and the duty to intervene when an appeal is made to it, and when the principles of humanity, which should be recognised by the belligerents as much during wars as following them, are publicly involved; considering also that the nature of the International Committee of the Red Cross, and the experience gained by it offer every guarantee of the impartiality of its inquiries, and of the manner in which all leanings towards any but purely humanitarian considerations should be avoided—the Irish Government decided to grant the authority requested by the International Committee of the Red Cross, and to accord to the Delegates every facility for visiting the prisons and internment camps of the country and of making a report on the treatment of those detained in them.

[General Mulcahy.]

"M. Schlemmer then returned to Geneva in order to report on the result of the negotiations, and on the welcome accorded by the Irish Government to the application of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

"M. R. Haccius was delegated to visit the prison camps from the point of view of their organisation and accommodation, and of the sanitary conditions of the internees. We give the following extracts of information from the report submitted by our Delegate:—

"The total number of prisoners and internees is about 11,500 men and 250 women. Our Delegate visited the principal camps comprising a total of 7,369 prisoners. The treatment of these prisoners is devoid of all hostile spirit and the general principles adopted by the 10th International Conference of the Red Cross are observed. The Government refuses the status of "prisoners of war" to the prisoners, but in reality treats them as such."

"The Delegate particularly draws the attention of the Committee to the fact that nowhere did he find a wounded or sick prisoner left without medical treatment. On the contrary, he found everywhere a carefully organised medical service. The serious accusations made on this subject appear to him unfounded.

"The Delegate was not able to visit the prison at Kilmainham where 250 women are detained, but has no reason to believe that the treatment there is different to that adopted at Mountjoy. Thirteen of those prisoners had been on hunger-strike since the day of their arrest to obtain their release or immediate trial, and not as a protest against the prison regime. This fact is, moreover, verified by their written statements. The Delegate did not consider it his duty to insist on getting into touch with these prisoners, fearing that his intervention, misinterpreted, would only encourage them to persist in their attitude, and give rise to a new case of strike. During his sojourn three of these prisoners were released.

"The buildings of the old 'North Dublin Union' are in the course of alteration for the reception of those detained in Kilmainham. These buildings, with the surrounding gardens, will fulfil all desirable hygienic conditions.

"The instructions given by the International Committee of the Red Cross to its Delegate exclude certain representations and sworn inquiries bearing on individual complaints. It is a fact that searches have taken place in various private hospitals, but the working of these hospitals has not been interfered with. There are grounds for the complaints of overcrowding in Mountjoy Prison.

"The complaints regarding the prohibition of correspondence with prisoners' families, sanitary conditions, and food in the camps are unfounded."

With regard to certain of the camps visited, in the case of Tintown, where the number of prisoners is 3,200, they reported that there are 72 men in the infirmary, and 25 men in the surgical hospital, that "there are no epidemics, but that a certain number of men who arrived lately are affected with scurvy, and have been isolated from the rest while being treated. Wash houses with water supply in the enclosure of the camp." The Mission reported on a visit to the internment camp at Gormans-town, that there are 1,500 prisoners there, and they found that there were 7 men in hospital, and that there were no epidemics. In Newbridge where there are 1,969 men they found there were 39 in the infirmary, and that each prisoner was provided with an iron bed, pillow, mattress, sheet and two blankets, such as in Tintown. They found that there was a great difference in the neatness of the rooms, and that this entirely depended on the prisoners themselves. In the same way in Mountjoy, "the interior service of the prison was kept clean by the prisoners themselves. Soap and materials supplied. There is a vast difference in the cleanliness of the cells. Some internees scour the floor, and keep their blankets well beaten, while others take no care to keep their cells clean."

Generally, they found that the greatest possible attention was paid to the conditions under which the prisoners were housed. The food, and the manner in which the food was cooked and provided, was good, and the sanitary accommodation was so adequate as to overflow the use to which the majority of the prisoners actually put it. In respect of Kilmainham, the Red Cross Delegation did not visit it, but as late as June 15th we find ladies writing from Kilmainham, and saying: "I almost forgot to tell you I am enjoying this place fine, and don't care how long it will last." Another writes: "Don't take any notice of the Bantry people's talk—this is a great place."

Mr. JOHNSON: Were these sent to the Red Cross Delegation?

General MULCAHY: No.

Mr. JOHNSON: How did you get them?

General MULCAHY: From Tralee Jail we get a prisoner writing: "I am having a grand time here, I don't want any underclothing, we get fully rigged out here, last week got a new suit, new boots, shirts and socks. So we are well away now." From Tintown a prisoner writes on the 25th June: "This is a fine healthy place, I was never in so good a form before." From the same place another prisoner writes: "We had a great day yesterday, we had all sorts of sports that you could mention, you could not have a better day outside, and we do have a dance now every evening—the best of gas."

Mr. EVERETT: He did not write from Wicklow.

General MULCAHY: From a Galway prisoner: "The Governor has told me just now that you heard I got beaten in Cleggan, but there wasn't a hand left on me." Another writes from Galway Jail also: "I am very well, T.G. I never felt better in my life. I could honestly declare that I am a stone heavier than the day I came to Galway. You know we have no work to do, and we are well treated in the line of everything to eat." I thought it necessary that that information should be put before the Dáil lest the making of conditions in Wicklow Jail—the matter of the general sanitary and other conditions in our prisons—would be misleading either to the Dáil or the public generally.

Mr. EVERETT: I ask the Minister to say would they be provided with beds while they remain there, and also would the patients be given milk, and a visit from a doctor daily. These are sick patients. We can prove they are sick, and it is no laughing matter. If any Deputy were in the same position he would not see it as a joke.

General MULCAHY: Any matter like that which is wrong in Wicklow Jail is fully under notice, and is getting attention.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.50.

DÁIL EIREANN.

DE CEADAIOIN, 4ADH IÚIL, 1923.

(Wednesday, 4th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar a 3.10 p.m. Bhí an Ceann Comhairle Micheál O hAodha 'sa Chathaoir.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

STEAM-ROLLING IN KILKEE.

MICHEAL O DUBHGHAILL asked the Minister for Local Government if he has received a written complaint, dated the 6th June, 1923, from certain ratepayers in Co. Clare, stating that in the course of steam-rolling the main street of the tourist resort, Kilkee, grass sods, earth, and town refuse have been rolled into the surface along with ordinary road material; whether such practices are not calculated to create a prejudice against steam-rolling, and if the Minister is now prepared to grant the independent inquiry by one of his road experts asked for by these ratepayers.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. E. Blythe): The complaint referred to was received, and inquiries were immediately made in the matter. The County Surveyor denied that the materials mentioned in the question had been used for binding, and stated that they were merely placed on the roadside for removal. His attention was drawn to the fact that dry rolling and use of earthy soil or clay were not conducive to good results. The County Surveyor admitted a shortage of water for use in road works, but promised to set that matter right and to obtain fine screenings or other suitable grit for binding and to cease using clay.

Complaints of the nature indicated should be made to the Co. Council in the first instance, as they are responsible for the proper execution of road works.

It is not considered that an inquiry as suggested is necessary.

GOREY DISTRICT HOSPITAL.

RISTEARD MAC FHEORAIS asked the Minister for Defence if he is aware that the Matron of the District Hospital at Gorey, Co. Wexford, has received written notice from local military officers, to the effect that the hospital must be vacated by 25th inst.; further, if this action has been authorised by Headquarters, and, if so, in view of the inconvenience that will be caused, will he take steps to have it countermanded.

General MULCAHY: The position at Gorey is that the Workhouse buildings are occupied by the military forces as a Battalion Headquarters, and have been so occupied since October last; that a small portion of the building is occupied by three or four Nuns in charge of the District Hospital, which contains four patients. At the original time of occupation the Nuns were given to understand that the whole premises would be required for military purposes, and they were allowed remain for some time on the understanding that they were securing suitable premises a short distance away.

It is necessary that Gorey be a military centre for an indefinite period, and in the concentration of troops which is going on at present it is found necessary to occupy the whole of the buildings, and it is found increasingly undesirable to have three or four Nuns occupying portion of a building which is a military establishment.

The Order at present issued is premature in that it has not been authorised from General Headquarters as required by regulation, but assurances cannot be given that the whole of the premises will not be required for occupation in the immediate future.

Mr. CORISH: Can the Minister say how long more the Sisters will be left in the hospital and also if it is proposed to provide alternative premises? I think a promise of that kind was given.

General MULCAHY: Actually the whole of the premises are required at once, but the matter should have come to General Headquarters for consideration as to the date up to which the Nuns could be allowed to remain there. That matter will have to be considered now. The buildings are actually required now, I understand from the responsible officer, but due consideration will be given to the Nuns in asking them to remove themselves from the premises. It should be understood, however, that as long ago as October last the Nuns were advised it would be necessary to surrender portion of the premises occupied by them sooner or later.

Mr. CORISH: Would it be true to say that when orders were served in October last by the local Officer, representations were made by the Saint John of God Nuns to the Minister for Defence, and that he promised to provide other accommodation?

General MULCAHY: I do not think so.

Mr. CORISH: Still I would like to ask the Minister what it is proposed should be done with the patients there. Gorey is supposed to have 27 beds in the hospital, and certainly the Nuns should not be removed.

General MULCAHY: In the concentration of troops going on, it is found necessary to occupy the whole of the building. The actual position is that the matter has not been referred to General Headquarters and authorised by them. We now have that as being the opinion of the local Officer as to his local requirements, and the points raised by the Deputy now are matters that will be taken up by this Department with the Local Government Department, or whatever other Department is concerned with the finding of alternative accommodation.

Mr. CORISH: Would the Minister give an undertaking that the Nuns will not be removed until other accommodation is provided?

General MULCAHY: I cannot give an undertaking at the moment.

Mr. CORISH: Can the Minister say how long the hospital will be left in occupation of the Nuns?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Minister has already answered that question.

A GLENGARRIFF CLAIM AGAINST

TOMAS DE NOGLA asked the Minister for Defence whether he has received any accounts from Mrs. Hannah O'Sullivan, Perrin (?) Hotel, Glengarriff, for rent for a house which has been occupied for some time by military, and for compensation for damage which has been done to the premises; and if so, whether the claim is being inquired into, and how soon may she expect payment.

General MULCAHY: No claim has been received at General Headquarters or at the Office of Public Works, which Department is responsible for the payment of rent of premises occupied by the Army, from Mrs. O'Sullivan in respect of rent for a house in Glengarriff occupied by troops or of compensation for damage caused during occupation. Local inquiries are being made in the matter, and when the claim is received its consideration will be expedited.

An amount of £34 11s. 10d. was paid on the 14th June, in full settlement of a claim for £53 10s. 8d., received from O'Sullivan, Glen Hotel, Glengarriff, in respect of meals, beds and provisions supplied during the period 11th to 23rd December, 1922

QUESTION ON ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. JOHNSON: I propose to raise a question on the adjournment as to the relative position of the Minister for Defence with other Ministers in respect to public buildings when Military emergencies do not require such action.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question concerns the relation of the Minister for Defence to the public generally in regard to the occupation of buildings. Perhaps Deputy Johnson would give the Minister some more information.

Mr. JOHNSON: The whole matter arises out of the question raised by Deputy Corish, and I think more information is requisite. It is impossible to get that information by supplementary question and answer, and I think the matter can be better discussed on a motion on the adjournment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is to say the whole question of buildings at present in occupation by the military, or the right of the military further to occupy premises?

Mr. JOHNSON: It is the latter. I may say the point is, while one can appreciate the need of the Military Authorities having over-riding power over any other authority in time of war, that is not the authority they should exercise when military necessities do not compel them to do so.

[Mr. Johnson.]

DEPUTY'S CORRECTION OF NEWS-PAPER REPORT.

Mr. GOREY: I desire to draw attention to this statement that appears in to-day's newspapers with regard to the debate of yesterday. The paper states that I agreed to the suggestion from the Minister for Agriculture that arrears and costs were to date from yesterday. What I did agree to was that the question of arrears was to date from the introduction of the Bill, and the question of costs from yesterday. I think the Dáil and the Minister will agree that that is so.

Mr. HOGAN: That in fact was the amendment I suggested and with which Deputy Gorey agreed.

COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE. EARLIER FRIDAY MEETINGS.

The PRESIDENT: I understand that the Committee on Procedure has suggested that the Dáil should meet early on Fridays, and adjourn some hours earlier also. If that be the opinion of the Dáil I am prepared, with the leave of the Dáil, to move that the meeting of the Dáil should take place at 12 o'clock on Friday and adjourn at 5 o'clock. It means we will lose half an hour, but in order to enable members to get home there is no real objection in giving a half hour. I have not seen the report of the Committee on Procedure, but it has been put to me by more than one Deputy that a decision somewhat on those lines was come to. I do not know exactly what hour they decided to fix for the meeting of the Dáil, whether it would be 10, 11, or 12 o'clock. I think 12 o'clock will be a suitable hour, and if there be no objection I would move that the meeting should take place at 12 o'clock on Fridays in the future, and that we adjourn at 5 o'clock.

Mr. D. MCCARTHY: Five o'clock is too late for the country Deputies to catch their trains.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This is perhaps the most convenient time to get this matter settled, because if we do make a change in the hour of meeting on Fridays it would be well that the Deputies should have as much notice as possible of it. The Committee on Procedure discussed the question of an early meeting and early adjournment on Fridays. The Committee was unanimous, I think, in the idea that the meeting should take place earlier, and that the adjournment should be at 4 o'clock. I think that the view of the Committee was that an early adjournment is necessary, and that it cannot be later than 4.30, if members are to catch their trains. With regard to the time of the meeting in the morning they would leave that to the Ministers, as these would best know what the business would be.

Mr. MILROY: Friday is one of the evenings that is reserved for private business.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Committee were aware of that. Suggestions were made that the Standing Orders should be amended with regard to private business, and that the hours should be altered. Would Deputy McCarthy say whether 4 o'clock or 4.30 o'clock on Friday would be suitable?

Mr. MCCARTHY: Some of the trains go at 4.45 p.m.

Mr. F. McGUINNESS: The last train for Sligo leaves at 2.30. If we want to catch that train we cannot. We should approach the Directors to run a later train.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The President thinks that 12 o'clock is the earliest time to begin the business. Would 12 o'clock to 4 o'clock suit?

The PRESIDENT: Yes, and we can adjourn at any time you suggest.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If an earlier hour than 4 o'clock is required we would find it difficult to meet the Western Deputies.

Mr. MILROY: We could sit all night on Thursday.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Notice can be given now or to-morrow evening of the hour of meeting on Friday. Can we take it now that it will be arranged from 12 to 4 without an interval? Because if it is arranged I would like to circularise the Deputies who may not be here.

The PRESIDENT: I have no opinion upon that subject. It should be left to the Deputies. If the Deputies desire they could meet at 11 o'clock and adjourn at 2 o'clock for luncheon, but it would be scarcely worth it, to come back for one hour. I think everything considered, sitting continuously from 12 to 4 would be the best arrangement.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Well, that is settled—12 to 4 without any interval. We will not amend the Standing Orders. We will arrange, for the time being, that the meeting on Friday will be at 12 noon, and will conclude at 4. In that event 4.30 would be the latest hour for a meeting of the Dáil and private members' business will come on at 2.

The PRESIDENT: Yes, so that if they are not particularly interested we would be able to adjourn at 2.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: At present private business comes on at 6, and that allows 2½ hours. Now, it will be reduced to 2 hours.

Order made:—That, until otherwise ordered, the Dáil assemble on Fridays at 12 noon, and adjourn at 4 p.m. Private business to be taken at 2 p.m.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

LAND BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to move the following amendment to Section 16:—

In Sub-section (2), line 19, to substitute for the figures "1920," the figures "1921," and in the same line to substitute for figures and words "25 per cent." the figures and words "40 per cent.," and to make the consequential amendments throughout the Act.

This amendment to the section means to take two years' arrears into consideration instead of three years. It would also mean raising the 25 per cent. reduction to 40 per cent. This amendment is put up to meet the actual facts that obtain in the country. 25 per cent. on three years, if three years are to be considered at all, is really of no good to the unpurchased tenants of the country. The last three years have been three lean years. They have been three years when agriculture did not pay, and when agriculture could not pay considering the prices that were got for agricultural produce, and everybody who knows anything about farming knows that. The result is that the people who owe three years' rent have no money. But the small tenants in the West and the small tenants in the South, it must be apparent to anybody, have for the last three years carried on their business without profits. There is no surplus there. It cannot be got. I do not believe that with the most powerful machinery of the law you can recover it, because it is not there to recover. We propose to take two years only into consideration, and that these two years be subject to a 40 per cent. reduction. We also suggest that one of these two years be paid in cash, and that the other be added to the purchase money. For the moment I will say no more. Let the case develop.

Mr. DINNEEN: I wish to support the arguments of Deputy Gorey. I know from experience that in the Co. Cork, owing to the disturbance of the last three years that it was impossible for the tenant farmers to make their rent, and not only the tenant farmers suffered from the condition of things that prevailed, but very many landlords themselves, because they had their places taken over. I know cases near the City of Cork where tenants owed last year three years' rent, and the landlords came forward willingly and offered to take a half-year's rent and give them 40 per cent. on that half-year's rent and to take on future gales a reduction of 40 per cent. until the Land Bill be passed. I know very well that there are landlords in the Co. Cork who try to get their full pound of flesh. I know of a landlord who processed a tenant for 1½ years' rent, and the tenant has to pay every penny up to the last half-year, including almost £60 in costs.

Mr. DOYLE: I quite agree with the two Deputies who have spoken as to the necessity for the amendment. I agree with Deputy Gorey in his remarks about how hard hit agriculture has been within the past three years. There has not been anything got out of it; it is a non-profitable business as far as the last two or three years are concerned. To anyone engaged in agriculture there is no need to press home this fact. People know it to their own cost. As regards former land Acts, I do not think that under them three years' arrears were ever asked for. At a time like the present, when depression is so pronounced in agriculture, why should the tenants be compelled to pay three years' arrears? I think it is really more than any of the tenants who owe three years' arrears can do. There is no use in suggesting impossibilities.

[Mr. Doyle.]

I believe the Minister would be well advised to accept this amendment in its entirety. We are told over and over again that the tenants who are purchasing under this present Bill are going to be better off than the tenants who purchased formerly. I cannot see how that can be, no matter how I look at the provisions of the Bill. The tenants who are purchasing now will be hit to the extent of £300 or £400 more in the entire cost of their purchase money than the tenants who purchased 15 years ago. By the time the two annuities terminate the man who is trying to pay on a £100 rental, even taking the largest reduction the Bill offers (35 per cent.), will be several hundred pounds worse off than the man who purchased 15 years ago.

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE

(Mr. Hogan): If we could approach this question on the lines of considering that a certain man owes a certain sum of money, and ask ourselves what is the most favourable arrangement we could make for that man, it would be easy. If we could approach the matter on those lines it would be much simpler. If it were open to us to say: "He shall pay nothing," that would suit and would save us a lot of trouble. If it were open to us to say: "He shall pay one quarter or one half, or whatever fraction you like to take," there would be no difficulty whatever. In short, if we could simply consider the man himself, and consider no other circumstance of any kind—if we had that wide range of choice—there would be no difficulty in making arrangements. But this is another question that you cannot legislate about without taking into account all other relevant considerations. There was reference made to previous arrears Acts. The last was in 1881. I pointed out on the Second Reading, and I do not think that anybody who knows the fact will deny it, that there is a radical difference between the arrears problem of to-day and the arrears problem of 1881. I am talking now in general terms.

In 1881, or, to be more accurate, before 1881, and before the Act was passed, the tenant paid whatever rent the landlord liked to charge him for his holding, and practically all the tenants were rack-rented. There was nothing to stop the landlord from increasing the rent as much as he liked, and in a great percentage of cases the landlord took advantage of that right. The tenants were rack-rented—there is no doubt of that. The rents were higher. On the average they were more than 50 per cent. higher than they are at the present moment; and remember that they were higher notwithstanding prices have doubled. I do not say the profits have doubled, but prices have doubled. The actual figure before 1881 was considerably more than 50 per cent. higher than at present, after more than forty years and after the European War. The fact is that in 1881 the real reason for the Arrears Act was that the tenants were utterly unable to pay their rents—very high rack-rents.

You could not get blood out of a turnip, and the tenants could not pay. They were being evicted on a very large scale and, as a result of legitimate agitation in Ireland, the Act of 1881 was passed and the Fair Rent Courts set up. Since then most of the tenants have got two decadal reductions—most of the tenants with whom we are dealing—and the rent has been kept strictly within bounds. The present strike against rents was only indirectly a strike in regard to amount. It was really a protest against the fact that the tenants had not purchased. I think that is a fair statement of the case. The present strike against rent is directly, anyway, a protest against the fact of the non-purchase by the tenants.

Mr. GOREY: Not the real reason.

Mr. HOGAN: Not the only reason, perhaps, but that was the direct reason for this strike. It began in 1920, at a time when we could not complain that conditions were as bad as they are now, and when it began the reason, as expressed by the tenants through all their organisations, was the fact of non-purchase. That is the radical difference between this arrears problem and the arrears problem of 1881. Everyone in the country knows that, and everyone who has read the manifestoes and the utterances of the tenants' organisations will agree that that is the state of affairs. If the landlord is entitled to £67 14s. as the interest on the purchase money of this land, then he is entitled to something more in regard to arrears. If the figure of £67 14s. is right—

Mr. GOREY: It is not right.

Mr. HOGAN: We can argue that when the time comes, but if the figure is right then the landlord is undoubtedly entitled to something more on arrears. Whether you agree that it is right or not you must admit the principle that the landlord who has, until he gets this £67 14s., or whatever sum you like, to pay his own head rents and interests in full without any abatement, must get something more. You must admit that whatever annuity he gets as a result of the price he receives, he must get something more on arrears. During the last three years we had to face the facts that the particular landlords with whom we have been dealing had to pay their head rents. They had also to pay their mortgage charges. A man who owes interest to a mortgagee is in a totally different position from the man who owes rent to a landlord. Everyone knows enough about the country to understand that. The mortgagee has remedies easily enforceable, and there is no public opinion, and never has been any, against such enforcement. In fact they always have enforced, and they are ready to enforce, for the very good reason that nothing suits the mortgagee of an encumbered estate more than to foreclose. He will get the whole estate, and he stands a very good chance of getting more than his mortgage as the owner. He stands a chance of getting considerably more than his mortgage. The fact is landlords have had to pay their full rent and interest charges during the last three years and to do so without any abatement. They had to pay the usual rate during the war for a safe mortgage. That means 6 per cent., and it ran during the last three years. We are dealing with estates which are heavily encumbered; at least a very great proportion of the particular estates are heavily encumbered. If the landlord gets his purchase money, or £5,000 of these encumbrances attached to the purchase money, and if you take £100 of that purchase money which represents £100 owed by the landlord on foot of a mortgage, the position will be like this: On that £100 he gets $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., whereas on that £100 he is liable for 6 or 7 per cent.

Mr. GOREY: It must be a Jew he is dealing with.

Mr. HOGAN: He is liable for 6, or perhaps 7, per cent. to the ordinary Banking House, the ordinary Insurance Company or to the Jews if you like. He is in a position to get over that difficulty the moment he gets his purchase money, because he can pay off the capital money in bonds. Until he gets his purchase money he must meet those interests in full and you cannot ask him to remain from this date until the appointed day in the position of getting only $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. out of the rent, which is the same thing as out of the purchase money, and paying 6 per cent. on it. That is the reason why you must give more to the landlord, and why you must give a greater income to him in respect of arrears and payment in lieu of rent until the appointed day then you need to ask the tenant to pay afterwards. It is clear that in equity if X is the annuity, or half X is the income which the landlord is entitled to receive after the appointed day, after receiving his bonds, he must receive something more than X up to that date if he is to meet his rent and charges. I am using the letter X so as not to complicate the question. Whatever the price or annuities may be, he must receive more. We fixed the landlord's income at £67.14, and I daresay we will have a very interesting debate on that when we come to the question of price.

I have already defended it on the First Reading, and on the Second Reading. We fixed his income in respect of arrears and in respect of payment in lieu of rent until the Appointed Day, at £75. He is not going to get that £75 in full. The cost of collection will be deducted. The amount he will get will probably be nearer £70. We are leaving an extremely small margin—the margin between something like £70 and £67.14—to meet this big difference in outlay which the landlord has up to the appointed day.

[Minister for Agriculture.]

With regard to arrears, we have not been told why we should write off this extra year's arrears. It has not been suggested that during that year the vendor will be allowed by the owners of his head rents, and by his mortgagees to write off their interest. Everybody knows that they will do nothing of the kind. For that year he will have to pay his interest and his head rents just in the same way as he has to pay them for the two following years. In a great many cases he will probably have to borrow money for that purpose. As regards the tenant who has not paid any rent for the last three years, what has he done with the money?

Mr. GOREY: Squandered it on motor cars.

Mr. HOGAN: He should not have done that, but I do not think he did it.

Mr. GOREY: I do not think he did either.

Mr. HOGAN: He is not in the same position as if he had paid his rent every year. He has a certain amount of that money. He has paid nothing in respect of rent for three years—nothing whatever. The amount of money which he set aside for rent has not dissolved or evaporated. This is really a question of trying to do the fair thing. I know perfectly well that it is different to pay a lump sum down, and to pay the same sum by easy instalments over a period of three years. A tenant who has to pay £24 now can hardly pay it as rapidly as the tenant who had to pay £12 each year for the last two years. That is the reason we have given a reduction at all. We have given this 25 per cent. reduction, and in doing that remember we are putting these tenants who owed these arrears in exactly the same position as if they were paying annuity. Perhaps I am wrong in saying exactly the same position. They are really in a slightly better position than if they were paying annuity. The average reduction under the 1903 Act was less than 25 per cent.

Mr. GOREY: On Second Term rents.

Mr. HOGAN: On First and Second Term. We are dealing with First and Second Term now. We can get the returns any time.

Mr. GOREY: We are always asking for them.

Mr. HOGAN: They are on sale. The average reduction to First and Second Term tenants under the 1903 Act was something less than 25 per cent. We are giving this reduction now straight away in regard to arrears, so that the effect will be that from the year 1920 the tenants will be paying the same amount as if they had purchased. This is a question of a bargain. On the one side you have the fact that the landlord has to pay interest and has to pay his head rents, and on the other side we have to remember that the tenants who have to pay a lump sum down are in a different position from tenants who paid in instalments over a period of three years. We tried to strike a bargain. On the one side you have the very relevant consideration that you cannot afford to give the same reduction to the tenant as you could even in regard to annuity, because the interest the landlord must pay out of his rents is considerably more.

Take a tenant with two years' arrears. He gets 25 per cent. off each year. That is a half-year's rent written off, and remember that we have also written off any rent due before 1920. Now, that man has not paid anything for two years. It is not a great hardship on him to pay a year down. He got notice of that on the 1st May, when this Bill was introduced. And it is not a great hardship on him to pay a half-year between this day and the Appointed Day, as well as interest in lieu of rent, subject also to 25 per cent. reduction. The man who owes three years' arrears has saved more than that. He has saved an extra year. When we commenced collecting annuities there was no difficulty in collecting two years' annuities from tenants who had purchased. There was a certain amount of loud talk in the beginning, a certain amount of complaint about hardship, but they nevertheless paid up cheerfully. We are putting these men in exactly the same position as if they were purchasers. They will be paying the same amount as their neighbours who have purchased. The reduction we give in regard to arrears is exactly the reduction they would have got if they had purchased. I notice that the figure the Deputy has set down is 40 per cent. He has also made the same claim in regard to price. Now, I put it to him that, even admitting his own figure—which I do not admit—of 40 per cent. reduction in regard to price, is it fair in the circumstances to ask the same reduction in regard to arrears? Let us get at it step by step. I want the Dáil to examine the question and to say whether they think we should give the same reduction in regard to arrears as in regard to price. I would like to hear the Farmers' Party on that point. If they say we should give the same reduction I would like to hear their reasons. We must treat this question as a business proposition, and we must have reasons for what we urge. I would like to hear also why this extra year's rent should be written off, having regard to the fact that all the charges which the landlord must pay were running in this year. And then, why should the figure be 40 per cent.? I have explained exactly why we have fixed 25 per cent. I have shown that a 25 per cent. reduction leaves an income of £75, less the cost of collection. That would bring it down to about £70, and we have only about 5 per cent. to cover the high rate of interest which the landlord must pay, and in regard to which he can get no abatements and has no remedy until he pays off the capital.

MR. GOREY: Let me first deal with the last point raised by the Minister. Everybody who had any connection with the Convention of 1918 knows, from the figures put before that Convention, that the landlord's income of 100 per cent. was only nominal. His real income was about 75 per cent. The cost of collection, estate charges and bad debts amounted to 25 per cent. Seventy-five per cent. and, in a few cases, 77½ per cent. fairly represented what the landlord actually received net. In making this 25 per cent. reduction and collecting arrears for the landlord, you are putting him in the same position as he was before; nothing worse.

The question has been asked, what the tenants have been doing with the money that accumulated for the last three years. We know that the average valuation of unpurchased tenants' holdings through the country is from £10 to £15. It does not require any great stretch of imagination to realise the small amount of money that must pass through the hands of occupiers of these holdings and the small amount of profit they could have made in that period. In many cases there could have been nothing left. The tenant has to contend with the lean years, and we know the state of agriculture recently. I do hope the tenant has not gone down to Kilkee or Tramore for the week-ends, as some of us do. He has not, I think, squandered his money like that. The 1918 Convention and the 1920 Bill took two years arrears into consideration. That was by way of agreement between the two sides. In this Bill we are going outside of what the landlord agreed to in 1918 and again agreed to in 1920. There is a new line now being struck, and I do not know what is the reason. We have been also asked why we demand this reduction now. For the last two or three years we have not had normal times. We have not had facilities for marketing. We have not had a rail service. There is no use in shutting our eyes to these facts. The tenants could not get their produce to the markets, and some of it has been lying there for six or seven months. It is only during the past few months that it was got away in some districts. During all that time it was only a question of home consumption. The times were not normal. We are asked, why make a difference in respect of annuity and arrears? We have arrived at more or less normal times. Railway services are being carried on. We expect that in future years men will be able to do their business in a proper way. During the past three years they did not get a return for their work, owing to the conditions. We are dealing with certainties for the years to come. During the past few years there was no certainty in regard to a return for the work done.

We are not comparing the present position with the 1881 position. We are comparing it with the 1920 and the 1918 position, and when two years were agreed on in 1918 and 1920, certainly two years ought to be able to be agreed on in 1923. We cannot shut our eyes to these facts. We cannot get over them. The landlords' case has been put up very well. The condition they are in might be true; I am not in a position to dispute it. I know nothing about the landlords' end of the stick, but I do know a little about the tenants' end of it. I know that the average man in the country has very little return for his work. He had to live up to some kind of standard; not alone that, but he had to support an irregular army who were quartered on him for months—almost for a year—and who robbed him, who took away his food and everything he had, and who broke down his roads and bridges. It is not a question that he will not, but he cannot afford to pay. There were a few counties, such as Dublin, with easy access to markets and with a fair rail service. These might be in a favoured position; but if you go to the West or to South Leinster, they were living in a condition of almost impossibility. I want you to realise the tenants' position, and not be giving too much attention to the position of the landlord. Try to realise the position of both, and try to do justice to both. There is no use doing justice to one and injustice to another. I am not speaking on my own behalf or on behalf of any party, or on behalf of a few people. I am speaking on behalf of the whole 70,000 unpurchased tenants. I am taking the average man, and I do say with all sincerity that the Government will not be able to recover these three years' arrears. Another thing that I think I mentioned on the Second Reading: If you add a year's purchase or a half-year's purchase to the purchase money, it will be very serious. A half-year at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. will almost mean one or two years under the Wyndham Act, where the interest was, I think, $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., whereas it is now $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. You can very easily put a millstone around the tenants' necks in that way. Although the Minister has made a good case as regards the landlords' position, I do not think that he has made a case whereby he should make it impossible for the tenant in the future, or put him in an intolerable position, or put the country in the position that it will have to be security for his failure.

[Mr. Gorey.]

The PRESIDENT: Deputy Gorey puzzles me a little bit with some of the figures he has given. I take it, first of all, that the average rent that is paid by the tenant under this amounts to £10.

Mr. GOREY: Ten to fifteen pounds would be the average.

The PRESIDENT: The Deputy told us we were going to hamstring these men and make it impossible for them to live in the future, and prejudice the physique of the race if a year's purchase at £10 at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. be added to the rent. That sum of £10 at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. will be 9s. per annum. I do not know if I understood the Deputy correctly. Did he infer that that 9s. is going to prejudice the future of this country?

Mr. GOREY: I think that argument would work at the landlords' end as well as at the other.

The PRESIDENT: The position with regard to the landlord is that he has not got the money.

Mr. GOREY: Begin at something else, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT: I will take it another way. The Deputy states that there have been three lean years. I understand that 1920-21 was a lean year. I can give the Deputy painful evidence of the fact that it was a perfectly normal year. I do not know whether he questions the fact that it was a normal year.

Mr. GOREY: I question it.

The PRESIDENT: I know a particular case during the period where sixteen head of cattle were sold at 80s. per cwt. That is a fairly good price, and it is not evidence of the fact that there was a lean year there. The Deputy ought to be in a position to give us figures. If he makes the case, he is justified; if he does not make the case, he needs justification; and I am afraid in this case the Deputy will need more than justification.

Mr. GOREY: What time was it?

The PRESIDENT: The months of February and July. The sum in question was £420 for sixteen head of cattle; the price was 80s. per cwt. I say that was a perfectly normal year, and £100 rental in that year was made by the tenant. He profited by the fruits of his work in that particular period. In the normal course of events if it had not been for the interruption of the National movement he would have the money, and he would have paid it. If we then take the three years it is fairly obvious that there was that one year in which he was perfectly well able to pay that rent, and the sum according to this clause in the Bill for the three years is £225. Therefore, what he is asked to pay, if we are to take the Deputy's information that there were two lean years, is an average of £62 10s.—in other words, there is a deduction of £37 10s. in two lean years. The Deputy knows, I suppose, as well as anybody the force of the point that has been made by the Minister for Agriculture that mortgages have had to be met, that the interest has had to be met, and these three lean years that the Deputy has spoken of must have been exceedingly lean years for the landlord, and that, whatever the tenants' position was, the landlords, who did not get any rent for three years, must have been in a very precarious position. Some of these have a life interest only, and they benefit only to the extent of whatever these arrears amount to. As regards the Deputy's suggestion of a 40 per cent. reduction for two years and the other year to go, the sum of £120 that the landlord is to be paid for three years would be an actual reduction of 60 per cent. in respect of the three years. I suggest to the Deputy that he ought not to insist upon this Bill at all, that it would be far better value if he could get over three years, and at the end of every three years, say, we will compound the arrears by paying 40 per cent. reduction in respect of two years, and that will settle the case. There will be no necessity for the Bill.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I do not know anything much about the landlord's end of the stick, as Deputy Gorey calls it, but I have come across a little of the farmer's end of the stick in the ordinary course of my trade. I find myself occasionally called upon to advise some farmer who is purchasing a farm upon the title of the farm he is going to buy, and I have come across cases not before the war or in the early days of the war, but during the last twelve or eighteen months in which a farmer who owned one farm, so far from finding agriculture a losing business, was willing to purchase another farm on forty, fifty and sixty years' purchase of the annuity of the farm he was going to buy. Whatever the opinion one may form here of the farmers of Ireland, they are not such fools as to put enormous sums of money into the business that their own experience has proved to them to be a losing job. When you find any farm put up in this country for sale it is purchased at an enormous price by people who are in the same business and who want to continue it in a new farm, I do not think that the business of agriculture is quite so hopeless as Deputy Gorey would lead us to believe.

Mr. GOREY: You are talking about the graziers.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I am not talking about the graziers; I am speaking of the ordinary rich farms through the country. My business, so far as it goes, does not run in the grazing counties. I have very few clients, if any, in Meath or Kildare. So far as I get business from the country it mostly comes from the South and South-West. In the year 1920-21, this year that this amendment proposes to wipe out of consideration altogether, the deposits in the Joint Stock Banks in this country went up by twenty-three million pounds. There was one hundred and sixty-three millions deposit in the Joint Stock Banks at the end of 1920, and in 1921 it had gone up to one hundred and eighty-six and a half million pounds. The main increase in this case was in those banks which operate through the present Irish Free State, and that money was not the banking by landlords of exorbitant rents they had extracted from their tenants, because they were not getting anything. Therefore, that £23,000,000 came from somewhere. It did not come out of the landlords' pockets, and I do not think it came out of the profit of those industries that have not yet been started in the Saorstát, but that we hope now to see springing up. Looking to the sources from which that money came, the only place I can see it came from is this losing business of agriculture. Twenty-three millions, added to the one hundred and sixty millions that were already on deposit receipt in Joint Stock Banks, must have come from somewhere. Where could it have come from except from practically the only business that is carried on in the Saorstát, the business of agriculture? That is not a flea bite of twenty-three millions, because at the outbreak of the war there was only about sixty million pounds on deposit receipt, and the amount on deposit receipt since then has gone up from sixty millions to one hundred and eighty-six millions. Eighty-four millions of that has come in since [Mr. Fitzgibbon.] the year 1918, and that in the Saorstát must have come from agriculture and nothing else. Therefore, it does not seem to me, from the return of the banks, that the trade is a very losing one. In the year Deputy Gorey seeks to strike out of consideration agriculture was not the least profitable, because the increase during that twelve months was the biggest increase since the return of the Joint Stock Banks was first issued.

Mr. DINNEEN: In the year 1920 the harvest was late, and oats were sold in October by those who were fortunate enough to have it thrashed. Towards the end of that year prices began to come down, and they were down by a big percentage in February of 1921. Before May fairs could not be held, and by May certain classes of stock had reduced in price by half what they were in 1919 and part 1920. The cattle bought in the middle of 1920 had to be sold for 40 per cent. less than what they were bought for. It was the greatest slump in one year that the agricultural industry ever experienced in Ireland, and many energetic, industrious and enterprising persons came to grief and were unable to pay their creditors.

Mr. GOREY: I was very much struck by the President's speech and by Deputy Fitzgibbon's. Now, the President told us a nice little tale about sixteen bullocks that cost £4 or £4 10s. per cwt. I am not quite sure which, but there is no dispute certainly about the sixteen bullocks. Probably there were sixteen or twenty more where these sixteen came from. Now, the man that has sixteen bullocks and is farming in the ordinary way must have a huge farm. Probably they were three-year olds. Now, I do not think, when the President was referring to these sixteen bullocks, that that would apply to ten out of the seventy thousand unpurchased tenants in Ireland. He had some friend who was a grazier in Meath, or Dublin, or somewhere, who had these sixteen bullocks, and when he instanced this case he did not explain at all that this tale of the sixteen bullocks would not apply to ten out of the seventy thousand men we are discussing in this Bill. That disposes of that argument. Deputy Fitzgibbon talks about the huge reserves that were in the banks and that were accumulating in the banks, and no doubt he wants to infer that all these millions were put up by the seventy thousand unpurchased tenants with an average valuation of £15 a year. He wanted to infer that, and that the four hundred thousand purchased tenants in the country would have little to say to it. He wanted also to infer that the other interests, what is known as the "trade" in Ireland, and that all the other industries and professions had nothing at all to say to these millions. He wanted the Dáil to infer that all these millions were put up by these tenants, who were rolling in riches. Perhaps it would be nearer the mark to say that these millions were the portion that the purchased tenants made during the war, as compared with the unpurchased tenants, and that was made by the different businesses that were living out of Irish agriculture. There are a few trades living out of Irish agriculture

Mr. DAVIN: Guinness.

Mr. GOREY: Yes, there are a few trades: Guinness and other interests down from Guinness. Deputy Fitzgibbon made a very nice case for his friends, but I would be more impressed by his speech if he would put his hand upon half a million of all this money that was accumulated by these seventy thousand unpurchased tenants. If he could do any definite thing like that I would be inclined to listen to him with greater attention. Even if he showed me any figures I would listen to him. I really think the State will have to put up some millions to meet the losses that these people have suffered. He is talking about what 9s. in the year would mean to the average tenant. Now, the same argument applied to my friend the landlord. It will cut both ways.

The PRESIDENT: In the order I stated.

Mr. GOREY: When you come to talk about "bobs" like that you arrive at very little. The only point that is plain is that a few shillings mean a lot to poor men. It means the difference between existence and starvation. I will not say it means the difference between existence and comfort, for it never did. It is up to this Dáil and it is up to the Government on behalf of the nation to do what is right. We consider that they have not done what is right. We consider that where other agreements have been come to in recent years between two parties concerned—where the landlords have agreed to take two years into consideration—that it is beyond the limits of justice and fair play to take three years into consideration. I made that clear in previous speeches, and the point has not been answered.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: If I might personally explain, I would say it is only fair to the unpurchased tenants to say that I did not charge, and I did not intend to be understood as charging, that all this money had come from them. My argument was that a great deal of it must have come from agriculture in which they were engaged.

The PRESIDENT: The Deputy has not dealt with the question whether or not the year 1920-21 was a lean year. That was my case, and the reason why I introduced the particular bullocks to which he takes exception. He states that it is on this matter of 9s. a year that the danger really lies. Nine shillings a year means 2d. a week. If the Deputy can explain to me that seventy thousand unpurchased tenants are necessarily going to be starved by having to bear this 2d. a week, I am prepared to reconsider my position.

Mr. DOYLE: The President is talking about 1921.

The PRESIDENT: No, 1920-21.

Mr. DOYLE: I think it was for 1921 you quoted us the story of the bullocks.

The PRESIDENT: 1920-21.

Mr. DOYLE: You spoke of selling in February and July.

The PRESIDENT: No, I spoke of a purchase.

Mr. DOYLE: When?

The PRESIDENT: February and July.

Mr. DOYLE: As far as the year 1921 is concerned, I say it is one of the leanest years that the farmer ever met in Ireland. I know that the few pounds he made in the war was all lost by him in 1921. He talks of cattle in July, 1921, being worth £4 a cwt. Why, there were not cattle in July, 1921, worth £4 a cwt. With all due respect to the President I say that, and I would like to see the quotations from the cattle market for July, 1921. It was a time when fat cattle could not be sold. I have reason to know well that in July, 1921, fat cattle could not be sold. Moreover, the Minister for Agriculture has told us that he is putting the unpurchased tenants for these three years on a par with the purchased tenants by giving them this reduction of 25 per cent. That is so for three years. What about the 15 years previous, when they were paying 25 per cent. more than the purchased tenants? Where a tenant's rental was £100 he paid in those fifteen or sixteen years £300 by reason of not being purchased. The reason why we are asking 40 per cent. on the purchase price is that these tenants may be put on something of a par with the tenants who purchased previously. Of course, the Minister made a statement all through that his prices were going to put the tenants in a better position than those who had purchased. I cannot find how they are going to be in a better position in any shape or form. He also dwelt on mortgages. I do not think that the tenants are responsible for that. I do not think that the tenants should be called on to pay exorbitant prices because the cost of living of the landlords has gone up.

Mr. HOGAN: I am sorry Deputy Gorey did not tell us where in the 1920 Bill his provision about the two years' arrears appears. I have the Bill here. There is no such provision in it about limiting the arrears to two years.

Mr. GOREY: I can show you the agreement between the two parties.

Mr. HOGAN: I have the Bill here, and I would be anxious to see it.

Mr. GOREY: I was one of the men who made the agreement.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy stated that the 1920 Bill allowed the landlords two years' arrears. I have the Bill here, and that is not in it.

Mr. GOREY: I made the agreement. Do you deny the agreement?

Mr. HOGAN: I know nothing about the agreement that the Deputy made with the landlords.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Before we go any further with this I would point out that it is a question of the 1920 Bill, not any agreement made by Deputy Gorey.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy knows the agreement is not the point. There was no arrears problem in 1920. There were derelict holdings where rent was due, but there was not ten per cent. due all over the country. There was no arrears problem, comparatively. The problem we have now is not a problem in the same sense as that of 1881. If farmers were making £10,000 a year on a £20 holding some farmers would owe some landlords arrears. The tenants who owed rent for years and years came in and paid it during the war, in the good years. Deputy Doyle admitted that this twenty-five per cent. reduction brought present tenants purchasing under this Bill to the position of tenants who had purchased under the 1903 Act.

Mr. DOYLE: For three years.

Mr. HOGAN: For three years; that is exactly what I said. If you reduce tenants' rent by 25 per cent., you are putting them in the same position as if they were paying an annuity for three years. That is the fact. He explains that this 25 per cent. was made during the war. On a £20 holding, 2s. a week is £5 a year. That was during the war.

Mr. DOYLE: It was during twenty years. We had not the war for twenty years.

Mr. HOGAN: The war lasted from 1914 to 1918. I would like to ask how many hens would lay £5 worth of eggs per year. One good hen would do it.

Mr. GOREY: The Minister's hens. I want to put in a claim for a sitting of the Minister's eggs. I have the first claim.

Mr. HOGAN: One good hen, let us be strictly accurate, would lay the difference, £5 a year, and £15 a year on a £100 holding was simply the price of one very bad bullock during the war.

Mr. DOYLE: It was during fifteen years previously. I did not mention the war period alone.

Mr. HOGAN: Please allow me to approach the subject in my own way. I am talking of the year 1920-21. Deputy Gorey said we should keep away from shillings and pence. I can quite understand that, because he knows perfectly well that this rent and arrears question is an artificial one. Rents at present are the smallest part of a farmer's outgoings.

Mr. GOREY: Not the small man.

Mr. HOGAN: The small man especially. There are 70,000 holdings at £12 a year for the average holding. It is the smallest part of his outlay. We all know this rent question has attained an importance out of all relation to its economic importance, and I can quite see the reason why Deputies Gorey and Doyle would like to keep away from the figures. Take the £100 holding. The loss to the tenant who did not purchase during the war was £15 a year, the price of a very bad yearling during the war. Take the average holding, the £12 holding, the difference in the year between the annuity and the rent is £3. On the average £20 holding, a first-class economic holding, the difference is £5 a year. It is on those figures that all those diatribes are based. We ought to treat it as a business proposition. We ought to remember if we take over estates as they stand that it will affect the country's credit if we do not pay a price both for arrears and rent itself which will be at least the price which a banking institution would give for these. If we are prepared to sell the country's credit, and if now the time has come when we must sell and injure the country's credit, let us at least get value for our money. This advantage of £3 on the £12 holding, and the £5 on the £20 holding, and £15 on the £100 holding is hardly worth it. That is a serious aspect of the problem which the Dáil would do well to take into account. Is it worth while to injure the country's credit for such trivial advantages to one particular class?

Mr. McGOLDRICK: Níl puinn agam le rádh. I think that this amendment of Deputy Gorey's, which we are asked to accept here falls very short of the requirements of the nation. He states here that he represents the Unpurchased Tenants, and that it is in their interest the Bill is made. If that is so, he is equally bound to add to his amendment that the rent paid during all those three years by those unpurchased tenants should be refunded. I think, in equity, he cannot dispute that contention, and that is the claim he puts before the Government. That is obviously the case he represents.

Mr. SEARS: There are two points I should like to put before the Minister with regard to the question of arrears. The first is that whatever those men had done with the land for the last three years, there was one thing I would ask them not to believe—that is, that those men had that amount of money in the bank or have it at their command. The people in their circumstances found the money slipping away from them, and it is not possible for them to hold it. Another point he should give more consideration to is made by Deputies here, and that is that fairs and markets were for a while held up, and they suffered considerably. Taking those two points into consideration, I think it would be very difficult for tenants who are three years in arrears to meet the case. If he could, I would like to make a greater demand upon him; but, in view of the case he has made, and of the fact that his whole aim in this Bill is to strike a fair bargain, I would suggest that in connection with those three years in arrears he would take off half a year of the purchase money. That would to some extent serve to meet their case.

Mr. HUGHES: I think the suggestion put forward by Deputy Sears is an admirable one, and perhaps one that would meet the case made by Deputy Gorey to some extent. If Deputy Gorey sees his way to accept that suggestion, I think pressure could be brought on the Minister to accept it. I am sure, if it is the unanimous opinion of the Dáil that that should be done, I would ask the members of the Party on my left seriously to consider that proposition, and perhaps it would end the controversy over the arrears.

Mr. O'DONNELL: I am an unpurchased tenant myself, and I speak for many other unpurchased tenants. I do not believe there is any problem with regard to arrears of rent during the period mentioned, because those were years when people had a flush of money, and they ought to pay up the arrears. If we passed this amendment as it is, it might be brought to bear upon us later. We recollect the time when we were fighting the Local Government Board, and when a certain organisation sent round organisers to tell the people to pay no rates.

Mr. ROONEY: We will be at it again very soon.

Mr. GOREY rose——

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Gorey has already spoken three times. Perhaps he would not like to hear how often he has interrupted. However, I will allow him one more speech.

Mr. GOREY: I am impressed by the helpful suggestions of Deputy O'Donnell, and I have also listened to the helpful suggestions of Deputy McGoldrick. I know they were meant to help us in this amendment. Deputy Hughes and Deputy Sears have taken a very sane and helpful view. I am sorry, representing the people I do, that I cannot accept that view. The people I represent have adopted a certain attitude; I am only their instrument, and have to carry out their instructions. One thing that appears from this is that it affords a great ray of hope, especially to the West of Ireland, and I do think the West has a chance of getting on the right track and on the road to prosperity. I have heard it queried here: "What does ten shillings mean to the small man?" It means a lot. When you talk about ten shillings or a pound, it means a big lot to the small man. How much has the small man to give away? How much is he likely to make with his small valuation? You must try to look at the matter from the small man's point of view. Take into consideration his method of living and his home comforts, or his lack of them. Ten shillings mean a lot. We are told, too that it was only the price of a bullock, or a "screw," perhaps, in the years of the war that had made a difference to the man who did not purchase land and the man who did for the 14, 15, or 16 years between the operations of the last Act and the beginning of this Act. This is a bigger problem than many who are dealing with it lightly are inclined to think. If ten shillings are not taken into consideration in the life of a small man, then what are you going to base your calculations on? You must begin to realise that he has very little income and very little to derive from the soil. Ten shillings may mean more to him than twenty pounds to a big man. I cannot withdraw this amendment, because it is the considered judgment of the people I represent. If this fails—I suppose it will, for I see no other signs—it will probably mean that there is nothing to prevent the suggestions made by our friends taking effect at a later stage. I must put this to a division.

[Mr. Gorey.]

Professor MAGENNIS: As an unpurchased tenant, I want to thank you, A Chinn Chomhairle, for permitting Deputy Gorey to make another speech, if for no other reason than that it has been exceedingly helpful. I thoroughly agree with what seems to underlie the arguments that he and his colleagues have put forward. Ten shillings seems a very small amount stated absolutely, but in conjunction with a variety of other things which go to make the conditions of life for the small holder it means an enormous amount. It means more than we, perhaps, can altogether realise. What I think is so particularly helpful is Deputy Gorey's declaration that he is speaking on this matter purely as a delegate. His position is one in which some of us occasionally find ourselves when we express on some particular matters not quite our own views or our own convictions, but rather those arrived at by the people whom we undertook to represent. It seems to me a compromise could be arrived at on this matter if an opportunity were given to Deputy Gorey to consult those who have instructed him to make this case. That 1921 was a bad year, for instance, is one of the alleged facts controverted. We all, surely, remember what the summer of 1921 was like—the hurtful effect of it upon 1922, the absolute absence of rain for months, the particularly torrid weather—weather almost semi-tropical—and we know it was most hurtful to the farming interests, and made the following year much more hurtful still.

Now, the want of markets, the general social upheaval, the insecurity, all combined, tended to make farming unprofitable in the years following. I think, as a matter of equity, we ought to take that into account. I do not think there is provided a sufficient basis for the demand to have arrears reduced by 40 per cent. I must say candidly that while I am advocating in a way what Deputy Doyle and others of the Farmers' Party advocated, they have not made a case for a reduction of 40 per cent., but they have made a case for making it easy for those who have a burden of arrears to shoulder, and that ease might be supplied in the fashion indicated by Deputy Sears—instead of calling for the payment of a lump sum, to allow it to be distributed over a number of years. There was a fallacy underlying some of the arguments, at least it seems so to me, with regard to those arrears. The question was put, "What had the farmer done with the rent?" Why, that assumes he had it. Otherwise, it is pretty much like the question asked by Lord Dundreary of the lady for whom he was manufacturing small talk. He asked her: "Does your brother like tea?" "Do you know, Lord Dundreary," she replied, "that I have no brother?" He said, "Quite so, but do you think if you had a brother that he would like tea?" What did the tenant do with the rent that he is not able to pay? That is an unanswerable question. While I cannot, therefore, vote for Deputy Gorey's amendment as it stands, I yet feel that there is a great deal that ought to be met in the case put forward insufficiently in support of it. I would ask Deputy Gorey to withdraw the amendment, notwithstanding his instructions, and to allow this matter to be dealt with on the lines of distribution of certain arrears over the annuity payment.

Mr. HOGAN: In my view, in any case, the real reason for this strike or failure or inability to pay was the fact of non-purchase. That meets the point Deputy Magennis makes with regard to the question, "What has the farmer done with the rent?" It is not a case of the farmer in general not having the rent, but of a farmer withholding the rent as a protest against non-purchase. I tried to take into account the bad markets, the confusion, the hot summer of 1921, and all the other relevant circumstances when we fixed the 25 per cent. I tried to take into account the circumstances on the other side too, and we endeavoured to come to something which we considered would be reasonable, having regard to the interests on both sides. I am ready to consider the suggestion of Deputy Sears, but unless Deputy Gorey withdraws his amendment and accepts this amendment, which could be prepared on the lines suggested by Deputy Sears, I can do nothing, and there is no alternative except to let the matter go to a division.

Mr. GOREY: I do not know what this suggestion means in actual figures.

Mr. HOGAN: I am prepared to consider Deputy Sears' suggestion, namely, in the case where a tenant owes three years' arrears that a half-year should be added to the purchase money.

Mr. GOREY: What about the tenant with 2½ or 2 years' arrears?

Mr. HOGAN: That would reduce the payment to 2½, and the half-year would be added to the purchase money. If Deputy Gorey is not prepared to accept that, then at present there is no alternative except to let Deputy Gorey's amendment go to a division.

Mr. GOREY: If the Minister can see his way to add in every case a half-year to the purchase money—

Mr. HOGAN: I would not agree to that. Take the case of a man who owes two years' arrears. He gets 25 per cent. per annum off, and that is a half-year's rent on two years, and he only owes 1½ years' rent. It is not a hardship to ask him to pay in those circumstances. I do admit there is a slight difference in the case where a man owes three years' arrears. There may be a certain amount of hardship, and to meet that I am willing to accept Deputy Sears' suggestion that in the case of three years' arrears a half-year is to be added to the purchase money.

Mr. GOREY: A man with two years' arrears has already paid full rent for one year, and he is to get nothing but 25 per cent. off. Then the man who did not pay at all and who owed three years' rent will be treated as you suggest?

Mr. HOGAN: Exactly

Mr. GOREY: We could not accept the proposal; it is too ridiculous.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 19; Níl, 39.

Tá.

Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Tomás de Nóglá.
Liam de Róiste.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlaicháin.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Broin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghoasa.
Risteárd MacFheoráil.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.
Domhnall Ó Ceallaicháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghaigh.
Seosamh Mac Suibhne.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Micheál de Duram.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cáirteagh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Éarnán Altún.
Sir Séumas Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobuín.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.

Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghnín Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dóláin.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Liam Ó hAodha.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Éarnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Facite.
Seamus de Burca.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. MORRISSEY: I beg to move Amendment 21:—

In Sub-Section (2), line 19, to insert after the word "cent." the words:—
 "In the case of a tenant the total rateable value of whose holdings exceeds thirty pounds, and 50 per cent. in the case of a tenant the total rateable value of whose holdings does not exceed thirty pounds, or of a tenant of whose holdings not more than one-half is permanent pasture."

The object of this amendment is to secure that a large farmer or grazier who does not till half his land does not get the same benefit by the reduction as a small farmer or a large farmer who does till his land. The figure, £30 valuation, is selected as a reasonable dividing line.

Mr. DAVIN: I am neither an unpurchased tenant myself, nor do I claim, like Deputy Gorey, to represent 70,000 unpurchased tenants. I have been wondering whether Deputy Gorey, if there were 70,001 unpurchased tenants, would make the same claim. My support in this case is on behalf of the small tenant farmer who tills his land. He is the greatest asset to this nation, in so far as he is a member of a body that produces the food for the nation. The Minister for Agriculture wanted to know what these people did with their money, and Deputy Gorey said he hoped that they did not go to Kilkee or Tramore, or some other watering place. I am sure Deputy Gorey would not go so far as to say that the small tillage farmer who works hard for the benefit of the people is not entitled to a fortnight's holidays at Tramore.

Mr. GOREY: He is, if he could get them; but he never could.

Mr. DAVIN: He did not get them last year, but that was not due to the clerk of the weather, but to the high political atmosphere prevailing at the time. If the small tenant farmer cannot get his holiday at Tramore or Kilkee, there is one thing certain, that the landlord will get his holiday at Monte Carlo, or some other such place, at the expense of the man who pays the rent. I would ask the Minister to approach the consideration of this amendment by enquiring into the conditions in which barley and other crops were produced during the last three years. Up to the year 1920 there was, generally speaking, no reason to complain with regard to the price for barley or other products. In 1920 the price ranged from 45s. to 52s. In 1921 it was from 18s. to 28s. 6d., and last year it was considered lucky to sell at from 11s. to 18s. We are told that the small farmer generally tills his land with the assistance of his own family. But are they not entitled to some return for their labour? In any event, in order to meet the cost of production, exclusive of any price for the use of his land, the price would require to be from 18s. to 28s. 6d. Therefore in selling barley, if he was lucky enough to sell it, he sold it at less than the cost of production, making no allowance or consideration for the use of the labour that was employed or the use of the land that produced this particular commodity. Against that you have the landlords' interests represented by Guinness's brewery, who sold the product of that particular commodity at the same price last year as it did three years ago, when the price of barley was 52s. a barrel. Perhaps the Minister would explain where the difference goes, or whether the two million five hundred thousand that Guinness handed out to their shareholders not very long ago, was at the expense of the tenant farmers of this country. As well as sowing barley, the tenant farmer usually produces whatever food is necessary to feed pigs, and I think that the price for the last couple of years is very low in regard to them, notwithstanding the fact that there is very little reduction for those who have to buy the finished article over the counter. The Minister said yesterday that the small landlord or the small estate was more likely to be encumbered than the large one. I suggest that the same argument applies in regard to the unpurchased tenant, and that he would be less able to bear the burden for reasons, some of which I have already given, and that the Minister himself has pleaded on behalf of the landlord.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE
 at this stage took the Chair.

Mr. DAVIN: The President in dealing with the points put up by Deputy Gorey referred to the fact that sixteen head of cattle were sold at 80s. per cwt. at a certain time. I would like the Minister to make enquiries, and I would like to learn, as a result of the enquiries, the number of unpurchased tenants of valuations of less than £30 who were able to put sixteen head of cattle on the market at 80s. per cwt.

Mr. GOREY: Not one.

Mr. DAVIN: Very few at any rate. The Minister also dealt very exhaustively with the position of the tenant—the position he will be in under this Bill as compared with the tenant who purchased under previous Acts. When the previous Land Bills, not compulsory, certainly, were passed, and when the tenant took advantage of them, money on the market was stationary at that particular time, prices were generally the same from one year to another; they were not affected in the way they have been affected in the last six years or since the outbreak of the European War. Money could also be borrowed at a very much lower rate than it is being borrowed at the present time. The position around the country at the moment, so far as I can gather, is that the small farmer owes money to the shopkeeper, the shopkeeper owes money to the wholesaler; very few of them owe money to Guinness, at any rate. The whole thing, as far as I can see it, is carried on on paper credit. There is one thing certain, and that is the two classes of people in the country who are suffering are the producer of the food and the consumer, who has nothing else to fall back upon except his weekly wage or salary. There is somebody in between these two who is getting a good whack out of it, at any rate. The Minister said you cannot take blood out of a turnip. If he could imagine that argument being applied as an excuse, it could by a stretch of the imagination be applied to the small farmer who owes two or three years' rent. I suggest it is an impossible proposition for him, even with the assistance of the Sheriff, to collect the arrears of rent, and he had better try to meet the situation by something in the nature of the amendment which I am supporting. I think it was Deputy Gorey referred to the cost of carriage. I have seen cases where a bag of potatoes or a bag of barley cost more in freight over eighty miles of Irish railway, than you would have actually to pay for them at the pit. I do not know exactly what he meant by bringing it into a question of this kind, but I suppose it was for the purpose of showing that the man who produced the article is getting the least out of it. The Minister also seems to take the view that the non-payment of rent for the last couple of years is merely a protest on behalf of unpurchased tenants in so far as the landlords were not willing to sell.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy should try to quote me properly. I stated my view on that question at least three times. The Deputy knows it. I do not want to state it again.

Mr. DAVIN: I am sorry if I misinterpreted the Minister, but I did not take down what he said in shorthand. I took it that was the view he put up. If it is, I certainly do not agree with his statement.

Mr. HOGAN: If I did not say it, you do not agree with it?

Mr. DAVIN: There is nobody—at least I am not, at any rate—supporting an amendment of this kind in order to injure the country's credit. Landlords, generally speaking, will not depend on rents for a livelihood. You will find that anything worth anything in this country is owned by a very small number of people, and the landlord who lives in Monte Carlo out of the rents he gets from the tenant-farmers of this country generally gets something else out of big establishments such as Guinness's brewery. You can take it for granted that you are not actually going to send the landlords into bankruptcy or into any Home in this country, at any rate, as paupers if this amendment is carried. I think if the Government are not prepared to meet in some way the barley growers and other small farmers of the country, they will drive them out of existence. The amendment, if the Minister is prepared to accept it, I think will meet the present case of the very small farmer, who, generally speaking, is the food-producer, and is Ireland's greatest asset at the moment.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I am wholly in sympathy with the principle that underlies the amendment, but I think that the line at which the barrier is drawn between the two classes is not a line that can be accepted. I represent a county in which the average valuation of holdings is £8.

Mr. GOREY: You represent!

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I represent a county in which the average valuation of the holdings is £8, and with the men on these holdings men like Deputy Gorey have very little sympathy or very little knowledge of what their economic requirements are, because he lives in a different atmosphere. He is accustomed to big farms and big grazing problems, but he does not know anything about the conditions that apply to holdings in a county such as I represent. With all due respect to the pretensions he makes here of representing the community generally, in this respect, I submit, he is not properly qualified to understand these things. I think if the partition between these two classes were regularised in some way, this amendment could be accepted. I could not possibly vote for it as it stands. There are forty thousand holdings in Tirconnail with a population of two hundred thousand. These people are labouring in the general interests of agriculture. They are not gambling on big prices or small prices; they are applying themselves to the best interests of agriculture, and they are a class that ought to be supported. They have something in common with the people of the West of Ireland, though in the West of Ireland tillage is not engaged in to the same extent as it is in Tirconnail. They represent, I suppose, 6,000 of the unpurchased tenants, and the money that would be involved in a remission with regard to these men would be very small, and to the landlord generally it would not amount to anything very much. In the case of big farms and big ranches it would amount to a good deal, but it does not amount to very much in the case of the small land-holder, who is working in the best spirit of agricultural development, and who only ekes out a bare living despite his arduous work. What would apply to him would not apply generally to the farming community more or less represented here by Deputy Gorey. I submit that it would be well if the Dáil would find some dividing line here. It is absolutely essential in the interests of those who are struggling. The man in the high-rated holding, generally speaking, is practically a landlord himself. I do not draw much distinction between the large tenant and the landlord. They are both engaged in speculation—the landlord as to how much he can make out of his estate, and the tenant as to how much he can make for applying to his own specific purposes. I think that this amendment should be considered in a further stage of the Bill, and it is one, if properly drawn, that could be supported. Much money will not be involved; it will take very little from the landlord, while it will mean a great deal to these small land-holders. Generally speaking, these people have always met their obligations, and the amount of their arrears will bear no proportion to the arrears in the case of large holdings, where there has been a cessation of payments of rents for a considerable time back. Although these people have not been very well able to meet their engagements, they have at the same time made a struggle to meet them, and they should get encouragement. I have a recollection myself—and it extends further back than even Deputy Gorey's recollection—when, as a little boy, the landlord of one of the farms we held died, and for five years no person was in a position to collect rent. At the end of five years I was sent with five years' rent, whereas in the case of others who did not pay the arrears they were allowed off with a half-year's rent. The man who paid got no consideration, but the man who did not meet his obligations was the man, I think, that was looked after by the Act of Parliament. I think that was immoral, and if we are to do things as we ought to do, we should look at it in that way, and not as a matter of expediency. These things are matters of equity, and they may be dealt with under those principles. A margin should be drawn between the small tenant and the large one, and in this case it can be done, but the margin here is too wide. I cannot support the amendment unless the margin is drawn.

Mr. DAVIN: Would the Deputy suggest a reasonable figure?

Mr. GOREY: He does not want to be dishonest.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: £10 instead of £30.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: There would be an easy way for Deputy McGoldrick to support that. If the Dáil accepts the amendment as it stands, it would be possible for Deputy Gorey to reduce the figure by a further amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: I am not accepting the amendment. Deputy Sears made a suggestion on the last amendment in regard to the question of arrears. I expressed my own view of it. That is as far as I am prepared to go. We are reminded that we must be equitable in those matters. We cannot have casual figures or haphazard ones. So far we have had no reasons given by the opposition. I want to know how this figure of 50 per cent. was arrived at. We have not got a single reason yet for any figure suggested by the opposition either from the Labour Party or the Farmers' Party. It seems to be simply a question of putting down whatever figure one happens on. I showed very clearly how we arrived at this figure. I showed its exact bearing on the price, but we have not got a single reason for a single figure put forward by the other party. I congratulate the Farmers' and the Labour Party on the happy position they are in. They are not in charge of the Bill, and are not responsible for it. The land question is a very old question, and everyone almost is interested in it. The opposition is in the happy position of being able to suggest any figure, either 50 per cent. or 60 per cent. If the Labour Party suggested 50 per cent., the Farmers would suggest 70 per cent.

Mr. DAVIN: On a point of explanation, may I say that we had no knowledge of the Farmers' amendment at all when we put forward ours.

Mr. HOGAN: No one suggested you had. If the Farmers say 40, they say 50. The two parties are having a picnic. I do not envy them their position. Some day I may be put in that position myself. This debate is appearing daily in the Press. There is an election coming on in a short time, and without very much cost, without making themselves responsible for any of the consequences of those amendments, they can go down to the country and talk about 50 or 60 per cent. Deputy Davin can tell his constituency about the small farmers in whom he is so very much interested.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Why did you not keep the Bill until after the elections?

Mr. HOGAN: I do not begrudge either the Farmers' Party or the Labour Party their present position. I wish I was in it myself. We can all make allowances for a thing of that kind. I do not think anyone is going to be deceived by this tremendous interest in agriculture in general. We, however, who are responsible must give reasons for our figures. We must consider what reactions they will have on the credit of the country. We must see that the figures square with justice, because I hope this Bill will pass and be put into operation, and that in two, three, four or five years time we will not have any reason to be ashamed of it. We have to put in figures accurately, realising that we are responsible for the Bill. I would like to hear this 50 per cent. defended. I am not good at mathematics, but I think I could prophesy that I could defend 60 per cent. by exactly the same reasons as I could 70 per cent. I do not know why Deputy Davin, having regard to the price of barley, did not put in an amendment that no arrears be paid.

Mr. LYONS: That is justice.

Mr. HOGAN: Why was it not put in?

Mr. DAVIN: I spoke in support of my own amendment, and the Minister should answer the arguments that I put up then.

Mr. HOGAN: I hope Deputy Gorey will take notice that there is a division also in the Labour Party.

Mr. GOREY: Those benches should take notice too.

Mr. HOGAN: We do not blame any one for not wasting time listening to the arguments that have just been heard, because no one takes them seriously. Deputy Lyons suggested 100 per cent. Does Deputy Davin agree with that? If he does, why does he not stand up for it?

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: We did not like to embarrass you.

Mr. HOGAN: Thanks very much, I will accept that reason, as it is the only one available in those circumstances. Barley is practically down to pre-war figures. We are bringing rents down to pre-war figures. We are dealing with [Mr. Hogan.] pre-war figures. Remember that. Wherever there was inflation as a result of the War, and wherever the tenant got a benefit as a result of that inflation, we are not taking it into account. We set out expressly to deal with the tenant's position as if prices were exactly pre-war, and that is the reason we gave this 10 per cent. contribution in order to lend the money at the price at which we could borrow and lend money before the War. You are to deal with the tenant in pre-war prices as if the European War had never occurred, and as if those conditions were exactly the same as pre-war. When people talk about the price of barley, barley is down to pre-war price, and in some cases below it, but we are dealing with the tenant as we would pre-war, and we are giving the tenant between 10 and 15 per cent. better terms than pre-war. Deputy Doyle admitted that 25 per cent. deduction would bring it down to the 1903 Act. Now we are giving 35 per cent.

MR. DOYLE: I want to say that I admitted no such thing that you were putting them on a better basis than the former tenants. You are putting them on a worse basis. Take the rental of £100—

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: You are not allowed to make a speech.

MR. DOYLE: He made a statement and attributed it to me. I say there is no such thing as better terms, and that the price the Minister is offering in this Bill is worse.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Doyle will have an opportunity of speaking after the Minister.

MR. HOGAN: I think the Dáil heard the Deputy admit that if we reduced the rent by 25 per cent. the reduced rent would be equal to the average annuity that would be paid by the tenant who had purchased. Is that correct?

MR. DOYLE: No; I qualified that statement considerably.

MR. HOGAN: He admits having made it, but he qualified it. Statements can be made, but when you see to what they lead you can qualify them. I do not think Deputy Doyle is the sort of man who would run away from statements which he makes. The reduction of 25 per cent. would bring the tenant's annuity down to exactly what was paid before the war under the 1903 Act. He admitted that. We give the tenant in this Bill 35 per cent. reduction, so that not only are we saving him from the inflation in prices as a result of the war and from the dearth of money, but we are giving him better terms as far as his annuity is concerned than if he had purchased pre-war. We are giving him 10 to 15 per cent. better terms. When Deputies talk of barley being back to pre-war price they must remember that. They must remember that we took that into account, that that was the reason why we fixed this reduction, or at least one of the reasons. We are not saying anything about the things that are not down to pre-war prices, but which are much above pre-war prices. We are not making any allowance for that, but we are certainly allowing the tenant for everything that is back to pre-war by this 35 per cent., and we are giving him 10 to 15 per cent. better terms with regard to prices. Deputies should remember that when they are talking of the price of barley. We took all these considerations which I have heard now into account. We worked out our figures with very considerable thought, and after, I hope, giving the question the time and attention that such serious questions are entitled to get. Having done that, we are entitled to get from a responsible opposition how they defend this figure of 50 per cent. Apart from the reasons that I referred to at the beginning, I think they ought at least to make a show of defending these figures. I heard Deputy Davin talk on the cost of production, basing a number of interesting arguments on it. I had a look at the farmers' benches and I was hoping that Deputy Gorey would rise to the occasion and point out that this cost of production argument cuts both ways. There is an item called labour—surely labour has something to do with it.

MR. O'CONNELL: These people do not employ labour.

MR. HOGAN: That is the reason that the cost of production is used here. The cost of production argument is one that I am glad the Labour Party have definitely given their allegiance to. I certainly will not advise the Dáil to accept this amendment and to accept any amendment on these lines. I have stated what I had to say to Deputy Sears' suggestion, and I would not go any further.

Mr. DOYLE: The Minister for Agriculture stated that I agreed that he gave the same reduction in the Bill to the unpurchased tenants. He gave the same reduction for three years. In stating that, I asked the Minister what amount did tenants pay in excess for fifteen years previously. Would the Minister answer that? He began then telling us about a bullock paying the difference. But that meant fifteen bullocks. Five pounds meant five times fifteen pounds. I admit that you gave it to the unpurchased tenants for three years, but what about the fifteen years previous when they got nothing? What about the case where the £100 tenant was compelled to pay £300 more than the unpurchased tenant beside him? It is all very well for the Minister to say that we are using this for propaganda. Possibly the Government will go down and use something else for propaganda, about the sectional attitude we are taking up here.

Mr. JOHNSON: This point that Deputy Doyle refers to is most amusing when one bears in mind what the Minister said a while ago, when he said that this question of rent is a comparatively small matter to the tenant farmer today.

Mr. HOGAN: Does the Deputy agree?

Mr. JOHNSON: That is the Minister's statement. The Minister has brought in a Land Purchase Bill in the Dáil, where 50 or 60 Deputies attend out of 128. He wants to get this passed before the election. We are charged with introducing amendments with a view to the public. I think the charge can be quite fairly thrown at the Minister in view of his own statement that the question of rentals is comparatively small. This matter of land purchase, as the Minister himself said, should be dealt with by a Parliament representative of you all. This was placarded all over the country: "The country should be fully represented in the Parliament of the nation," and that Parliament should deal with this land question. Well, in view of that, I think it does not lie in the Minister's mouth at any rate to make these references to amendments put down with an eye to the public. He has asked why 50 per cent. was put down, why is 25 per cent. put down? I will tell him. Twenty-five per cent. is his figure. It is intended to apply to all those who owe rentals, whether they were men living by their work on the land or whether they were men living by the sale of cattle which were grazed on the land. If it is a fair reduction for a cattle grazier, then at least the tiller of the soil is entitled to double that reduction. Now, the Minister may say that on that argument he is entitled to 60 per cent., 70 per cent., or 80 per cent. I would agree. He is certainly entitled to a greater reduction than the man who simply grazes cattle on the land, and whom he says is entitled to a 25 per cent. reduction. We have been very much familiarised with the contention from those who, if they were present, would be sitting on the Ministerial Benches, that the grazier, the large farmer who grazes his cattle, and the small farmer who works the land should be treated on a different basis. That is true, or it is not true. The echoes come from the Ministerial Benches that it is true. We want to test it. Are they prepared to treat the tiller of the soil on better lines than they would treat the grazier?

Mr. HOGAN: The Bill answers that question.

Mr. JOHNSON: The amendment is put down with a view to eliciting the views of the Ministry on that proposition.

Mr. HOGAN: The Bill itself gives them.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Bill does not on the question of arrears, at any rate. Deputy McGoldrick told us that. I do not suppose there are many Deputies here who have a better knowledge of the position and the condition of the small tenant farmers than Deputy McGoldrick has, and he agrees that there should be a line drawn between the two classes of tenants. He thinks that the £30 mentioned in the amendment is too high, but at any rate it will include all those whose interest he has at heart, so he need not object to the amendment on that account. If he agrees that there is a large number, or any number, who are over £20 valuation or a £10 valuation, that should be included in the 25 per cent.

[Mr. Johnson.]

category, well, that is a matter that we can perhaps accommodate him with. At any rate, he agrees with the principle that there should be a distinction drawn between the tenant who is tilling his holding, the small holder who must perforce, if he tills his holding, live out of the proceeds of that holding, and the extensive holder who has not tilled his holding. He got into arrears because of his failure to back the winner in the cattle gamble of 1921-22.

We are prepared to agree with the Minister that a 25 per cent. reduction is sufficient for him. The Minister contends it is a fair proposition that such a holder is entitled to a 25 per cent. reduction of any arrears, and we retort that if he is entitled to such a reduction, then the man who did his duty by the State, the man who fulfilled his trust in his holding, is entitled to a greater reduction than the man who simply used the land for the purpose of a cattle ranch. That is the case for the amendment. The Minister accepts the principle; then the figures may be arranged, and I am sure we will be able to accommodate him either to follow Deputy Lyons's suggestion and wipe out all arrears, or to modify the figures, and, as a matter of fact, to collaborate with the Minister in making this distinction as effective as possible, to give a preference to the land-holder who tills his land as against the land-holder who refuses to till his land. I have a table here in connection with one county. It is not, perhaps, the best illustration, and it was got out for an entirely different purpose. In the county there are 162 holdings, ranches averaging 340 acres and with a total acreage of 55,059. The total number of men employed on all that property was 432, or one man per 128 acres. What proportion of those holdings would come under this Bill I have not the slightest conception of. I do say that kind of land-holding in other counties, and to some extent in this county, ought to be penalised as compared with the tenant tiller of the soil. This amendment will at least test the principle whether it is intended to place the grazier on the same plane in regard to arrears as we are proposing to place the tenant-holder who is a tiller of the soil.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Johnson does not apparently realise that the answer to his important question is the Bill. If he will look at Section 21, Subsection (3), and at Section 28—sections upon which I dwelt in the Second Reading—he will find the whole spirit of this is to relieve the tenant with whose interests he is so much concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON: Touching arrears.

Professor MAGENNIS: Touching the placing of him in a proper economic position.

Mr. JOHNSON: We are dealing now with the question of arrears.

Professor MAGENNIS: I know; but Deputy Johnson proclaimed with great rhetorical effect, and with the air of an expectant victor entering into the captured citadel, that this was going to test the whole character of the Bill—

Mr. JOHNSON: No.

Professor MAGENNIS: Whether or not those who propose it meant it for the advantage of the right sort of land occupant or the wrong sort of land occupant, and it is merely with that particular aspect of his argument that I am now standing up to deal. It is quite obvious to anyone who studies the Bill that it was conceived and framed in the spirit of rectifying all the wrongs that are outstanding in regard to the landless men, the agricultural labourer, who is deprived of land because of the operation of previous Purchase Acts, people who have uneconomic holdings, others who were debarred from turbary rights. And then there is a provision dealing with the farmer who has a large holding of untenanted land and who is going to work it. Again, Deputy Johnson ought to note that one of the requirements which the Land Commission is to insist upon in regard to all applicants under Section 28 for advances is the capacity of working the soil.

Mr. JOHNSON: We are not dealing with that particular character of the Bill. We are dealing with arrears, and only arrears—things that have passed, not things that are to come.

Professor MAGENNIS: This is logic running mad, because if a Deputy advances a certain doctrine or view in order to support his criticism either of a Section or an amendment to a section, anyone is entitled in any sane assembly to stand up to rebut the argument, whether or not he takes or does not take the view with regard to the other matter out of which this doctrinal disquisition arises. I submit that I am quite in order in attempting to show that this declaration that the amendment has the incalculable value of testing the whole Bill is put forward here, with the recommendation that it is the touchstone, and I suggest to anyone who reads the Bill fairly that the touchstone has already been applied satisfactorily.

Mr. HOGAN: I find myself being forced into the position of being the only one to stand up for the unfortunate farmer. Deputy Johnson says he would like to give advantage to the man who performed his trust. It is when you get down to the question of what he means by performing his trust—the trust that the State put in him by giving him this holding—that we begin to differ. Tillage did not pay for the past year. Potatoes are £1 a ton, and a man could not afford to till to the same extent as heretofore for a number of reasons. Are we to penalise a man because he did not till to such an extent as in previous years, because he did not till to a large extent, even though, if he did till to a large extent, the tillage might not pay? That is the doctrine. I am not saying now that a large farmer should not till considerably. The large farmers can and do, but you are not making the measure the amount of tillage. Is that fair, considering that when you go for a certain area of tillage, for reasons which I will not go into now—

Mr. JOHNSON: May I remind the Minister that there are alternatives—the valuation of the holding or the amount of tillage?

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy did not really defend the amendment so much as the general principle. I am on the same point as Deputy Magennis. This was the touchstone, and the Deputy's test was the amount of tillage that was done. Are you to penalise a man because he did not till to such a very large extent that it would not pay him? I agree that the State is entitled to expect that a man should use his land properly. But, on the other hand, the owner of the land is entitled to take into consideration whether he can make a profit or not.

Professor MAGENNIS: He is not in it for his health.

Mr. HOGAN: He is entitled to take into consideration how much he can till and make a profit. If you make the measure purely and simply the amount of tillage, then you are doing an injustice. I think the Farmers' Party will, at least, bear me out in that. I do say that if you want to draw a line that you cannot do it at a valuation of £30 or £10 or £5. You will get men whose valuations are under £10 not giving value to the State for the land they have got. You will get men whose valuations are over £10 not giving value to the State. You will get men— and plenty of men—whose holdings are under £5 valuation, who are giving full value to the State, and you will, likewise, get men with over £100 valuation giving full value. But what the Deputy suggests is that the Land Commission, immediately this Bill is passed, should set out and examine every holding in Ireland. That is what would have to be done if the Deputy's idea were carried out.

I was twitted with introducing this Bill before the Election. Every Party in the Dáil asked me at least five times across the floor of the Chamber when this Bill was coming. I was pressed by all parties to produce it. If I have one file in my office I have a thousand, from all sorts and conditions of organisations—Back to the Land, Labour, and Unpurchased Tenants—asking when I would bring in this Bill and telling me to bring it in immediately. Now I am told it is introduced for election purposes, and again we are twitted with supporting the landlords.

Mr. JOHNSON: Do you remember the Governor-General's speech?

Mr. HOGAN: I remember it quite well. All the demands made were that we should deal in this Bill with averages. The tenants pointed out—and rightly pointed out—that the old system was slow, and that it was not, for the difference, worth while to have the Land Commission going over all the holdings, examining them and pricing them. Having regard to the fact that we were dealing, to a great extent, with judicial [Mr. Hogan.] rents, it was urged that we should adopt the system of averages—that we should strike averages and have the operations of the Bill as far as possible automatic. Nobody ever suggested that there should be a line drawn. All these organisations looked for averages. A rough and ready method was what they wanted. The Deputy can make what capital he likes out of that. Rough and ready methods are what they asked for. I have given them the ready methods, and I have given them fine methods as well. Not a single organisation through the country ever asked for anything except an average figure.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Did they ever ask for tillage?

Mr. HOGAN: I am not on that at the moment. I cannot deal with two points at the same time. I was blamed by every party for not making one figure apply to First, Second and Third Term rents. I could not see my way to simplify it down to one figure, but I brought it down to two figures, and I think that was rather good. I was rather criticised for that, and we seem to be back at this position now: wherever any average is likely to prejudice the position of the particular people whom a Deputy is interested in at the moment then the Land Commission is to value the holding. Each Deputy is interested in a different class or a different section or a different part of the country, where there are special conditions, and we are gradually getting back to the position under the 1903 Act of handing over the work to the Land Commission and getting them to examine all the estates and go into the circumstances of each holding—getting them to take the special circumstances of each case into consideration and do justice to each case. It would be very nice if we could do that, but it would take at least twenty years, and we would be back to the good old time under the 1903 and 1909 Acts.

I claim that I produce figures which do justice. I claim that it is not as hard a task to do justice by averages in this particular Bill as it would have been before, because we are dealing with figures that have not been inflated, and that are really rock-bottom figures. Most of the tenants went into the Land Courts when they were set up, and a certain standard figure was put on each holding. We can take a line from that figure. Where tenancies are non-judicial we are allowing the Land Commission to value them. As regards the judicial tenants, we can take a line from the standard figure and we can be very accurate. Every farmer knows that it would not be worth while, for the purpose of righting the little injustices that might be done in particular cases, to go back to the old system and to have the Land Commission do everything. We have tried in this Bill to meet the requests and desires of the tenants' organisations and the labour organisations who wrote to me urging me to deal in averages; there is no use at this hour of the day quoting a particular case and suggesting that the Land Commission should be set going again, inspecting holdings and generally inquiring into how the people use their farms. That is the way to hold land purchase up. It would do more harm than good. What the tenants want is expedition. What we want is expedition. We want to get the Bill passed and to see it operating at the earliest possible moment and in the most expeditious way, and we want to make the tenants the owners of their own holdings.

Mr. LYONS: I am of opinion that the Minister for Agriculture did not regard this amendment in a proper light. I think it is an amendment that should meet with the approval of even the Minister for Agriculture. Considering that the amendment is designed to benefit the really poor man, it would be surprising to find that the Minister for Agriculture or any member of the Government would urge its rejection. The amendment says that in a case where the tenant's total rateable value exceeds £30—

Professor MAGENNIS: Is he a poor man?

Mr. LYONS: He is to get 25 per cent. and in the case of a tenant whose valuation does not exceed £30, or of a tenant of whose holdings not more than one-half is permanent pasture, he is to get 50 per cent. That is one of the most necessary amendments that have been introduced in connection with this Bill. It is not put forward for electioneering purposes. We know that these Benches would be packed after the election, whether or not this amendment was put forward. If the Minister or the Government reject this amendment it will show that it is really a capitalist Government, and out for the big grazier and not for the poor man. The men who can turn out 16 fat bullocks to the market, I can assure the Dáil, are not the men we are seeking to get this 50 per cent. for. I have the honour to represent a county with the best land in Ireland next to that of Meath, and there is no man in my constituency who can fatten and turn out 16 bullocks on a holding under £30 valuation. Take the argument put forward by Deputy Gorey, which I consider was honest. I am sorry to say that Deputy Gorey was misled—

Professor MAGENNIS: Misled into honesty!

Mr. LYONS: Misled by the Minister for Agriculture when he introduced the Bill. Mr. Gorey, on the second reading of the Bill, said:

Now, with regard to the question of price, the price set out in this Bill falls very far short of the demand we put forward, and that applies to both price and arrears. I will deal with the question of prices first. They are not even as high as the prices demanded by Fr. Maguire on behalf of the unpurchased tenants of Co. Monaghan. These were 45 per cent. on first term rents, 40 per cent. on second term, and 35 per cent. on third term.

I read that out for the purpose of showing to the Dáil the necessity for accepting this amendment. The Farmers' Party at the time accepted those terms, which were the smallest put forward by that particular unpurchased tenants' organisation. It is only right that the Dáil should now accept this amendment for the purpose of benefiting the poor man. I fully realise that in some counties a holding of £30 valuation is a good holding, and one a man can live on. It would be an injustice if we did not do something for the man who tills a good portion of a small holding. We are not penalising by this amendment anybody who really does justice and contributes to the prosperity of the State. I am of opinion that the Farmers' Party, so far as they have gone, have tried to do justice to the people they represent. But we must take into account that, as Deputy McGoldrick said a few moments ago, and as I was sorry to hear mentioned, Deputy Gorey, the leader on the Farmers' benches, was not out for the uneconomic holder or the unpurchased tenant, but was out for the grazier when he wanted to deal with the sporting rights so that everybody could rear greyhounds. Amendment 20 was out for the interests of the small men, and if that amendment was out for the interests of the small man, so is Amendment 21. The Minister for Agriculture said that if a man owed rent amounting to £24, it would be spread over a term of three years. That would be £8 per annum. How could a man with six or seven acres of land, some of which, to my own knowledge, is not worth 2s. 6d. per acre, pay back arrears to the extent of £8 a year? I am surprised at the Minister for Agriculture, at the Dáil, and at the Government, and I would be twice as much surprised if any Teachtaí would vote against this amendment, because I hold that this amendment does justice to all classes. You may compromise in the amendment. If it is a decent compromise I am sure the members at this side of the Dáil will not force it to a division. We do not want to show the hands of any Deputy here; we simply want to see that justice is done. When I used the phrase "Showing the hands," I meant we do not want to do them out of votes at the next election. If a tenant at the present time owes £24, I wonder how much profit the landlords have made in the last twenty or thirty years. I can assure this Dáil that in the last twenty or thirty years a lot of the landlords still in Ireland came into the possession of the land not morally or legally, but through grabbing. I do not see why these people should be entitled to get an excessive rent from the original owners of the land.

I said on the occasion of the Second Reading of the Bill that the landlords were worthy of all the names that Deputy Professor Magennis called them. Of course, Deputy Professor Magennis did not mean to call the landlords names, but he tried to interpret what was passing through Deputy Gorey's mind. I say now he was perfectly honest, and that the majority of these men have come into the possession of the land through grabbing, and here we are, one of the legal Assemblies of the Irish people, and we are going to do justice to the men who

[Mr. Lyons.]

I battered down the homes of our ancestors with the battering-ram and with the help of an enemy Government. Are we going to do justice to these men now by giving them three years' arrears with a slight reduction of 25 per cent.? When you take that into account, that we are going to do justice to those people, I do not see why the Minister for Agriculture or the Government cannot accept this amendment and do justice to the unpurchased tenant. I hope the Minister will accept the amendment, and I hope that, if a division is called for, the Dáil will not have it said that they are out for the grazier and the rancher, and that they have no thought for the unfortunate persons who are the backbone of the nation, the unpurchased tenant, the evicted tenant, and the ordinary worker.

Mr. GOREY: There is just one part of this amendment that I do not agree with. That is the latter portion, where a distinction is made between the man who tills his holding and the man who does not. I do not think that this distinction would be made by the man who knows Ireland. There are portions of it eminently suitable for tillage, and there are vast tracts where tillage could not be carried on—namely, the mountainous and bog districts. With regard to the small farmer, why he should receive better treatment than the large farmer I think it is quite apparent, but we have never been asked anything about divisions on this question of arrears. We are asked to put up figures. Our arguments have been figures enough. For the last three or four years farms have been run at a loss. If the money is not there, where is it to come from? You are asking for money that is not there. I certainly agree with the portion of the amendment that would give some preferential terms to the small farmer, but I cannot agree with the other part, because there are vast tracts of land in Ireland where tillage cannot be carried on. There is no use in trying to make a distinction on those lines, but there is every reason and every justice in making a distinction between the small man and the large man. We have not put down figures, because nobody is able to tender actual figures with regard to tillage and farming generally. The figures must be judged by the profits that come from farming. Anybody who wants to run a farm of fifteen or twenty acres will very easily find out for himself what the profit is.

Anybody who is not acquainted with the circumstances of the small man has no business talking about him. One must live beside the small man before one can get to know the actual circumstances under which he lives; one has to see what he is able to produce, what his revenues are and what his credits before any kind of solid opinion can be formed as to his actual position. Anyone who wants to legislate on behalf of these people must become familiar with all the figures which this knowledge would give before he can deal with the position of the small man.

Mr. HOGAN: I would like to know from the Deputy whether the Unpurchased Tenants' Association or the Farmers' Union ever made that distinction before?

Mr. GOREY: I never said so. As I have already stated, my anxiety in dealing with this matter, is to save something from the wreck. Deputy McGoldrick, in his speech, drew a picture of a good little boy, I do not know how many years ago, going away with five years' rent in his pocket, with instructions to pay it like a good little fellow. From what I know of Deputy McGoldrick, as a man, I am not surprised that he went away with five years' rent in his pocket and paid it out cheerfully. That does not surprise me, nor does it surprise me that the good little boy has grown up into a good little man. What I do object to is his complaint that when he went away and paid his five years' rent, in a few months' time an Arrears Bill was introduced whereby his neighbours had all their arrears wiped out. I think he used the word "dishonesty" in regard to these other people.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I did not.

Mr. GOREY: Yes, you did, and I think you also used the word "immoral." According to Deputy McGoldrick all these people were rogues, they were dishonest, and they were immoral and, according to him, the Arrears Bill was introduced in order to relieve the condition of these rogues and dishonest and immoral people.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: What I said was that the legislation was immoral.

Mr. GOREY: That will be very interesting reading for the people of Donegal, or, as I believe the Deputy calls it, Tirconail—very interesting reading indeed for the rogues and the dishonest and immoral people of Tirconail.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: They appreciate honesty in Tirconail.

Mr. GOREY: Deputy McGoldrick told me that I knew nothing about the people of Tirconail, but I think I know more about them than he does. They have entrusted me to look after their interests, and I want to know from Deputy McGoldrick who instructed him to appear for the Unpurchased Tenants of Tirconail, or on whose behalf he was speaking? If he shows me any written authority entitling him to speak on behalf of the Unpurchased Tenants of Tirconail, I am prepared to apologise to him.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I can show abundance of it.

Mr. GOREY: I would like to see it. The Unpurchased Tenants of Tirconail do not think very much about you.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I am the man who represents them.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: We have nothing to do with what the people of Tirconail think on that.

Mr. GOREY: They will settle the matter themselves when they get the chance.

Mr. O'DONNELL: Which is Deputy Gorey or Deputy McGoldrick the Deputy for Tirconail?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: That question does not arise.

Mr. GOREY: Perhaps we may find our way to Sligo yet. You can never tell.

Mr. O'DONNELL: You do not represent it yet, anyway.

Mr. GOREY: I have not said so. I never made the claim that I misrepresented it, as some people are doing at the moment. I again appeal to the Government to take into consideration the claims put forward for this amendment by Deputy Davin and other Deputies. There is no getting away from this fact that, if you want to talk about equity, you must try to divide the equities as between the landlord and the tenant, and do justice between both. The case has not been put up that the landlord has to meet certain payments, but it is only the landlord's case that has been put up. When you talk about the landlord you mean, of course, the greatest wasters in the country; when you talk about the uneconomic and mortgaged landlord you are simply talking about the most disreputable element in the community; you are talking about wasters, men who want medical attendance for something—I will not mention what I have in my mind—men who lived a certain life, and now we are asked to do justice to these people and to make the small men pay off their mortgages for them.

Mr. DAVIN: I am afraid that Deputy Gorey places a wrong interpretation upon this amendment. He seems to think it is an amendment giving a preference for the future to the people who till a certain amount of land.

Mr. GOREY: No; I do not.

Mr. DAVIN: That is not the position. As I have already pointed out, I presume the Minister will be in a position to enforce the payment of whatever conditions are laid down in this Bill so far as its application to the landlord is concerned. All we ask is that the people who have tilled a certain amount of land or whose valuation is below a certain figure should get the concession which is stipulated in the amendment. The Minister, no matter how polite he may be, and he has been very polite on this matter, cannot deny that at a critical period in the country's history, at a particular time when there was a food shortage, certain people tilled a certain amount of their land, and by doing so they have lost a considerable amount of money, and as a result many of them are now heavily in debt. What we ask is that the situation, so far as these people are concerned, should be relieved by the acceptance of this amendment. The Minister, in turning down this amendment, says he is doing it because of representations that have been made to him by tenants' organisations. If we are seriously to accept the statement of Deputy Gorey here, there is only the one tenants' organisation in the country.

[Mr. Davin.]

Mr. GOREY: I have not said anything of the sort.

Mr. DAVIN: You stated that you represented 70,000 of the unpurchased tenants of the country. I do not claim to represent the unpurchased tenants, but I take a generous view of my responsibilities in this matter. I should like to point out that it is not for electioneering purposes that I support the amendment. In that connection I am not as much concerned as some people, at any rate. The Minister made some reference to my views on the farmers' attitude. I could not exactly catch what he said.

Mr. HOGAN: I referred to the costs of production.

Mr. DAVIN: All I want to say on that is that I am a farmer's son, and that I worked on the land before I went to school in my bare feet as well as in my boots, and I know the situation exactly.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy knows very well that I am not referring to whether he worked on a farm or did not work on it. I stated that I was glad to see the Deputy give his allegiance to the costs of production principle as a principle which should guide us in arriving at various things—rent, wages, and things of that kind.

Mr. DAVIN: I mentioned that in order that the Minister should not be under any misapprehension as to my knowledge of the conditions of the people on whose behalf I speak. Whether it is a coincidence or not, anyone who knows the local circumstances knows that this particular clause would cater for the class of people who live in the area that I represent. Deputy Gorey knows that too, and, as far as I am concerned, I realise that I am discharging nothing beyond my responsibilities in supporting an amendment of this kind. The Minister also said it would be necessary, if this amendment were accepted, to examine every holding, which means I presume, every unpurchased holding. I suggest that is not the case, and would not be the case if the Minister accepted an amendment of this kind. He also said that the Bill was drafted in such a way as to make provision for the barley producers. He states, and to a certain extent correctly, that the price of barley has gone down to the pre-war figure. But what is the price of the product of the barley? Has that gone back to pre-war price?

Mr. HOGAN: Do you mean pigs?

Mr. DAVIN: I am talking of the products produced from the barley.

Mr. HOGAN: You mean stout or beer!

Mr. DAVIN: I thought you understood what I meant. I meant the difference between the price of the article the barley produced last year and the price of the barley itself. If the price of the barley has gone back to pre-war, it is certain that the price of the product of the barley is not gone back to pre-war. The whole gist of the argument advanced by the Minister is in support of the claim of the pauperised landlords the people who live in Monte Carlo on the interest, not of rents, or of Guinness's shares, but, according to the Minister, on the interest of what they owe. There is no desire, so far as I am concerned, to get the thin end of the wedge in as to the amount of tillage in the future. It is only a question of giving a concession to certain people who, owing to extraordinary circumstances, have suffered, and to the knowledge of the Minister have suffered, and who shall get some consideration over and above the big rancher who is provided for under the terms of the Bill on the same lines as the small farmer.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister has based his opposition to this amendment on the ground that everybody had asked him to deal with this question in averages. Well, I do not know what representations were made to the Minister, but I know that representations by the score had been made to Deputies here on these benches that a difference should be made between the treatment of the grazier and the treatment of the small farmer, who in the great majority of cases tills a fair proportion of his holding; so that the representations made to the Minister are different from the representations made to us, and just as he is claiming to act upon the representations made to him, we are acting upon the representations made to us. I would like to remind the Dáil that, notwithstanding what the Minister said about the effect of this amendment, notwithstanding the plea that he made for those who did not till last year because tillage did not pay, we are not asking that they should be in a worse position than the position which he himself proposes to put them in.

We are not asking that at all. We ask that those who did go to the expense of tilling, and the small holder who is presumed to have tilled, should be placed in a better position than those who did not, and whom the Minister considers are entitled to 25 per cent. reduction. What is the explanation? Deputy Gorey and others have explained that when you are trying to provide sustenance for three people on a certain holding you are at greater expense than if you are trying to provide sustenance only for one, and the cost in connection with operations of tillage are heavier than the cost in connection with the operations on a grazing holding and inasmuch as there are more people to live out of a grazing holding, there is more difficulty in saving money to pay off these arrears.

Now, the Minister thinks he has scored a point by quoting Deputy Davin's reference to the cost of production. But that is not discovery. We at least know, whether the Minister is aware of it or not, that when five men are employed upon a farm it is a cause for a greater output of cash than if only one man were employed upon the farm. That is no new discovery. For we are maintaining, and it is at the back of this amendment, as it is at the back of our attitude to this Bill, that the land is there for people to live upon, and that the more people you can provide sustenance for out of the land the better it is for the country, even if the profits are not so great to the individual holder and if the profits are not so great to the grazier. If the opportunities for saving money to pay off these arrears have been reduced by the fact that he tilled rather than grazed, that is a fair case for advantage to be given to that holder, because he is not in as good a position to pay. More people had to live out of the produce than in the case of the grazier. But the contention of Deputy Magennis that there was any attempt to make this amendment the touchstone of our attitude to the Bill, or the touchstone, rather, of our intention to the Bill was quite a misinterpretation of anything I said.

Quite frankly and clearly I said that we were dealing with the question of arrears and that we wished to make a difference in the treatment of the smallholder or the larger holder who tilled and employed labour on his holding, and the large holder who did not employ labour upon his holding, and that that was the touchstone of the attitude of the Deputies who were always insisting that there should be a distinction drawn between these two classes of land-holders. I admit and acknowledge with gratitude that there are portions of the Bill that quite fall in with that conception, but I want the whole Bill to fall in with that conception, and this amendment is designed to amend this Section dealing with arrears, in that direction.

Question put.

The Committee divided: Tá, 18; Níl, 37.

Tá.

Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Tomás de Nóglá.
Liam de Róiste.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás O Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Broin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Risteárd Mac Fheorais.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
 Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
 Uaitéar Mac Cumhaill.
 Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
 Séamus Breathnach.
 Pádraig Mag Ualghaigh.
 Seosamh Mac Suibhne.
 Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
 Seán Mac Garaidh.
 Pilib Mac Cosgair.
 Domhnall Mac Cártaigh.
 Maolnuire Mac Eochadha.
 Eamán Altún.
 Sir Séamus Craig.
 Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
 Liam Thrift.
 Pádraig Ó hGáin.
 Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
 Piaras Béaslai.

Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
 Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
 Críostóir Ó Broin.
 Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
 Proinsias Bulfin.
 Séamus Ó Dólaín.
 Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
 Liam Ó hAodha.
 Proinsias Mag Aonghusa.
 Eamón Ó Dúgáin.
 Peadar Ó hAodha.
 Séamus Ó Murchadha.
 Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
 Liam Mac Sioghairil.
 Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
 Eamán de Blaghd.
 Uinsean de Faoite.
 Séamus de Burea.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to move:—

In Sub-Section (2), line 22, to add after the word "made" the words:—

"No proof of the existence of the custom of a hanging gale shall be required other than receipts for any two years' rent prior to the year 1920, or the production of the books of the landlord or his agent in respect of the same period. Such books shall be produced on demand of the tenant."

This amendment at least should not give rise to much contention. The purpose is to deal with the hanging gale. In the case of a good many estates in the country a hanging gale has been customary. In some cases it is a half year, but there are cases where it is a year. That has always obtained on estates. We want to have no further proof necessary of a hanging gale than the producing of the rent receipts to show that the date is a half year or a year hence. I think the amendment is one that the Minister should accept.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: Before the Minister agrees to the acceptance of the amendment I would like to draw his attention to the wording of it. The Section deals with estates on which a hanging gale is customary, and the amendment proposes that you should prove that custom by the receipts for any two years prior to the year 1920.

Mr. GOREY: For two years.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: Those two years might 1820 or 1821, or any other two years back to the Flood, as far as I can see from the amendment. Therefore, if the amendment, or anything on the principle of the amendment, is going to be accepted, some definition ought to be given as to the particular two years that are going to be adduced as proof of custom.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of explanation, this amendment was sent up from Cork and Limerick at the last moment and I had only time to put it in. I believe it is the custom in these counties to have a hanging gale.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I am not denying that hanging gales are customary on many estates, but that you should prove that custom exists by producing rent receipts of a hundred years ago, which would be admissible under this amendment, does not seem to me to be right.

Mr. GOREY: The word "any" may be left out on the Report Stage.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: We are on the Committee Stage now and that is the Stage for getting amendments into proper order. It might become part of my duty in my ordinary professional capacity to argue some case upon this amendment, and it seems to me perfectly clear that if this amendment passes in this form you can prove that the hanging gale was customary on an estate to-day by producing the landlords' books of 100 years ago.

Mr. GOREY: I take the view that the word "any" was not intended at all—I do not know.

Mr. HOGAN: I take it that what the Deputy wants to get at is to prove this is the most expeditious manner possible. That is the meaning of the amendment. There is no doubt that the amendment is open to the objection stated by Deputy FitzGibbon, and, I think, that the Bill as it stands is really more satisfactory because Section (19) says:—(1) It shall be the duty of every landlord and of every person receiving rents and profits on his behalf to furnish to the Land Commission within the prescribed time and in the prescribed form such particulars as they may require for the purpose of the collection of compounded arrears of rent and payment in lieu of rent, and the Land Commission shall have power to require any person paying rent to any other person in respect of a holding to give such particulars with respect to the holding as they may so require.

That is to say that the Land Commission have power to compel the landlord to produce his books but we could not agree to the books being produced for any two years.

Mr. GOREY: I do not think the word "any" was meant there.

Mr. HOGAN: We could not bind the Land Commission by saying that they shall only look at books for two years and for a particular two years. We could not agree to that. There would be no reason for shutting out any evidence that the Land Commission might like to get. The books of the landlord will, in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred, prove the hanging gale, and in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred there will be absolutely no dispute. There may be one case out of one hundred where there will be a dispute and, in that event, the Land Commission will have to decide the custom. Hence, it is not right that any evidence should be ruled out, especially any evidence that might be as much in the interests of the tenant as that of the landlord. We are proving the custom. In the particular case where there would be a dispute it might be of importance to the tenant to produce other evidence besides the landlords' books. I have convinced myself that the Bill as it stands in Section 19 is better than the amendment. As the Bill stands the landlord must produce his books. Say that the Land Commission rule in 100 cases that there is a hanging gale. One case may be disputed. All the parties, and especially the tenant, should be in the position of bringing any evidence they like. I think the Bill covers the points better than the suggested alteration.

Mr. GOREY: I know that there are specific cases covered by the amendment, but I am not able to give you the details as I am not aware of them. I do not know anything about the wording, as the amendment was drafted in Cork and sent up to me. I do not know the circumstances, but I know that they were sufficient to animate the men who sent up the amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: Section 19 gives complete power to the Land Commission to have the books produced. In fact the whole section gives the Land Commission complete power to make the landlords produce anything they wish, and the Deputy knows that the books and the receipts would show if there was a hanging gale. In any case, where there is a dispute why rule out evidence that might be in the interests of the tenant? "Any" two years would be completely out of the question.

Mr. GOREY: I do not like the word "any" myself. I think it would be wrong.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I might say that the Minister's view is right, and I give one instance that has occurred to me at the moment. I rather think that in many cases where a hanging gale was the custom that during the fat years 1918 and 1919 tenants did in fact pay up these hanging gales as they were then able to afford to do so, and did not like to have it hanging over them. It would be rather unfair where there was a hanging gale to allow that to be wiped out by the production by the landlord of receipts for that year showing that a tenant had paid in full and therefore alleging that he was not entitled to the hanging gale. I did not make any comment at all from the point of view of attacking the tenants or protecting the landlords. I only made a comment on the wording of the amendment. The Minister's explanation, I think, gives the tenant all the protection he can possibly want.

Mr. GOREY: If the Minister will not accept the amendment I suppose I had better withdraw it.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Gorey should consider that. The point made by Deputy FitzGibbon did not occur to me. Consider the case where the tenant paid the hanging gale in 1918, the books might show that it was paid up while the custom might be there, and your amendment would rule the tenant out.

Mr. GOREY: I am at a loss for an explanation as the amendment does not concern me personally, or any of my constituents, but some people down in Cork and Limerick.

Mr. HOGAN: The amendment might suit certain people, and might be a great injustice to tenants in other parts of the country. Section 19 makes sure that tenants will have the benefit of the books or any other evidence that they like to bring forward.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

Amendment No. 23 depends on No. 21, and falls with it. Amendment No. 24 was dependent on Amendment 20 and falls with it.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I move: In Sub-section (4) to insert after the word "Income Tax," line 32, the words "less the usual deduction of one-eighth." I am afraid this amendment is open to criticism of very much the same kind that I ventured to make on the last amendment. I am afraid it does not fit in very well in the place I proposed, and I am not at all sure that it carries out the object I had when putting it down.

The deduction of one-eighth per cent. was allowed, or has hitherto been allowed, in certain cases, and it appears to me possible that it might be contended by the Inland Revenue that the compounded arrears of rent is not really rent at all but is some other form of income and that, therefore, the deduction of one-eighth per cent., which the receiver of that rent would have been allowed, would not be granted to him, because it was not really rent but was some compounded payment in lieu of rent. I put down this amendment rather for the purpose of directing attention to that point and for ascertaining from the Minister whether these compounded arrears were or were not to be treated as if they were the rent that they represent. I could not find any place in the Bill in which the provision for this deduction should be made except in Section 16 and again in Sub-section (4) of Section 17, and therefore I put down the amendment in these two places in order to ascertain from the Minister whether or not it was his intention that this deduction should be allowed in future in the case of compounded arrears of rent. I formally move the amendment in order to get that information from him.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the Chair at this stage.

Mr. HOGAN: I can give the Deputy an undertaking that the same deduction will be allowed in respect of compounded arrears of rent as would be allowed in regard to rent. I think also, that the compounded arrears of rent are the same thing, but in any case we will not refuse deductions which would be allowable in respect of the amounts of rents and which is considerably less than the rent.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: That satisfies me, and I ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made and question "That Section 16 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 17.

(1) In the case of every holding to which this Act applies rent shall not be payable by the tenant in respect of any period after the gale day next preceding the date of the passing of this Act. There shall be payable by the tenant to the Land Commission as from the gale day next preceding the date of the passing of this Act an annual sum in lieu of rent equivalent to

75 per cent. of the annual rent to which the holding was subject at the passing of this Act, which sum is hereinafter referred to as "payment in lieu of rent."

(2) Payment in lieu of rent shall be collected by the Land Commission in accordance with rules made by them.

(3) Payment in lieu of rent shall continue to be payable up to the appointed day.

(4) There shall be payable by the Land Commission to the person or persons entitled to receive the same a sum equal to the amount to be collected as payment in lieu of rent, from the gale day next preceding the date of the passing of this Act up to the appointed day, less income tax and such deduction towards cost of such collection as the Land Commission shall consider reasonable and proper. This sum, less such deductions as aforesaid, shall be paid in equal half-yearly instalments and in accordance with rules made by the Land Commission.

(5) If the interest of any person entitled to receive the rent of a holding or holdings shall not be sufficient to constitute him a person having power to sell to tenants under the Land Purchase Acts, any rent payable by him to the next superior landlord in respect of the holding or holdings shall be reduced by 25 per cent., and, if necessary for the purpose of ascertaining the rent payable by such person in respect of the lands comprised in the holding or holdings, any rent payable by him shall be apportioned by the Land Commission as the justice of the case may require. Similar provisions shall apply and proportionate reductions shall be made in the case of any superior rents payable by any superior landlords who have not an interest sufficient to constitute them persons entitled to sell under the Land Purchase Acts.

Amendment:—"In Sub-section (1), line 42, to insert after the word 'Act' the words: 'in the case of any tenant the total rateable valuation of whose holdings exceeds thirty pounds, or of whose holding more than one-half is permanent pasture, or 50 per cent. of the annual rent to which the holding was subject at the passing of this Act in the case of any tenant the total rateable valuation of whose holdings does not exceed thirty pounds or of whose holdings not more than one half is permanent pasture.'"

Mr. DAVIN: I formally move this amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: I cannot accept this amendment. I do not propose to go into the reasons, which I have stated already on the amendment to Section 16.

Amendment put and lost.

Amendment by Mr. FitzGibbon:—"In Sub-section (4), to insert after the words 'Income Tax' the words 'less the usual deduction of one-eighth.'"

Mr. FITZGIBBON: That amendment

goes along with the other one, and I ask permission to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment by Mr. FitzGibbon: "To delete Sub-section (5)."

Mr. FITZGIBBON: Since I put down this amendment I have received explanations which have satisfied me that it is unnecessary, and I beg leave to withdraw it also.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made and question put:—"That Section 17 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 18.

(1) The Land Commission shall have for the recovery of compounded arrears of rent and payment in lieu of rent the same remedies as a landlord has for recovery of rent as well as the same remedies as they have for the recovery of unpaid instalments of a purchase annuity.

(2) The Land Commission may, if they think fit, employ in the collection of compounded arrears of rent and payment in lieu of rent any land agent, solicitor or land clerk nominated by the immediate landlord, or in default of such nomination, selected by them on such terms as to remuneration and otherwise as may be prescribed by rules made by them.

Amendment by Mr. Duggan:—

"To insert a new Sub-section after Sub-section (1), as follows:—"Where, owing to the death or absence of the tenant of a holding or otherwise, a difficulty arises in ascertaining in whom the tenancy of a holding is vested, the Land Commission may, if the tenant is dead and there is no legal personal representative of such tenant, or no legal personal representative whose services are available, appoint any person to be administrator of the deceased tenant, limited to the purposes of all proceedings under this Act in relation to the holding, up to the appointed day, and if the tenant is absent, or if, in their opinion, it is otherwise necessary, nominate any person to represent the tenant for the purposes aforesaid. The person so appointed or nominated, while acting in such capacity, shall have the right as against all parties to enter into receipt of the profits of the holding or of the rents payable by the sub-tenant thereon, and shall be liable to the Land Commission for compounded arrears of Rent and Payment in lieu of rent payable under the provisions of this Act."

Mr. DUGGAN: I move the amendment, which provides that where a tenant dies, leaving no legal personal representative, or even in the very unlikely event of the tenant disappearing, that the Land Commission may appoint a person to represent the tenant for the purpose of proceedings under the Act.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made and question put:—

"That Section 18 as amended stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Motion made and question put:

"That Section 19 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 20.

(1) Where a holding is sub-let in whole or in part the rent payable by any sub-tenant to the tenant thereof shall, as from the gale day next preceding the date of the passing of this Act, be reduced by 25 per cent.

(2) No tenant shall be entitled to recover from a sub-tenant any greater sum in respect of arrears of rent than a sum ascertained in like manner as compounded arrears of rent are to be ascertained under this Act.

(3) This section shall not apply to any sub-letting made for the purpose of temporary depasturage, agistment or conacre, or for temporary convenience or to meet a temporary necessity.

Amendment by Mr. W. Sears:—

"In Sub-section (1), to insert after the word 'holding' the words 'to which this Act applies.'"

Mr. DUGGAN: In the absence of Deputy Sears I beg to move this amendment, which is merely a drafting amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I beg to move that Sub-Section (3) be deleted. Clause 20 allows the reduction which the tenant gets, in case this Bill applies to him, to be passed on to a sub-tenant of his, but it shuts out, in Sub-Section (3), a class of people who are, in my opinion, entitled to get this relief also. In some parts of the country small tenants, tenants of uneconomic holdings especially, take conacre on the farms of larger tenants to a very considerable extent, and these people would be benefitted if this Section were deleted. I think that as the tenant gets a relief himself he should pass on the relief to those who are paying him rent, even though it might be of a temporary nature. In some places, as a matter of fact, although conacre is of a temporary character legally or nominally, still there are cases where small tenants bordering on large farms have conacre year after year, and if the tenant of such a farm purchases his land and gets a reduction I think that benefit should be passed on to these as well as the regular sub-tenant provided for in Sub-Section (2).

Mr. HOGAN: I do not think the Deputy is alive to the full implications of his amendment. You have a number of temporary lettings for several different reasons and if you pass on this reduction as a general rule, in perhaps the great majority of cases you would be doing a very big hardship to people who make temporary lettings for all sorts of reasons. Take the case of a man who dies and who leaves a wife and young family, none of them able to take up the land. It is a purely commercial transaction. They get the person who takes a temporary letting as a tenancy, a purely commercial transaction, making no claim whatever to the land, having no tenant right, not even a future tenancy, and having it simply because he thinks he can make a profit out of it at the rent. This Bill deals with all tenancies, even future tenancies, but it does not deal with the sort of people who take land in this fashion temporarily as a gamble, as they do in most cases—as a business transaction, in order to make a profit. They look into every aspect of it, and as business men they make their calculations, and make quite sure, as far as they can look forward, to making a reasonable profit out of it. The commonest case of all is the case I have just mentioned, because for one reason or another, perhaps owing to shortage of cash, perhaps the tenant is dead and his wife is unable to run the farm, she makes a temporary letting, and she is probably not able to make nearly as much money as if she were working the farm herself. She lets it to a man who has capital to spare, and who hopes and expects, and probably makes sure, that he takes it at a rent which will leave him a fair profit. It would not be right or fair to apply the provisions in regard to the reduction of rent to such cases. These provisions deal with cases of people who have a certain right to the land over and above the particular agreement which began the tenancy, and it would be most unfair in cases like these that are not being dealt with by the Bill at all to extend the same benefits to them. If the Deputy will think out the cases that are likely to come under that section, then, I think, he will agree that it would be unfair to reduce their rents. They are not tenants and they have no claim anyone can think of, morally or otherwise to the land. There may be a few cases of conacre tenants who have not enough land and who are forced to take land in this fashion. We are trying to deal with them otherwise than by the Bill. We are taking all the powers we can for the relief of congestion, and we hope that will not happen in future. By far the greater number of cases that come in under Sub-section 3 are the kind I mentioned, such as owing to the death of the tenant, his wife is unable to work the land and she lets it to a business man who takes it as business transaction, after going into all the facts and figures, and generally who is able to make a far bigger profit than the tenant who is not able to make anything like as much as she or he would make if in a position to work the land.

Amendment put and lost.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 20, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 21.

(1) Subject to the provisions of this Act and notwithstanding anything contained in any other enactment, all tenanted land wherever situated and all untenanted land situated in any congested districts county and such untenanted land situated elsewhere as the Land Commission shall, before the appointed day, declare to be required for the purpose of relieving congestion or of facilitating the resale of tenanted land, shall by virtue of this Act vest in the Land Commission on the appointed day, in the like manner and with the like consequences as if vesting orders under the Land Purchase Acts had been made on the appointed day in respect thereof in pursuance of subsequent purchase agreements entered into by the Land Commission with the respective owners of the lowest interest in the land constituting an interest saleable under the Land Purchase Acts, at a price fixed by or under this Act.

(2) The foregoing sub-section shall not apply to:—

- (a) Any land which has been purchased under the Land Purchase Acts or is on the appointed day the subject of an actual purchase agreement thereunder lodged with the Land Commission before the date of the passing of this Act, or
- (b) Any land which is not substantially agricultural or pastoral or partly agricultural and partly pastoral in character, or any land comprised in a holding the main object of the letting of which was for a residence, or
- (c) Any parcel of untenanted land which is a demesne, home farm, park, garden, or pleasure ground or any holding usually occupied by a person regularly employed on such demesne, home farm, park, garden or pleasure ground, or
- (d) Any holding or parcel of untenanted land which in the opinion of the Land Commission possesses a substantial value or utility whether potential or actual as building ground, or
- (e) Any land which is vested in or held in trust for the State or any Government Department, or is held by any local or public authority for the purposes of their powers and duties as such, or is held by any corporation for the purposes of a railway, tramway, dock, canal, water, gas, electricity or other public undertaking.

(3) Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing sub-sections, where the Land Commission before the appointed day declare in the prescribed manner that any land wherever situated, hereinbefore excluded from the operation of this section (other than land which comes within the description in Clause (e) of sub-section (2) of this section), is required for the purpose of relieving congestion, then such land shall vest in the Land Commission pursuant to this section.

(4) For the purposes of this section the expression "home farm" means a farm used for the convenience or advantage of the landlord's residence and in connection therewith, and not merely as an ordinary farm for the purposes of profit.

Mr. DE ROISTE: I move: "To add after the word 'land,' Sub-section (1), the words 'or such land, however owned or held, as may be required for the reinstatement of a former tenant thereof, or his representative, under Section 28.'" I desire to be brief in proposing this amendment, and I do not desire to dilate on the hardships suffered by evicted tenants, or to make any appeal to sentiment in this matter. The purpose of the Bill, as I take it, is declared in Section 21, that the land be vested in the Land Commission for the purpose of relieving congestion, and facilitating the purchase of untenanted land. The purpose of my amendment is that power be also given to the Land Commission to deal with cases of evicted tenants. It is the first of a series of amendments. The others follow from this one if it is accepted. The amendment I propose does not mean that automatically the question of the evicted tenants is raised. It means that the power is given to the Land Commission, and the officials connected with the Land Commission, to investigate the cases. If they are fraudulent cases naturally they will be thrown out. If they are genuine cases it is only justice to those who fought the land war in the past that their cases should be considered. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I was wondering whether, on a point of order, it would facilitate matters if my amendment were taken first? It includes the matter in which Deputy de Roiste moves, but mine is of a rather wider nature, and it is certainly intended to include what is covered in Deputy de Roiste's amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: "Or for the development of agriculture or otherwise in the public interest." Deputy O'Connell is going on the assumption that it would be to the public interest to reinstate the former tenant or his representative.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Yes. Provision is made that that may be done under Section 28.

Mr. DE ROISTE: As a matter of order, I think, Deputy O'Connell's amendment should have come first, as his is the wider one. If the wider one is not carried then the narrower one could not be proposed.

Mr. HENNESSY: I think Deputy de Roiste's is a reasonable amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Wait till we decide the question of which amendment comes first. Will Deputy de Roiste allow his amendment to stand or fall by Deputy O'Connell's?

Mr. DE ROISTE: After his, I am quite satisfied.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If Deputy O'Connell's amendment is carried Deputy de Roiste's will not be moved?

Mr. DE ROISTE: Yes. If his is carried it covers my amendment. If his is defeated then I propose my amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then we will take Deputy O'Connell's amendment first.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I move: "In Sub-section (1), to insert after the word 'land' the words 'or for the development of agriculture or otherwise in the public interest.'" The Section provides that land may be automatically vested in the Land Commission, but only for the specific purpose of relieving congestion. Section 21 provides that all tenanted land shall be acquired, and it, of course, will be ordinarily sold to the tenant who occupies the land. It provides also that all untenanted land in the Congested Districts themselves will be used to enlarge congested holdings. It also provides that untenanted land in other districts may be acquired, but only, as I say, for the specific purpose of relieving congestion, or facilitating the sale of untenanted land. Land may be acquired for other purposes.

The purpose for which Deputy de Roiste raised amendments is intended for the sale to the evicted tenants or for the provision of holdings for evicted tenants. The provision is made in Section 28 by which advances may be made or provision may be made to provide land for the evicted tenants, and also under Sub-section (1) (d) of Section 28 for labourers. Under (E) any other person may get advances or holdings may be provided for them. There is no provision, however, whereby land could be got except in the rather slow and tedious process provided for under Section 32 I think. There is no provision by which land could be got for this specific purpose. We think that provision should be made under Section 21 by which land could be acquired by the Land Commission for such purposes as are mentioned in Section 28. The land could be automatically acquired under the provisions of this Section. There are other matters too for which it might be highly desirable to acquire land or small portions of land. But the Land Commission may find itself debarred by reason of limitations in this Section. During the Second Reading I mentioned that it would be possible to have in certain areas model farms or small plots which could be used for educational purposes in connection with a scheme that may be developed or introduced for agricultural education in connection with a county or district school or they may require small plots in connection with the National schools. That would be another purpose. That land must be provided for out of the tenanted land that is retained by the Land Commission. Naturally the tenants will object to that. Or that land might be provided for out of untenanted land that will be purchased, and this does not fix the terms of purchase and does not provide for arbitration as to the price and it may not operate compulsorily. The Land Commission may find themselves in this position that they would be able to acquire a large farm of one hundred and fifty to two hundred acres of untenanted land to relieve congestion. But if it wanted a quarter acre plot for experimental purposes or a few acres for a school farm it would have to go through a tedious process set out in Section 32. That is why I suggest that the words set out in the amendment should be inserted in this Section: That is that they have a right to acquire land for the development of agriculture or otherwise in the public interest. The matters which can be included in that would be at the discretion of the Land Commission and I think it would give them a bigger scope than what they have at present under this Section.

Mr. HOGAN: The Amendment reads "or for the development of agriculture or otherwise in the public interest" the Land Commission is to have compulsory powers to acquire land not only for the relief of congestion and for facilitating the resale of untenanted land but also for the development of agriculture and in the public interest. That is an extraordinarily wide clause. This is a Land Purchase Bill. It proposes to buy land from the owners and to resell it to tenants for agricultural purposes. Deputies should not endeavour to make this Bill a Bill for the Acquisition of Land for all purposes. That is unsound. When we legislate we should at least know what we intend to do. Apart from any other consideration there would be a great many objections to giving the Land Commission such wide powers. They can acquire land for a railway, and not only could they acquire land for a railway but they could acquire congest holdings and pay the owners in accordance with the terms set out in the Bill. Very probably there would not be the same unanimity about the price then. They can acquire land for any conceivable purposes, public buildings, railways, anything else you like to think of. There is nothing to stop them. All the terms of this Bill would apply to such land regardless of the purposes for which it was acquired; for something never intended in the Bill, and acquire it from people from whom it was never intended to take land. We should confine ourselves to Land Purchase. We should make sure that we have at least a fair general idea of the powers we are giving the Land Commission or any Government Department under them, though the development of agriculture might mean anything else. Remember you are giving these powers over all lands, over the lands of tenants, over lands of landlords and fee farms; all sorts and conditions of land for agricultural development at the discretion of a public department or otherwise in the public interest. Surely that would be giving almost arbitrary powers to the Land Commission and powers that may be capable of being abused. As a general principle it is unsound to legislate in such general terms. I want the Dáil to confine the Bill to Land Purchase, and if you want to take land for railways or any other purpose let us pass an Act. Let us go into the details of the case and know exactly what it is we want to do. Deputy de Roiste is anxious to see that there is sufficient land provided for the evicted tenants. That is strictly one of the purposes of this Bill. He is entitled to be assured that we have made provisions to acquire sufficient land to deal with all genuine cases of evicted tenants within the period which is prescribed in the Bill. I want to make one thing clear in the Bill and that is that it is primarily for the relief of congests. We have been talking all the afternoon and evening about the arrears and about the question of price, and on the question of price we spent a long time, but the real question, the real sore that is to be salved is this of the congests. This problem of the congests is the real question to be dealt with. I am hopeful, not so much that the tenants will find a big difference in their rents, but that they will find themselves in economic holdings as a result of this Bill. If that is done the real difficulty will be solved. It is quite easy to make the tenants the owners of their own holdings and to make advances to landless men, and put them on holdings which will give them a chance of succeeding. But the problem of the congests is one of immense difficulty, and I want to make it clear that it is the problem to which we gave the greatest care. I want to show that the congests have first claim. There are a great many difficulties. There is the difficulty, as I pointed out before, that if you even have the land, you may not have enough of land in the right place to meet that. We are taking the power to take land already purchased. I may say that only in extreme cases will we go to land already purchased, and only where we could get no other. But we are only taking these powers. Even with these powers we will not be able to deal with congestion in the West, or to deal with it in the neighbourhood of particular estates where congestion exists; there will have to be migration. You have the difficulty there that congests are not willing to leave and the second difficulty that you have the landless man and other possible aspirants to land in the neighbourhood to which they are going, hostile to them. We must do everything we can to remove these difficulties, if we are to solve this problem of congestion. I think that we have done a good lot to remove these difficulties, both from the point of view of the migrant difficulties that will be met by migrating the landless men and the tenant in the neighbourhood to which he has been migrated. We must make it perfectly clear in the Dáil that we are going to deal with congests first. Congests have a greater claim than evicted tenants. A large number of evicted tenants have already been dealt with. There are a large number still to be dealt with, but we cannot hope to go back and remedy all those wrongs which were done for the last 30 years. We are not in a position in the country to help every person. We are not in a position to pay consequential damages to people whose property has been destroyed within the last 3 years. We do not pretend that we can. We are not able to remedy all the grievances, even with regard to evicted tenants, that have accumulated for the last 40 years. Further, we have to take the country as we find it. We have to remember that a number of vested interests have grown up around certain holdings. There are cases where tenants were evicted long before '81, and I know that Deputy Liam de Roiste has tabled an amendment asking us to go back long before '81. There are cases where tenants were evicted from holdings at present in the possession of religious orders and public establishments of all kinds. But there were tenancies that changed hands five times between 1870 and 1881. There were people who came in 20 years ago and bought some tenancies for more than their full value, and with the consent of everyone. We could not take those tenancies away without paying compensation. Further, there are evicted tenants' holdings belonging to people who are living or whose representatives are alive, and we could not place those back, because if they were in occupation of those holdings possibly we would have taken them from them to relieve congestion. All sorts of vested interests have grown up within 30 years, and we cannot hope to wipe them out, and make things right as we could 40 or 50 years ago. If we face the country as it is at the moment with the big problem of congestion, with thousands of tenants huddled together on the West Coast of Connaught, and practically in all parts of the country, and if we deal effectively with that, and go on to deal with the resources at our disposal with the evicted man later, we will be taking the problem in its proper sequence. In Clause 21, to give you an idea of the problem, we are automatically taking up every perch of untenanted land in the province of Connaught, in Kerry, in Donegal, part of Cork and Clare, and yet that will not be sufficient to deal with the congestion in those particular areas. We go practically outside those counties because we can acquire the land compulsorily wherever we require it, and we can take up and acquire demesnes or even purchased holdings where we require them, and where we can get no other land. Although we have to take up automatically all the land in the Congested District counties I have named, yet the land will not be sufficient to deal with the congests within the Congested Districts. Nevertheless we will be able to reinstate a considerable number of evicted tenants in those districts on those lands, and we will be able to sell to landless men a considerable number of holdings for this reason. On one estate there will be very little congestion. You buy an estate, you deal with congestion, you may only have 4 or 5 holdings to deal with, and may have 30 parcels of untenanted land. You may bring in a congest there or put in landless men or representatives of the evicted tenants. Take the case of another estate. Here you may have far less land than would relieve congestion. The first case may be at one end of the county, the second at the other end. It may be more convenient to go outside Connaught and migrate the congests to where you find sufficient land in some other parts of the country. In any case congestion is so scattered and variable that you have to buy untenanted land practically everywhere for its relief. The largest percentage of the evicted tenants come from the province of Connaught. Can we do more in that than take up every perch of untenanted land? What else in an Act of Parliament would meet the situation in a better way or give the tenants better terms? Let the Deputies consider that. It is very nice to be putting in big words about the development of agriculture and evicted tenants and all the rest of it in Acts of Parliament. Nothing you could put into that Bill would do any more for the evicted tenants that were evicted from Connaught than we have done already, because we have arranged to take up every perch of untenanted land in Connaught. A somewhat similar process will operate outside if the Bill is taken into operation. Practically everywhere untenanted land will be taken up. We will deal with the congests first, the evicted tenant next, and the landless men after. We cannot take the risk of leaving the congested districts as they are, and we cannot deal with the problem in any other sequence than by dealing with the congests first, then with the evicted tenants, and then the landless men. If I am right practically all the untenanted land will be cleared for the purposes of the Bill. We can do no more. If you agree with me that the sequence is right—congests, evicted tenants, and then genuine landless men—and if you agree with me that we will be able to break up practically all the available land for the relief of congestion, even though when we take it up we will not be able to deal with all landless men, then I cannot see how you can improve the Bill by anything else.

[Mr. Hogan.]

You will merely raise false hopes; you will merely make the difficulties greater; you will make the difficulties of migrating congests greater.

Mr. JOHNSON: I hope I have misunderstood the argument of the Minister because it seems to lead to this conclusion, that the problem of relieving congestion will eat up all the untenanted land that may be taken in any part of the country.

Mr. HOGAN: That is not exactly what I said.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. HOGAN: I tried to explain the point. If you take the province of Connaught, where we are taking up every perch of untenanted land first, what is going to happen there? You have an estate where there are three or four congests and you find you are able to deal with them and have hundreds of acres of land over. You must take up the whole estate. You have taken it up automatically and you find you are able to deal with three or four congests. Over and above that you have 7 or 8 parcels of land. It is open to you to bring into that land migrants from other estates. It is also open to the Land Commission to say: "well it would be more suitable to give this land to the landless men of the neighbourhood and to migrate the congests that exist elsewhere in the congested districts to some place outside the congested districts." They might be on the borders and they might go outside. The point I am making is you will have to take up all the land. Congestion is so variable and so widespread; it is more intense in one area, it is less intense in another area. So far as Connaught is concerned you will have to take up all the untenanted land in order to deal with the problem there. Even though you have taken up all the untenanted lands, you will not have sufficient land to deal with all the congests, and you will find it necessary to send some of them outside. You will also find in your rearrangements that it would suit better to give certain holdings to landless men on an estate rather than bring in congests to it, and as a compensation for that to take out congests and put them somewhere else. It is a matter of rearrangement. Outside the congested areas, let us take it that the Land Commission buy 1,000 acres of land and that acreage is held under the one title. They have to buy the whole of it; they are not going to buy 2 or 3 holdings out of it. They may require only 50 acres of that for congests. There may be one congest in the neighbourhood and when he is dealt with, the balance is all for landless men. Though they acquire the land compulsorily for the relief of congestion, they buy it because it is held under one title; it is just one estate, one farm, one parcel of untenanted land. They buy it for the relief of congestion. There may be 1,000 acres in it and they may require only 200 acres for the relief of congestion, but they must buy it all. They dispose of the 200 acres for the relief of congestion and they have the balance for landless men. They have acquired the whole parcel—that is the technical name—the whole estate if you like, for the relief of congestion; but they will find that they have large areas which they do not require for relieving congestion.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. JOHNSON: I see the point of the Minister more clearly. It seems to me that much of the argument would tend to support the object of the amendment—that there should be power given for such untenanted land to be acquired outside of these parcels on compulsory terms for such purposes as are admittedly in the public interest—if you like in the interests of agriculture, if one likes to confine it to agricultural purposes. That is the general idea underlying the amendment; but there may well be needs which would require the acquisition of land for this purpose even to fit in with the case the Minister has made. Take the sequence in Section 28. In paragraph (c) we find "any other person to whom, in the opinion of the Land Commission, an advance ought to be made." If the opinion of the Land Commission were that an advance ought to be made to a certain person or persons, and that land could not be acquired under the terms of the Bill in the place where these persons would be inconvenienced or benefited, then there should be within the Bill provision for the acquisition, under the terms of the Bill, of such untenanted land as they may consider desirable. We have in mind purposes such as has been mentioned by Deputy O'Connell—the school farm, for instance, the case of landless men or labourers, who may well be in the opinion of the Land Commission, persons to whom advances ought to be made. But there may be no untenanted land, at least there may be no land acquired under the scheme for the relief of congestion which may be convenient for the occupancy of those people to whom the Land Commission think advances ought to be made. There is no intention in this amendment, I am sure, to defeat the intentions or desires of the Minister in the administration of the Bill. It is honestly intended as an improvement, and to meet what we conceive to be the intentions of the Minister; but the restriction he has spoken of would deprive the Land Commission of the power to acquire land except at prices which might well be exorbitant inasmuch as they have to be by agreement, and there is no appeal. The case that is made is that the ultimate object of the Bill is to secure land purchase for the development of agriculture. Surely, it is not a very great extension, or is not incompatible with the general intention, that the development of agriculture should be one of the purposes for which land might well be acquired under the Bill in addition to the relief of congestion. I think the amendment is distinctly in accord with the intentions of the Minister, as he has himself outlined, and I am rather astonished that he should resist it, though I think he resisted it because he imagines there is some ulterior purpose in it.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I do not see why this amendment should be passed. If I happened, instead of being what I am, to be a forty-acre freeholder—not a landlord at all, but a person who, by mere accident, happened to be in possession of 40 acres of freehold land, which I farmed and worked in the ordinary way—I see no reason why the Land Commission, at a price to be fixed by themselves, should take my 40 acre farm from me in order to give it to somebody else, or to set up an experimental farm, or to use it for what they themselves might consider to be a public purpose. This amendment would confer power on the Land Commission to take the farm from any man who owned it and farmed it, and whose forbears had owned it and farmed it from time immemorial, at their own price, in order to make it an experimental farm, or to give it to an evicted tenant who never was evicted from it at all, and who never owned it. If a public body are going to take land for public purposes in that way, they ought to take it at the price which the owner would get for it in the market. This amendment might apply to the owner of any plot of land, however small, in any part of the country. It does not seem to me to be the sort of amendment that should be put into a Bill to enable tenants to buy out their holdings, and to provide from persons who have too much land in Congested Districts economic farms for the congested.

Mr. LYONS: In supporting this amendment I would like to ask the Minister if he takes into account the large farms that are outside the province of Connacht. I know a particular farm of 770 acres on which there is a landlord and tenant. The Minister may call that tenanted land, because there is one employé. The owner was prosecuted for the licence of the dog that the man takes with him around the land. Is it really democratic, in any shape or form, to allow a person like that to retain possession of 770 acres of land?

Mr. HOGAN: Read the Bill—Section 27.

Mr. LYONS: I have read Section 27. There are many people living in the vicinity of that ranch, and it is but right that it should be divided. I would like to ask the Minister, now that he admits in this Bill that the evicted tenants should be reinstated, does he realise the necessity of giving these evicted tenants compensation for the time they were out of their farms, through being illegally evicted?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is another question altogether.

The PRESIDENT: How much would the Deputy give them?

Mr. LYONS: If he gave them as much as he gave the landlords, they would be highly compensated.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Under Section 28 provision is made for advances and holdings for several classes of people. That includes evicted tenants, labourers, landless men and, generally speaking, under 1 (c) of that Section, "any other person to whom, in the opinion of the Land Commission, an advance ought to be made." Power is given to the Land Commission to acquire compulsorily and automatically such land as may be required for the relief of congestion. I unhesitatingly agree with the Minister when he says that the relief of congestion is the most important thing to which this Bill refers, and the most important work it sets out to accomplish. There is no difference whatsoever about that. But suppose the Land Commission finds that it wants to give land to evicted tenants, how is it to proceed? The only way, if it has not enough land to relieve congestion and to give holdings to the evicted tenants, is to provide for the evicted tenants through the operation of Section 32. In that case, it can only acquire the land after agreement with the owner as to price. There is no appeal to arbitration; and if the owner is not agreeable to accept the price offered, or to accept the market price, as Deputy Fitzgibbon mentioned, they cannot compel the owner of this land under Section 32 to hand it over, even though they may want it for the evicted tenants. All that this amendment proposes is that, if such land is wanted for that purpose, or for the other purposes set out in the Bill, there should be power to acquire it.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

As a matter of fact, I only suggested one additional use for which the land might be required—school plots or school farms. All the amendment seeks is that power should be taken under Section 21 to acquire land if required for any of these purposes. The Minister read into the amendment—rightly, perhaps—things that were never intended. It was not intended—though the wording might lend itself to that reading—to deal with any purposes outside agricultural purposes, pure and simple. I was not thinking of railways or houses. The only object I had in mind was that the Land Commission should have power to acquire land for the purposes which the Minister has set out in his own Bill.

Mr. WARD: There is one feature of this question in which I am particularly interested, and that has reference to the evicted tenants. I had intended raising this question under Section 28, but as it has been raised under Section 21, I would like to get an assurance from the Minister in respect of a certain body of evicted tenants in which I am specially interested. The Minister in his statement suggested that congests have a better claim than evicted tenants, that there would not be sufficient available land to deal with congests in the congested counties, and that they would have to go outside these counties to provide for the congested tenants. He quoted certain cases of tenancies which had changed hands five or six times since 1881.

I want to give a case of an estate from which the tenants had been evicted, but the estate is still in the hands of the landlord, and I should like to get an expression of opinion from the Minister for Agriculture as to what exactly is going to happen in the case. I am perfectly satisfied with the Bill as it stands, because the land on that estate will pass into the hands of the Government and the Land Commission, and then the question arises how it will be dealt with. The estate to which I desire particularly to call attention is known as the Adair Estate and from this estate fifty or sixty tenants with their families were evicted wholesale in the year 1860, and the estate was turned into a deer-park by the owner, John Adair. That land is still a deer-park, and the descendants of the tenants, and some of the actual tenants, are alive still and are living round the neighbourhood, others are scattered in foreign countries. Section 28 of this Bill deals with persons evicted 25 years before the passing of the Act of 1903. That does not carry us back to the year 1860. In addition it deals with tenants evicted on ejectionment for non-payment of rent. I do not want to go into the history of this case, but anyone who knows anything of the history of the Land War in Ireland will find the record of this case of the Adair Estate. It was really a question of spite on the part of the landlord against the tenants; it attracted great attention at the time, and was well known throughout Ireland. It was not a question of non-payment of rent, and, therefore, would not come within paragraph (c) of Section 28; it may come within paragraph (e), but by that time probably there would be no land left when you had dealt with the congests, landless persons, persons evicted from 1878, and labourers, all of whom come within paragraph (e). I do not think there can be any question in a case like that, that the people who have first claim on an estate like the Adair Estate, are those who were flung out on the roadside, and for whom subscriptions had to be raised to ship some of them to Australia to make their way the best they could in life. As I have stated some of these people are living still in the neighbourhood, but possess no land. I do not think you would find even the congests in Donegal would press their claim in a case like this before the claims of the representatives of the tenants who were evicted from this estate at the time of which I speak. This is a question that can be dealt with when the estate passes into the hands of the Land Commission, and I want an expression of opinion from the Minister that he will consider the necessity of bringing within the provisions of the Bill an estate like the Adair Estate, and that he will remember that the descendants of those tenants still claim that that land is theirs.

Mr. HOGAN: I am in a position to reassure Deputy Ward that Donegal is one of the counties in which we will take up every perch of untenanted land we can get. We can do no more; and when we take up that land automatically it will be a question for the State Department to divide large farms as between the congests and the evicted tenants. The Deputy will agree we can do no more than take over all the available land, and I hope I will be able to reassure him on the other points when we come to Section 28. Of course, I would have to hear his proposition, and when I hear it I will consider sympathetically any proposition he is prepared to make in regard to any particular case he knows of.

I do not suspect any arrière pensée in regard to Deputy O'Connell's amendment. I am satisfied that the Bill as it stands meets the intention which the Deputy has in mind much more fairly than if the amendment were inserted and if every interest were invited to stake its claim.

Amendment put and declared lost.

LIAM DE ROISTE: I beg to move the following amendment:—To add after the word 'land' in Sub-section (1), line 60, the words 'or such land, however owned or held, as may be required for the reinstatement of a former tenant thereof or his representative under section 28.' "

The last case, as I take it, was made for general purposes. The arguments against it were that it was too general. May I now state the particular case of the evicted tenants, and to my mind Deputy Ward has practically made that case. This amendment is directed to give to the Land Commission power to deal with the evicted tenants question. The purpose, as section 21 declares, is for the relief of congestion and to facilitate the re-sale of tenanted land. My amendment is directed so that the Land Commission would have power to take land for the reinstatement of evicted tenants. I must say that I, in common with many persons here and probably throughout the country, was under the impression that this Bill was intended to deal, as far as possible, with every land problem. I infer from the statement of the Minister for Agriculture that it is principally to deal with congestion and to facilitate land purchase and for other particular purposes that he has in mind, but that it was not intended primarily for dealing with other things connected with the land problem. Still, even though we were labouring under a misapprehension in that respect, it surely must be admitted by the Minister for Agriculture that it is the interest of every person to try and make this Bill applicable to every case, so that some of the problems that have been agitating farmers and owners of land in this country for some time past, should come under this Bill and should be met, and that as far as humanly possible, when this matter is first dealt with in an Irish Parliament we should get a settlement of these problems now so that they may not come forward again. I infer from what the Minister said that it may be necessary later on when congestion is relieved and land purchase facilitated to bring in an Evicted Tenants Bill, but as we are dealing with the question now it surely is, as I say, the right of everybody who has an interest in the land question to try and make this Bill applicable to all the other problems. The purpose of the amendment I have already stated.

Mr. HOGAN: As the Deputy does not seem to know it already, this Bill deals with other problems besides congestion. It deals with evicted tenants and landless men. It is not a Bill to give everything to everybody, and does not profess to be.

Mr. HENNESSY: I know myself there are numerous claims by evicted tenants. Some of these claims may be perfectly sound and many of them are, perhaps, unsound. I quite see that the Minister for Agriculture has just as much sympathy for the evicted tenants as any of us, and I know thoroughly well that he will deal with them sympathetically. At all events, there are many cases which the Bill does not provide for, and to my mind these require investigation. As Deputy de Roiste points out, this amendment purports to give certain powers to the Land Commission to investigate all these claims, and I think that, to consider the large number of claims that are in course of preparation it will be essential the moment this Bill becomes law to provide the Land Commission with some such machinery to examine the sound and the unsound claims.

Amendment put

The Committee divided: Tâ, 16; Níl, 35.

Tâ.

Seán Ó Duinnín.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Tomás de Nóglá.
Liam de Róiste.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Broin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Risteárd Mac Fheorais.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mag Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Seán Mac Gurruidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Domhnall Mac Cátaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Earnán Altún.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Liam Mag Aonghusa
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.

Piarras Béaslaí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Alasdair Mac Cába.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seamus de Burea.
Seamus Ó Dólaín.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. HOGAN: I move to report progress until to-morrow.

Agreed.

DAIL RESUMES.

Progress reported, Committee to sit again to-morrow.

THE ADJOURNMENT.

OCCUPATION OF BUILDINGS BY MILITARY.

Mr. JOHNSON: During the question time to-day a question was put by Deputy Corish respecting the proposed acquisition of an hospital by the military authorities. That question led to a series of supplementaries and answers which suggested to me that an important matter was being raised and an issue which required some consideration. I knew nothing of the matter until I heard the questions, but it appears from the discussion that the military authorities in Wexford county have come to the conclusion that they require to occupy a certain public building, which is an hospital, and they announce their intention to occupy it, and having come to the conclusion that they require the hospital nothing more is to be said. It seems to me that it is important that we should understand what is the view of the Ministry on such a matter. Many things are allowable to the military authorities; many things are excusable, many things are justifiable in time of military stress or war, but many of these things which are at such a time justifiable are not allowable or justifiable in time of peace. It seemed to me from the discussion that took place by question and answer that this was an occasion when something more than the mere will of the military authorities should have effect. If the military authorities say they require this hospital, and the Local Government Department, or the Local County Homes Committee say that this hospital is required for civic purposes for the use of the county for the sick persons there, then there should be some other course adopted to decide which authority should have possession of this hospital.

I thought it necessary to raise this matter on the adjournment for the purpose of elucidating the mind of the Ministry, and more particularly to find out whether there is any real necessity in this single instance for the military to override the wishes of the County authority. Surely, it cannot be said that it is stress of war that makes it necessary for the Ministry of Defence to take possession of this hospital. It is a military convenience I have no doubt or they would not seek to concentrate their forces in that particular place, but a military convenience is not sufficient, I submit, in time of peace to give authority to the Ministry of Defence to evict patients from a public hospital. If that authority should not prevail in time of peace in the case of this hospital in question, then we would understand that it would not prevail in any similar case in any other part of the country. I think the way the matter was raised and the answers that were given justify and warrant us raising the matter in this way, and will allow perhaps of a clearer exposition of the position of the Ministry and the desires of the County Board of Health to be stated, better than the cross examination that was taking place during question time.

Mr. CORISH: This is looked upon as a very serious matter in Gorey district and in fact in the whole County Wexford. The matter has been explained to me in this way. "More than three months ago, the Military authorities at Gorey notified the Matron of the Auxiliary Hospital that they were about to take over the Convent quarters attached to the old Union. The Matron immediately wrote me and I went there and saw two officers—Commandants O'Brien and McCrea.

After a long discussion it was finally agreed that if the Military were to take the Convent a new Hospital should be provided for the District, and two vacant residences in the vicinity—St. Wallard's, about half a mile from the town, and a place which belonged to people named Cooney, near the Railway Station—were mentioned as being suitable if converted. The matter rested there for some time. In the meantime the Sisters, moved by a sentimental attachment for their Convent, had sent representations to General Mulcahy, and they were led to understand by him that the Convent would not be interfered with. I never received an official intimation to this effect. On last Monday, the 25th instant, the Matron received written notice that the Convent and District Hospital were to be taken over. She told the Military Authorities to inform me. She attempted to 'phone me herself but could not get through. I learned accidentally of the matter and went to Gorey on Thursday. In the meantime the Matron had again been in consultation with General Mulcahy who had told her that she was not to be disturbed. On my arrival at Gorey there was a further letter from the Military stating definitely that the District Hospital would be taken over on the 28th July. I tried to see somebody in authority but failed. I told the Matron that I had not received any official intimation of the Military intentions and that she was not to take notice of communications addressed to her."

This is a very serious matter and certainly one would think that a matter of this kind ought to be settled in Dublin, that is, that the Minister for Defence should get into touch with the Minister for Local Government before doing anything of this kind. This hospital was conferred upon Gorey because of strong representations made when amalgamation was about to be brought into force in the county. Any of us who were engaged in formulating the scheme received numbers of representations from the Gorey district with a view to having an hospital there. They were given a hospital which I think accommodates 22 patients and it is a very serious matter for the Military to go in and turn out those people on the street. I do not know how many patients are there at the moment but there is certainly accommodation for 22 and I think that the Secretary of the County Board of Health should be acquainted before such a drastic order as that was served on the Matron, especially a Matron who belongs to a religious Order and who cannot move around as an ordinary person can. I am very glad that General Mulcahy took a note of the representations made to him and countermanded the order, but I would ask him to say that such a thing as that would not be allowed to occur again, where officers walk into an institution like that and create what amounted almost to a panic.

General MULCAHY: This is simply flogging a dead horse. The answer I gave to Deputy Corish's question to-day was quite explicit, namely, that in October last the troops occupied a part of the workhouse in Gorey; that four of the nuns at that time occupied portion of it as a hospital; that they were advised at the time that ultimately the whole of the buildings would be required for military purposes but that they were allowed to remain for a time. Without going through the usual and prescribed procedure of drawing the attention of General Headquarters to the changed circumstances in Gorey, the local officer

[General Mulcahy.] recently informed the nuns that they would be required to surrender the portion of the building that they occupied, by a certain date in this month. That was fully stated, and the position between the Ministry of Defence and the Ministry of Local Government in the matter is that the Ministry of Local Government are prepared to agree to the removal of the district hospital from Gorey and the complete handing over of the building there to the Military Authorities. Actual arrangements along these lines have been under discussion with the Ministry of Local Government and the matter is simply brought to this particular head by the premature action of a local officer. The military situation and the housing of the army under proper conditions, conditions that will enable us to put a thorough grip of discipline on the troops, is a matter of very serious necessity at the present moment. There is a concentration of troops. Men are being withdrawn from small posts and brought into larger centres, and Gorey as a Battalion Headquarters is having troops drawn in from outside places and concentrated in it. It is not so much a military convenience as a military necessity, that we should have the building fully under our control at Gorey. It must be perfectly obvious that having nuns in an hospital, portion of which is a military establishment, is an undesirable thing and that it is more a military necessity than a military convenience to put an end to a situation like that. It is not a question of the military having come to the conclusion that they require to occupy certain public buildings. It is the position that the military occupy that public building, that they have bowed to the convenience of others, while they were able to bow to that convenience for a time. It is not in a high-handed manner, or strong military action, that it is proposed now to ask for the surrender of the other portion of the Workhouse at Gorey. The matter is being properly arranged and will be properly arranged, and any representations that the County Committee of Wexford have made to the Minister for Local Government in the matter, I take it the Ministry have already considered, and will be prepared to consider any others. As pointed out, the number of patients in Gorey at present is 4 and, as far as I understand, the Local Government authorities are considering the removal of these patients to, I think, the Wexford County Home.

Mr. CORISH: Are we to understand, or could I find out from the Minister for Local Government, will the alternative accommodation be provided in the town of Gorey, because, if not, it is contrary to the spirit of the amalgamation in Wexford, for if the patients are to be transferred from Gorey Hospital that is doing away with the auxiliary hospital which was promised to the people of Gorey. This is a very serious matter.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Blythe): Deputy Johnson did not give notice that he would raise this particular question, so that I have not the material by me.

Mr. CORISH: But if the Minister for Defence makes a statement that such a thing is being done, then the Minister for Local Government should know more about it than the Minister for Defence.

Mr. BLYTHE: I can only answer a question when I receive due notice of it.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): I do not think that it does arise on the statement of Deputy Johnson. Deputy Johnson said the point is while one can appreciate the need of the Military Authorities having over-riding powers over any other authority in time of war, that is an authority they should exercise only when military necessity compels them to do so. It does not seem to me that the provision of alternative accommodation arises on this question.

Mr. CORISH: The reason I raised that is, that General Mulcahy made a definite statement that the patients were to be transferred to Wexford County Hospital, and I think the Minister for Local Government should know something about it.

Mr. BLYTHE: As I explained to the Deputy, I cannot possibly keep in my head all these things and if he wants to ask me a question he must give notice.

Mr. CORISH: I am not insisting on an answer. I am only asking do you know anything about it?

ACTING CHAIRMAN: I think if that question of the provision of alternative accommodation is raised it would come better on a future motion for the adjournment. It does not arise out of the statement of the Minister for Defence to-day as to whether or not alternative accommodation should be provided. I do not say it should not be raised, but it seems to me that it cannot be raised now.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.35 p.m.

DÁIL EIREANN.

DEARDAIN, 5ADH IÚIL, 1923.

(Thursday, 5th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar 3.10 p.m. Bhí an Ceann Comhairle Micheál O h-Aodha, sa Chathaoir.

GEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

APPOINTMENTS OF AUDITORS AND INSPECTORS.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Local Government by what method appointments to positions as Auditors and Inspectors in his Department have been made, and if he will state the names and qualifications of Inspectors and Auditors appointed during his tenure of office.

MINISTER FOR LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. E. Blythe): The selection of persons for appointment as Auditors is made from the applications received by the Ministry.

When appointments are about to be made the most suitable persons are selected with due regard to academic qualifications, previous experience and general fitness for the duties to be performed. All appointments made have been of a purely temporary character.

During my term of office seven temporary auditors have been appointed, and one temporary inspector in connection with the combined purchasing scheme.

I do not think that unnecessary discussion as to the personnel of the Civil Service would conduce to the efficient working of the Department, but if the Deputy desires I will give him personally information as to the names and qualifications of those appointed.

A MILITARY PRISONER.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Defence if he can state how long it is proposed to detain William Bracken, No. E. 686, who was arrested in Castle-town Geoghegan, Westmeath, and is at present interned in Maryborough Prison; whether he has been charged with any offence, and, if not, whether it is now proposed to bring him to trial.

MINISTER FOR AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan for Minister for Defence): William Bracken, who was a Private No. R. 804 in the mounted service of the Army, was sentenced to penal servitude for seven years on the 25th October, 1922, by Courtmartial for mutiny.

Mr. LYONS: Yes; but the man is not sentenced at all yet. He has not been tried at all yet.

PERMITS FOR SHOTGUNS.

SEAN O RUANAIDH asked the Minister for Defence whether he is prepared to have permits immediately granted for cartridges and guns in agricultural districts, in view of the vast amount of damage being done to crops by vermin and game.

Mr. HOGAN: I would refer the Deputy to the reply given by the Minister for Home Affairs to a question in the Dáil on the subject of shot guns on the 8th June.

Mr. ROONEY: Would the Minister say if he can see his way to have these permits granted, as owing to the damage done by vermin farmers are at present much inconvenienced for want of these permits? If this state of affairs continues there will be no crops!

Mr. HOGAN: At the moment I am answering this question for the Minister for Defence, and I cannot say anything further than is conveyed in the answer I have read out.

Mr. WILSON: Would the Minister, as an agriculturalist, admit that this is a very pressing matter, and that it is a matter of much inconvenience to the farmers? Can he see the necessity for having these permits given?

Mr. HOGAN: I am debarred from being an agriculturist at the moment. I could express a number of views at great length, but owing to the unfortunate circumstances that I cannot become an agriculturist at the moment, I cannot go into this matter.

PRESS REPORTS.

Mr. GOREY: There was a matter here yesterday to which I had to draw attention. It was with regard to some inaccuracies that appeared in the Press reports. I find to-day that these inaccuracies are not corrected. I do not know if it is quite fair to expect or can we reasonably expect, as public representatives, that when inaccuracies like these are pointed out that they should be corrected. To-day I see that where the discussion over arrears of rent is reported in the Irish Times it is absolutely inaccurate. Not only is it inaccurate, but it is misleading. I do not say it was done maliciously, but the effect is malicious. Mr. Sears is reported to have said "that the Minister would take off a half-year's purchase money, and that would meet the case to some extent. Mr. Hughes said that suggestion was an admirable one. Mr. Gorey was not pleased to accept the suggestion." Now, what Mr. Sears suggested was that a half-year's rent be taken off the man who owed three years' rent. There was no consideration at all for the men who owed less. Under these conditions I refused to accept it. That is a different thing altogether from what appeared in the report. I do not think we are expecting too much, when inaccuracies are pointed out, that the inaccuracies should be corrected. Some attempt at accuracy, at all events, ought to be made in the reporting.

Mr. CORISH: I gave the Minister for Local Government a private notice of a question.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I did not get that question.

Mr. BLYTHE: I am not in a position to answer that question. The Inspector is on the spot.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Minister cannot answer now. When a question is given on private notice a copy of it ought be given to me.

Mr. GOREY: I rose for your instructions in this matter.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There may be difficulty in actually reporting a debate very accurately. There are difficulties in following the Committee Stage of a Bill like the Land Bill, which is very technical, and there are difficulties in exactly appreciating what a particular suggestion, when not put in writing, means. I will see if we can get the matter rectified now. Of course, it is in the Press report, not in our Official Report that the inaccuracy complained of occurred?

Mr. GOREY: Yes, it is the Press report I am referring to.

THE DAIL IN COMMITTEE. LAND BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move: "In Section 21, in Sub-section (2), to delete paragraph (b)." The paragraph reads:—

"Any land which is not substantially agricultural or pastoral or partly agricultural and partly pastoral in character, or any land comprised in a holding the main object of the letting of which was for a residence."

The object of the amendment is to find out from the Minister what his intention is with regard to land which may be within the region of a town, for instance, which may be held to be building land, but which as a matter of fact is agricultural land. If such lands were acquired under the Bill, the Land Commission would be in a position either to re-sell it to the tenants—and this quite conceivably should be brought in under a special Bill—or they might retain it, and so secure for the State the unearned increment which otherwise might be appropriated by the owner. That is the good reason, I think, for urging that lands which may be said to be not strictly agricultural in the sense that is defined, but which, being held out of use, should be taken with a view, if it is brought into building purposes, that such increased value as the development of the town would give to that land should accrue rather to the Land Commission, that is the State, than to the present owner. The amendment is moved with a view to finding from the Minister whether such an amendment to the Bill is not within the plan that he has set out.

Mr. HOGAN: I think I can reassure Deputy Johnson on probably most matters which he has in mind in connection with this amendment. The fact that land is near a town or adjoins a town does not necessarily make it non-agricultural. Any tenancy, no matter how near a town, vests. It vests in the Land Commission, and afterwards in the tenant.

[Mr. Hogan.]

The fact that a tenant is living in the town and is a trader or tradesman of any kind, or any man who has land on a future tenancy outside a town, does not make a difference. A future tenancy vests. That covers all the cases that the Deputy might be interested in, where people living in towns have agricultural lands outside the town they vest in the Land Commission and afterwards in the tenants. These are probably the bulk of the cases the Deputy has in mind. Of course, it is quite clear we should not buy non-agricultural land. That expression covers the town itself. We could not, for example, buy the market square or any sort of non-agricultural or non-pastural land. He raises another question of land which perhaps has potential value as building land, and he suggests that land should be acquired by the Land Commission because it has such a value. We need not agree to that for the moment. Anybody might hold 50 acres of land which he is farming as an ordinary farmer near the town. He is farming that as a good farmer should, but part of it may be valuable by reason of the fact that the town is extending in that direction. He owns the land. He paid for it the full price. He may have bought it as a fee simple, but the mere fact that the town or city is extending should not give the Land Commission the right to buy it out and take all the profits he might have gained by his good luck in having land there. Such an amendment as that would be injuring not only the large landowners, but the small landowners, both tenants and proprietors living near the town. There may be conceptions of the ownership of land which would contemplate that, no matter how a man owns land or no matter how he farms it, that he should not get any benefit that would accrue by reason of the fact that it happens to be in a position where a certain potential and additional value accrues to it by reason of the fact that the town is extending in that direction. We can argue that question for a long time, but we would never agree on it. This is hardly the time to argue such a question on a Bill like this, but in any case the possible effect is that you will have a small farmer having 50 acres or a landowner living near the town farming his land properly, and if it is his good luck that the land should become valuable by reason of the fact that the town is extending I do not see why the State should step in and take that land, no more than why the State should step in and take a house built in a particular part of the city towards which business is spreading and which is becoming more valuable.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister has made it clear that he does not support the view that the additional values of land created by the work of the community should become the property of that community. He throws over all the views of the older generation of land reformers, and says that the chance ownership of a piece of land near a town gives the owner all the advantages, no matter who may create the new values. Values that are to be created may be created through circumstances over which the holder has no control, but all that increased value is accruing to the agricultural holder. The position of land which is agricultural in practice, and perhaps might have been agricultural for a generation or two, near a small town or a large town would be affected by this amendment. If the Agricultural Commission thought that such land might some day possess a value as a building site, then it could not be brought in. I think that is the defect. I think the opportunity should be availed of in this Bill for the Land Commission to acquire such agricultural land, such land as is at present agricultural but may not be wholly agricultural. I would like to know whether grazings outside Dublin City, for instance, are ruled out by the provisions of the Bill as it stands. Take accommodation land, as they call it. Where near the smaller towns there are patches let out in plots for townsmen who are what one might call only conveniently more or less temporarily permanent or permanently temporal agricultural. They are temporary holdings for tillage purposes, and are going on from year to year. Apparently these are to be ruled out, and I think that is the defect. I think lands of this kind which are being held by the owners as agricultural land—so far as the owner is concerned it is only agricultural land, and it is only by the action of other people that it may at some future time become building land—should be brought within the confines of the Bill. I am sorry the Minister is not able to accept the amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: I venture to say the Deputy would be very much surprised if I agreed to it. He talks of chance owners. A man may have bought land and may have paid for it, and generally does, a very considerable sum by reason of the fact that it is near the town. He may have bought the chances, and bought them dear. We have got to take that into account. Further, if we do take up the land, what are we to do with it? If the land has a potential value as building ground, are we to take it up for building purposes? Surely it is not suggested that we ought to do that sort of thing under a Land Purchase Act. It is an interesting question as to whether the additional value of land by reason of circumstances over which the owner of the land has no control or responsibility should not be acquired for the State, and that question could be argued very nicely and properly on a Bill which provided for the taking up of land in the neighbourhood of towns for housing; but surely not under this Bill. If we took up such land we would have to build on it, and it could not be done. With regard to grazing outside towns, if there is a tenancy it vests in the tenant; if there is a sub-tenancy it vests in the sub-tenant.

We have ample power to make advances to trustees for the purpose of holding land near towns for forestry, tillage, plots, pasturage, and other purposes of that sort. We have ample powers under this Bill to do what the Deputy wants us to do, but we have not the power to take a letting for temporary convenience, and to make the man who would take that letting the tenant for the moment regardless of circumstances. We argued that question yesterday on another section. Deputy O'Connell wished to strike out Sub-section (3) of Section 20. I went into the reasons why we could not undertake anything in that respect. It would create far more hardship than do good.

Mr. HUGHES: If I understand correctly the effect of this amendment of Deputy Johnson's, he wishes to confiscate any property people may have convenient to towns and cities. I do not know if the Deputy understands what the amendment would mean in effect. I happen to know a little about the tenure of land around towns, and I do know that people who are, perhaps, unfortunate enough to hold land around towns have to pay very dearly for it. They have to pay an increased rent, and, if they were fortunate enough to get the Land Commission to fix a rent, there was always a proximity value which they had to pay, whether they liked it or not. If those people had the same facilities as people holding land 10 or 20 miles away from a town, there might be something in the Deputy's argument. As matters stand, it would be preposterous to have an amendment of that sort inserted in the Bill. I really think the Deputy has a misconception of what is meant by the amendment, and if he thinks it over properly he will not, I believe, insist on pressing it.

Mr. COLOHAN: On a point of explanation, I would like to ask the Minister if he would be prepared to take that part of the Curragh called the Little Curragh, situate north of the Great Southern and Western Railway line, and apportion it amongst the landless men in the towns of Newbridge and Kildare. There are about 200 or 300 acres there, and beyond serving as a gallop for racehorses and as a means of recreation for golfers, I do not see what use it is. It would meet a long-felt want if the land were divided amongst the landless men of Newbridge and Kildare.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy is really asking me what is the scope of the Bill. The answer is Sections 20 to 26, Sections 28, 29, and 32, all of which we have in front of us. If he refers to those sections his question is answered.

Amendment put and negatived.

Professor THRIFT: I beg to move the following amendment standing in the name of Deputy FitzGibbon:—

In Sub-section (2) (b), line 12, to insert after the word "not" the words "at the date of the passing of this Act."

I have not had an opportunity of speaking about this to the Deputy, but the amendment seems to me to be very reasonable, and one which just has the effect of making clear what is, I think, intended by the Bill. I am glad to say I am not a lawyer, but I think it might be contended that if some explanatory words were not added to the Bill, the term "is" would refer to the time when any particular case comes under discussion. What I think is meant is land at the time of the passing of the Act.

Professor MAGENNIS: I desire to support the amendment. Notwithstanding the pharisaical declaration of my friend, Deputy Thrift, thanking his God he is not a lawyer, it would have been some advantage to him, I think, in the present instance. The purpose of this amendment is to do justice to a particular class of land occupier who has been particularly badly hit by previous Acts. Unless this stipulation is put in, it is possible that leaseholders, lessees, in whose instrument granting the lease there are words constituting them tenants of mills, for example, and of similar holdings, would be shut out as they have been since the Acts of 1881, and shut out especially from the benefit of land purchase. Many of these holdings have completely changed; they have undergone a transformation through the alteration in the economic life of the country. The possession of a mill, for instance, upon one's land in most places outside of the immediate proximity of a city, and sometimes not even then, is the possession of a white elephant, or worse. A great deal of land which is declared in the lease to be not of an agricultural character, so as to bring it under the application of the Land Acts, has in the interval of years become of that type. Now, unless this stipulation is included in Sub-section (b) —“any land which is not at the time of the passing of this Act”—the benefit of the present land purchase would not be secured for that type of holder, because this section is a section vesting land in the Land Commission on an appointed day. The sub-section excludes from the application of that, land of this particular type. Consequently, if there be lessees working the land irrespective of what may be in their original instrument as agricultural holdings, then these holdings vest in the Land Commission from the appointed day, and those people then receive the benefits of the Act. The ground which Deputy Fitzgibbon's amendment covers is to a large extent that covered by a subsequent amendment by Deputy Gorey—“Provided also that, notwithstanding the description contained in any lease or other document, lands which have been used in a manner substantially agricultural or pastoral during the six years preceding the passing of this Act shall be deemed agricultural or pastoral land.” By the introduction of Deputy Fitzgibbon's amendment it is not a question of deeming them at all. They are, by virtue of being substantially used as agricultural or pastoral holdings, to come under the vesting power of the Land Commission under this section. That is the great benefit which is secured.

Mr. HOGAN: I am accepting the amendment. The words are absolutely necessary. It is necessary to show that whether the lands are agricultural or pastoral, or whether they are not, is to be decided by reference to the present condition of the land. That is absolutely essential.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to move the following amendment:

In Sub-section (2) (b), line 15, to add after the word “residence” the words “provided, however, that where the Poor Law valuation of the land exceeds half the Poor Law valuation of the buildings, it shall be deemed that the main object of the letting was not for a residence: Provided also that notwithstanding the description contained in any lease or other document, lands which have been used in a manner substantially agricultural or pastoral during the six years preceding the passing of this Act shall be deemed agricultural or pastoral land.”

I do not know what the effect of the previous amendment will be on this, but this amendment was introduced to try and make more definite—to bring down to some definite level—what is meant by residential holding. This question of residential holdings will be a very contentious one—extremely contentious with regard to the working of this Act. Where there is a distinct understanding between the lessee and the lessor that the holding was a residential holding at the time of the letting, I and everybody else can understand that being distinctly a residential holding. Where there is no such understanding, that is where the object of the amendment comes in. I, and the people with me, think that where the Poor Law valuation of the land exceeds half the Poor Law valuation of the buildings and is farmed agriculturally, it ought to be considered an agricultural holding and should come under the terms of the Bill.

Mr. HOGAN: There are two parts to this amendment. The first tends to define the term "residential holding." Of course, I could not accept that definition.

Mr. GOREY: The first definition?

Mr. HOGAN: Yes, the first definition. Whether a holding is residential or not is purely a matter of fact; the Judge must find on the facts and on the evidence, and it would be fatal to the Bill to lay down a rigid line like that. It would probably do a grievous injustice. It would mean probably that where people had built fairly substantial houses, and had spent £5,000 or £6,000 on the building, and had then let to a tenant pending the time the son or the daughter, if she got married, would go into it, the yearly tenant would come in now and purchase, possibly at a price under the Act which would be far less than what the house was built for. That is quite possible under this amendment. I put it no farther than that. You cannot define those things in an Act of Parliament. Whether a holding is residential or not, or is let for the purpose of a residence or not, is a question of fact. Quite a good many considerations are bearing on it, and leave it open to the Land Commission, with an appeal to the Judicial Commissioner, to try the case and to do justice. If you do injustice under this Clause you do grave injustice. You put a man to perhaps five, six or ten thousand pounds expense, and you cannot afford to do any averaging on questions like that. The issues are too important for the individual, and it must be left to the Land Commission, and the Land Commission must be free to take all the relevant circumstances into consideration. With regard to the second part, the amendment I have just accepted covers it. "Any land which is not, at the date of the passing of this Act, substantially agricultural or pastoral does not vest." That is to say any land which, at the date of the passing of the Act, is substantially pastoral or agricultural vests. It vests in the Land Commission, and it is for the Land Commission to say whether they are going to regard the particular lessee as a tenant or merely a temporary tenant, and hence not entitled to purchase, or whether, even though they regard him as a tenant, they are not going to take away his tenancy and use the land for the relief of congestion, or, finally, whether they are not going to sell it back to the owner as essentially a case where there should be a re-sale to the owner. You must leave all these things to the Land Commission. It does not matter what is in a lease. It does not matter how long the lease is, or how short the lease is. The land vests in the Land Commission in the first instance, and when it does vest in the Land Commission then the Land Commission are entitled to advert to the lease to see what they are going to do with the land. If the Deputy's purpose is to ensure that the land shall vest in the Land Commission, then Deputy FitzGibbon's amendment makes it unnecessary. I am perfectly sure that the Deputy does not wish to interfere with cases in which the land was let on behalf of minors. Take the old case, where a letting is made for five or six years during minority—

Mr. GOREY: No; I did not mean to deal with that class of case.

Mr. HOGAN: If the Deputy's amendment were accepted containing the words "provided also that notwithstanding the description contained in any lease or document," it would be at least doubtful if the Land Commission would not be coerced to ignore any circumstances set out in the lease, and to vest it in this temporary tenant. I think the Deputy will find that the words which have been added do all he wants.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: Will the Minister give us an undertaking that the Land Commission, in deciding upon matters like this, will not be guided by the same conditions that guided them in these affairs in the past? We have had numerous instances of holdings which were ruled out as non-agricultural on account of the house being the principal part of the holding, and I do not know on what basis this was done. However, I know a great many cases of serious grievance where the holding was so ruled out. If, under the present Bill, the decision as to the nature of the land was to be arrived at in the same way serious injustice might be done. I hope that in whatever arrangement is made to decide these things the Land Commission will not be hampered by the conditions which prevented them doing justice in the past owing to some technical provisions contained in previous Land Acts.

LIAM de ROISTE: I would like to ask the Minister for Agriculture if he has taken into consideration the question of a mill holding with reference to this sub-section?

Mr. HOGAN: Let us take a specific case—a house, large or small, and twenty or thirty acres of land around it. Deputy McGoldrick wants to know on what principles the Land Commission will decide the question whether this is an agricultural or pastoral holding. I think that is his point. What we do here is decide that they will have regard to the state of the holding at the date of the passing of the Act. That is the first decision. If a holding was used twenty or thirty years ago for a different purpose, and was gradually allowed to drift into becoming an agricultural or pastoral holding, the Land Commission would not take cognisance of what the holding was ten or fifteen years ago—they might have to take two or three years into consideration—but would consider what the holding is now. Take the case, then, of the holding used twenty or thirty or forty years ago in connection with the working of a mill. At that time a mill was a valuable asset. Probably 75 per cent. of the income of the farm was the result of the working of the mill, and for that reason it was not substantially an agricultural holding. Since then mills have fallen into disuse. Probably it was decided in most of those cases—perhaps when the tenant was going into Court, or perhaps in a dispute over a marriage settlement—that ten or twenty years ago this was not an agricultural holding, and under the previous Acts that decision ruled the case. The Land Commission could not go behind it, although at the moment the holding is purely agricultural, because all the profits are derived from agricultural operations and not from the mill. Nevertheless, if the case went into Court heretofore, and the Judge was called upon to decide whether it was an agricultural holding or not, someone would get up and quote a previous decision on a mill holding, and that ended it. We altered that. We say that it is the condition of the holding at the passing of the Act which will decide the question. That is made as plain as the English language can make it in the Bill.

LAIM de ROISTE: The case I have in mind happens to be quite contrary to that which the Minister deals with. It is only a small parcel of land. Originally it was let as agricultural land, but the tenants of it used part of their residence as a mill and they developed a mill holding. I do not know how the Act will affect such a case. It is quite contrary to the case that the Minister has dealt with.

Mr. HOGAN: I wonder does the Dáil agree that, in deciding a case whether a holding is agricultural or pastoral, the decision should be taken with regard to the present condition of the holding?

DEPUTIES: Yes.

Mr. HOGAN: That is agreed. I assure Deputies that I could not put myself into the position of a Judge, with a Bar before him stating the pros and cons, and all the circumstances of a particular case, and decide whether such a case comes within the definition. I am asked by the Deputy as to whether some particular case which he has in his own mind, and which I have not got all the facts of, comes within the definition which we are all agreed is the right definition. I cannot do that.

Mr. GOREY: With regard to the first part of this amendment, I do agree that it might raise a barrier if accepted and passed in its present form. But with regard to the second part of the amendment dealing with documents, I have seen some of them, and they are very peculiar. Some of them have clauses excluding the holding from any benefit under any Act. I have one of the documents here. This amendment was not meant to interfere with the rights of children or anything like that. I am satisfied that the previous amendment meets to a considerable extent the requirements of mine, and for that reason I beg leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I move Amendment 37:—

In Sub-section (2), paragraph (c), line 16, to insert after the word "is" the words "and has been for a period of not less than ten years before the passing of this Act."

It has been the custom to exclude from the operations of the Land Acts in the past demesne lands and home farms, parks and gardens, and so forth. It is just possible—I believe there have been cases of it—that landlords with an intelligent anticipation of things to come will extend the area of their demesne or home farms in order to get the advantages of certain provisions in this Act. The object of the amendment is to provide that only demesne lands which have been so classified during the past ten years will come under the section.

Professor THRIFT: It does not seem to me that this is a very reasonable amendment. It is rather against what we have already agreed to in connection with the previous sub-section. I would like to suggest to the Minister whether it really would not be necessary after the word "is" in this section to insert the words "at the date of the passing of this Act." That seems to be required in the same way that it was required in a previous sub-section. I do not think that Deputy O'Connell's amendment is reasonable. I do not like to make legislation retrospective. The Minister has already, during the debate on this Bill, drawn attention to the fact that when a definite figure is suggested a definite reason should be adduced for the selection of that figure. Ten is the figure suggested here. Ten is an arbitrary figure. It might as well be eleven or eight or nine. I do not like arbitrary figures of that kind, and I do not think the Minister does either. I hope that, instead of accepting this amendment the Minister will consider the advisability of adding the words that we added to the previous sub-section.

Mr. HOGAN: The clause, if amended, would read: "Any parcel of untenanted land which is and has been for a period of not less than ten years before the passing of this Act a demesne, home farm, park, garden, or pleasure ground, or any holding usually occupied by a person regularly employed on such demesne, home farm, park, garden, or pleasure ground." Applying this term of ten years to all these classes of land would give rise to a tremendous amount of litigation. I do not believe myself that it would make the slightest difference in regard to demesne land. It would probably affect home farms, gardens, pleasure grounds, and holdings usually occupied by a person regularly employed on such lands. It would probably make sufficient difference in these cases to create a lot of litigation. The Court would have to decide whether in fact certain lands had been parks or gardens or pleasure grounds, or holdings usually occupied by a person regularly employed in connection with these places for the past ten years. While it would do a certain amount of justice in some cases, it would do grave injustice in others. A home farm is a farm used in connection with the owner's house. It is a sort of glorified kitchen garden. The definition of home farm fills about twenty pages of Cherry. I do not propose to read it out. There is hardly any other expression there has been so much litigation about. There are hundreds of cases on the question. I shudder to think what would happen if we complicated the issue, so that the Judges would have to decide, not what they have always found tremendous difficulty in deciding—whether such a farm is a home farm at the moment—but whether such a farm has been a home farm for the past ten years. As I have said, there are at least twenty pages of cases in Cherry on the specific question, "Is such a farm a home farm at the moment." If Judges had to decide not alone whether this is a home farm at present, but whether it had been a home farm for the last ten years, it would certainly be a good job for the lawyers, but I do not think it would be to the advantage of anybody else. The same applies, I should say, to pleasure ground, and probably to a lesser extent to other things. I do not think it would make the slightest difference in practice. In the case of the demesne particularly, it would help to do the right thing in certain cases; it would do grave injustice in others. I can conceive a case where, let us say, a business man or a shopkeeper in a local town buys a house outside the town with ten acres of land, probably a division of 150 acres that was tenanted land five years ago, and he works it now as a home farm. It is a farm appertaining to and worked for the convenience of his residence, and not purely for profit. There may be no doubt about that case; it may be quite certain that seven or eight years ago it was not a home farm; now it is. It would be to that class of case this expression "home farm" relates. The man with a big demesne generally has not a home farm. His demesne is big enough. The demesne can be used, and is generally used, for purposes connected with his residence. He has his tillage inside it, he has his cows, and so on. A man with anything like a substantial demesne generally has not a home farm within the definition of the expression. "Home farm" is strictly a legal term. "Home farm" is a farm used by the landlord for the convenience of his residence and not worked purely for profit. As I pointed out, there has been a tremendous amount of litigation in connection with the question. As a rule, it is not the big landowner who has a home farm. He has untenanted land outside the demesne, but that is not a home farm. It is generally the case of a small shopkeeper or retired business man—a man who, say, retires after forty years, buys a farm, and is now an ordinary farmer. It is not right to take up his land compulsorily, because it may have been untenanted land five years ago. I think Deputies will agree that there would be a great many cases where hardship would be done by this ten years' clause. You have the proviso whereby wrongs would be righted: "Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing subsections, where the Land Commission before the appointed day declare in the prescribed manner that any land wherever situated, hereinbefore excluded from the operation of this section (other than land which comes within the description in Clause (e) of Sub-section (2) of this section), is required for the purpose of relieving congestion, then such land shall vest in the Land Commission pursuant to this section."

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. JOHNSON: The intention of this amendment is more particularly to apply to demesnes. I was hoping that when the Minister was giving us the benefit of his experience in this matter he would have defined demesne, because, as far as I have been able to enquire, I have not been able to find any definition of the name. I also had the hope that Deputy McBride would have been able to come to our assistance in this case, which has been put forward in view of special representations that were made, and which were thought might be typical of other cases where outside Westport the Marquis of Sligo is alleged to have retained within recent years thousands of acres which are included now in what is known as his demesne. That is the case which is put forward. It may be a single exception. It may be typical of many cases. If it is, then it surely is unfair. Surely it is time to avoid by anticipation the effects of the Act. I do not think that the proviso (paragraph 3) would meet the case, because that only provides for the exception where the land may be required for the purposes of relieving congestion. I do not know whether the grievances expressed by the people in Westport district would be met by this proviso clause. Probably the Minister is familiar with the complaints that have been made. He may be able to say it is the only case in the country, and that he can find a way of meeting the Westport example. Perhaps the Minister would help us.

Mr. HOGAN: I have no hesitation in stating that not only have the Land Commission power to take that part of that demesne, but I know that they will require it for the relief of congestion. The Congested Districts Board have been for decades looking for that particular land.

Professor MAGENNIS: Perhaps Deputy O'Connell is remembering the "Deserted Village":

" . . . The man of wealth and pride,
Takes up a space that many poor supplied;
Space for his lake, his park's extended bounds,
Space for his horses, equipage and hounds."

If we could redress the wrongs of past centuries by any legislation effected to-day it would be highly desirable. On the other hand, we may ourselves, as the Minister pointed out, by our haste to do good, create new wrongs. Suppose a case of a man who has bought and paid for land the price which the vendor demanded, and has bought it to secure greater privacy for his own house, or for some other purpose of convenience. Would it be fair now, merely because within the last ten years this transaction took place, and what is now a pleasure ground or something of that nature was before under tillage, that it should be wrested away again from the legiti-mate purchaser? It is quite easy to put in this spirit of reform and humanity clauses which are directed to secure the humanitarian result, but when these come into another atmosphere less permeated by sentiment and spirituality, the prosaic, dingy Law court, Judges and lawyers, unfortunately, refuse to consider what was the intention of the Legislature. They say, "What are the words of the Act?" and they interpret these with the utmost rigidity. So, while I am absolutely with Deputy O'Connell in this matter, with particular reference to demesnes and pleasure grounds, I realise that the words of limitation which he puts in would not meet the case, even if ten years were made fifty years or one hundred years. It would not have the all-impressing character which would be necessary to effect his purpose. So it seems to me, since we cannot do everything which is desirable, since the unfortunate logic of life presses upon us, the fact that not every reform that ought to be made is feasible or capable of being made, and certainly not every reform of past wrongs, can be effected merely through the operation of one sub-clause in a Land Purchase Act, we had better not run the risk of doing evil in the spirit of good.

Mr. O'CONNELL: This amendment was intended chiefly to deal with demesne lands, and possibly was coloured to a large extent by what took place in this particular instance referred to by Deputy Johnson, but, in view of the very satisfactory statement that has been made by the Minister with regard to that particular estate, I do not intend to press the amendment. I beg leave to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Professor THRIFT: Would the Minister consider the desirability of inserting after the word "is" the words "at the date of the passing of this Act"?

Mr. HOGAN: I think the best thing we can do is just to leave it as it now stands. Let well enough alone.

Amendment 38, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON: The arguments that were adduced in favour of Amendment 34 need no be repeated, and I simply move Amendment 39: "To delete paragraph (d) in Sub-section (2)."

Mr. HOGAN: As the Deputy stated, we argued this question already.

Amendment put and declared lost.

Amendment 40: "In Sub-section (2) (e), line 27, to insert after the word "authority" the words "otherwise than as tenants thereof."

PADRAIC O MAILLE: A Chinn Chomhairle, is maith liom an leas-rún so do chur os bhúr geomhair agus is doigh liom go bhfuil sé an-tabhtach.

I wish to propose this amendment. I think it is a very necessary amendment, as far as many public authorities through the country are concerned. There are a large number of public bodies that hold plots or land around public buildings. If they do not hold those plots of land in fee-simple, if this amendment is not carried, they cannot purchase under the Act. I do not think there is any Deputy in the Dáil who would be opposed to this amendment. It would empower Boards of Guardians and hospitals to purchase under the Act. No further argument is necessary as to why this amendment should be adopted. I, therefore, ask the Dáil to pass it.

Mr. HOGAN: I accept that amendment.

Amendment put and agreed to.

LIAM de ROISTE: I move:—"To add at the end of Sub-section (2) (e), line 30, page 8, the following:—"Provided that such exception shall not apply to land of which the former tenant or his representative applies for reinstatement, and such application is approved by the Land Commission after investigation in the prescribed manner."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: In this amendment does Deputy de Roiste include Sub-section (2), or merely Sub-section (2), paragraph (e)?

LIAM de ROISTE: The whole Sub-section.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then it should read: "Provided that this Sub-section shall not apply," etc.

LIAM de ROISTE: Yes. This is another effort to try to get the Land Commission Court to deal with the cases of evicted tenants generally. As far as I read, the general purpose of the Bill is that the Land Commission is given power to deal with land for the purpose of the relief of congestion, which everybody believes is a most desirable purpose within the congested districts to deal with the cases of evicted tenants. The purpose of this is to enable the Land Commission to deal with evicted tenants in other cases as well. As I said, I make no appeal whatever to sentiment, because it is a case of justice where there are good claims that persons be reinstated in their former holdings, and therefore it seems to me there is no reason why the Land Commission should not have powers to investigate such cases, and if the cases are just, reasonable and fair ones, the Land Commission should have power to reinstate the evicted persons upon their holdings. That is the purpose of this and of the amendment I previously proposed. There was an argument put forward that it was giving too much power to the Land Commission to investigate those cases or to disturb persons now on the land. But that argument would equally apply to the other purposes for which the Bill is intended—for the relief of congestion. We are giving power to the Land Commission to disturb people for certain purposes. I maintain there is no reason why we should not give power to them to give justice to people who made possible the previous Land Acts and made possible the placing on the soil within certain limits of congests and other classes, such as landless men.

[Liam de Roiste.]

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy should not jump to the conclusion that evicted tenants are all to be reinstated. A great many of them—the greater percentage of them—have been reinstated, and there will be ample power within the four corners of this Bill to reinstate without taking over land which is not substantially agricultural. The amendment asks us to take up land which is not substantially agricultural or pastoral land, such as land in the City of Dublin and land in the towns through the country. Paragraph (c) mentions any parcel of untenanted land which forms a demesne, home farm, park, garden, or pleasure ground. Since 1881 there has not been one holding cleared for the purpose of being made into a demesne, nor one present tenancy. We are to take up land for the relief of such evicted tenants to whom the Land Commission may advance money. But it is quite possible that if an evicted tenant was never evicted, and if he was using his holding at the present moment, that we would be taking that holding from him for the relief of congestion and migrating him elsewhere. Therefore we cannot admit the principle that because he is an evicted tenant we must put him back. That is common-sense.

LIAM de ROISTE: The comment upon that is that it may be common-sense, but it means taking advantage of this Bill and displacing a man who is entitled to land in order to put somebody else in his place. With regard to the comment that the amendment deals with A, B, C, D, and so on, Sub-section 3 gives power to the Land Commission to deal with any land, notwithstanding anything done in the foregoing sub-sections. It does give potential power to the Land Commission to deal with any land for a purpose such as the relief of congestion. Therefore I maintain that the Land Commission should be given the same power for the reinstatement of the evicted tenants.

Amendment put and declared lost.

LIAM de ROISTE: I called for a division.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I did not hear that. We had this question arising before. If a Deputy cannot make himself sufficiently clear when calling for a division, and the motion is declared lost or carried, the matter cannot be reopened.

LIAM de ROISTE: Excuse me, I did not hear yourself.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Deputy de Roiste did call for a division. I heard him.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am not disputing that; but I did not hear him.

LIAM de ROISTE: I did not hear half of what you said.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is a method of remedying that, perhaps.

Amendment 42: In Sub-Section (3), line 37, to insert after the word "congestion" the words "or for the development of agriculture, or otherwise in the public interest."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 42 would have the same effect as Amendment 33, which has been negatived. It is not moved therefore.

Amendment not moved.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to move:—

“To add after Sub-section (4) a new Sub-section as follows:—‘For the purposes of this Section, the County of Cavan shall be deemed to be a Congested Districts County.’”

I move this amendment on behalf of a county which has one of the smallest average tenancy valuations in any county in Ireland. I think the average valuation is about £8. There is a big agricultural population, and I do not see any reason why it should not be put on the same footing as Donegal, Galway, and the other counties. It has been sent down here to me from Cavan to propose it. I am sure Deputy Milroy, who is just rising, will support this amendment.

Mr. MILROY: Deputy Gorey always reminds me of a blend of Ancient Pistol and Don Quixote. He makes a terrific noise which means nothing. He is tilting, like Don Quixote, at windmills. This is one of his windmills. It is quite clear that the Deputy knows very little about this matter. Otherwise we would have been treated to a much longer and much more frantic discourse. I want to know exactly what this means.

Mr. GOREY: It means what it says.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: A very remarkable thing that.

Mr. MILROY: I do not think so; there is more in this than meets the eye.

Mr. GOREY: Let us have it.

Mr. MILROY: The Deputy in his amendment asks that Cavan should be scheduled as a Congested Districts County. I want to know for what purpose. Is it considered by him that this is a speedier way to relieve congestion in Cavan? There is no question whatever about the fact of the serious aspect which congestion presents in this agricultural problem, probably vital and more important than even the price or annuity. This amendment, if carried, would not add to the powers that you are to bring into being one scrap more power of relieving congestion than the Bill already gives.

Mr. GOREY: Why object to it, then?

Mr. MILROY: Why object to it? The people of Cavan are very sensible people. They have shown that by electing me. The people of Cavan know what they want, and know what they do not want. One of the things they do not want is to be made the raw material of one of Deputy Gorey's electioneering stunts. That is what is behind it. I happen to be one of the representatives of Cavan. I got a copy from the Secretary of the Farmers' Union to-day of this amendment, but not a single scrap of information as to the grounds on which it was passed. I got this amendment the day it was to be moved. What was the idea of that? If the people in Cavan wished that this matter should be brought before the Dáil, their representative was the proper person to do so. I was never consulted on the matter, and neither was I acquainted with it. Simply I was furnished with a bare amendment to-day and told to toe the line and follow Deputy Gorey. I am not going to follow Deputy Gorey, and I am not going to allow the County Cavan to be made an electioneering platform for Deputy Gorey in this Dáil. I have a few more pearls to throw before Deputy Gorey. The Bill gives every scrap of power necessary to deal with congestion in Cavan and elsewhere. As Deputy Gorey is so keen for the relief of congestion, would he be willing to part with a few of his own large acres to relieve this congestion?

Mr. GOREY: I have enough of my own congests.

Mr. MILROY: I have based my reasons as to how to deal with congestion, and before I sit down I want to ask the Minister if my interpretation is a correct one, for, after all, he is the man responsible for the interpretation of this Bill, and I want to ask him to give me guarantees that what I have said is correct, that there is within this Bill, as already drafted, the power to deal fully and successfully with the congestion in Cavan. After all, the main thing is not the question of scheduling districts as congested areas, but rather the question of [Mr. Milroy.] solving congestion. The problem of congestion, too, is not going to be affected by indulging in political stunts here or elsewhere.

Mr. GOREY: I heard great applause with respect to the reference to political stunts. Coming from Deputy Milroy, that certainly is very refreshing. This amendment was sent down to me from Cavan, and has been put up by me, and to my great astonishment I heard to-day publicly, and yesterday privately, that this was an election stunt. If this amendment is wrong, it has not been pointed out what is wrong about it, and why it is a political stunt.

Mr. MILROY: It is superfluous.

Mr. GOREY: What is the objection to it, then?

Mr. MILROY: The amendment is unnecessary.

Mr. GOREY: Because it is unnecessary it is a political stunt. I thought that the Deputy stood up here to give us some explanation of the amendment. He has not done that. He stood up to tell us what the amendment was, and sat down without doing so. The only thing he has made clear is that it is an electioneering stunt. I do not see what bearing it has on an election. I would be very happy to hear it, but so far I have not heard the explanation. Would the Deputy please tell us what it means?

Mr. MILROY: I shall. This amendment was put forward in the expectation that I would vote against it, and therefore become unpopular with my constituents in Cavan. I am going to vote against it, and face that unpopularity.

Mr. WILSON: The question really at issue is, does congestion exist in Cavan, and would the constituents of Deputy Milroy be benefitted by having Cavan scheduled as a congested area? It is not a question of whether it is an election stunt or not, or whether he is to represent Cavan. The real question at issue is whether the constituents of Deputy Milroy in Cavan would be benefitted by the amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: That is the real question, and the answer is they would not. As every Deputy in the Dáil knows, adding Cavan to the congested districts counties would not give us the smallest scrap of additional power for the relief of congestion which we have not got already. By the powers we have already we can take every perch of untenanted land in Cavan for the relief of congests, and we cannot do more. We have that power, even though it is not a congested county. If it were made a congested county it would not make the slightest difference.

Mr. GOREY: Will it not give you quicker machinery and more expedition? Is not that a difference?

Mr. HOGAN: The objection is that the amendment is superfluous, and it is an extraordinary thing that we should reach Clause 21 without knowing the terms in it.

Mr. GOREY: The question, then, may be asked: Why were there congested areas for any of the counties? Why is there a distinction in the Bill? Several counties in Ireland were scheduled as congested areas. The valuation is quoted. This county of Cavan comes down to the same rateable value as the other counties in the schedule. They come down to a smaller farming area. What, then, is the objection? One effect of being scheduled as a congested area is it will give you quicker machinery and more expedition. Will not that be in favour of getting the county schedules?

Mr. HOGAN: No.

Mr. GOREY: Why?

Mr. HOGAN: When you sit down I will tell you.

Mr. GOREY: We have not been answered that, and the answer has been kept to the last. Will not the date be an earlier date, and will it not be definite? I cannot follow Deputy Milroy at all. The bald assertion that it is a political stunt is the only thing that is clear. Judging from the look of the Deputy, it certainly is the only thing that is clear.

Mr. HOGAN: It is not at all necessary or essential, or does not follow from the Bill, that the land in the congested county should be taken first. Whatever land is convenient will be taken first. We found the Congested Districts Board there and left it there. These districts were explored, and it has been found that all the land available in those districts will be necessary. Hence we acquired them as a matter of course. One should be clear on that point. We are yet to explore all the other counties, and we are taking full powers to take any land we require to take in County Cavan when we have our explorations completed.

Mr. WILSON: The Bill provides that all untenanted land in the congested districts taken, and any other untenanted land which, in the opinion of the Land Commission, will be required before a certain date, has to be declared before an appointed date. Would it not be better if this particular congested area were scheduled? You would have all untenanted land in Cavan ready for parcelling out among the people who require it. Would not that be an advantage to the Bill, would it not help along this burning question of congestion, and would it not place the Minister for Agriculture, or the man in charge of the Land Commission, in a better position to have it decided then and there, that all the untenanted lands in Cavan were ready for parcelling?

Mr. HOGAN: It was intended to take up untenanted land in the County Cavan before any other untenanted land in Ireland, and that is the real reason why I am resisting this amendment.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 18; Níl, 35.

Tá.

Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Tomas de Nóglá.
Darghal Fíges.
Tomás Mac Foin.
Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Uaitéar Mac Cumhaill.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Pádraig Mac Ualghair.
Seosamh Mac Suibhne.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Seoirse Ghabhain Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Seán Mac Garaídh.
Micheál de Staineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Éarnán Altún.
Sir Séamus Craig.
Liam Thrift.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.

Níl.

Aodh Ó Cúilacháin.
Séamus Éabhróid.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Broin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Risteárd Mac Fheorais.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Croistóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigin.
Proinsias Búfin.
Séamus Ó Dólaín.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blahgd.
Unseann de Faioite.
Séamus de Burea.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.

Mr. WILSON: You did not say that.

Mr. MILROY: Why not schedule Kilkenny and Wicklow as congested districts?

Mr. GOREY: They are not congested.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: I think that instead of adding additional congested counties, we should move to abolish congestion in all counties. I do not see the object of this amendment at all, because in the Bill, as the Minister for Agriculture has stated, all untenanted land can be taken up for distribution amongst the tenants, and I thoroughly agree with the attitude taken up by Deputy Milroy towards this question. It is not improving the position of the unpurchased tenants in Cavan a single bit. Their cases can be dealt with equally well under the provisions of the Bill as if this amendment were adopted. I think the amendment is altogether unnecessary, and that it should not be adopted.

Mr. DOYLE: There was nothing at all to prevent Deputy O Maille, if he thought to wipe out congestion in its entirety, to put in an amendment to that effect, but he has not done so. He now states that it should be done, and I hope it will come on on the Report Stage.

Amendment declared lost.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 21 as amended stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 22.

(1) As respects tenanted land the price of each holding shall be a capital sum, hereinafter called "the standard price," of such amount that interest thereon at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum will be equal to the standard purchase annuity for the holding as ascertained in accordance with the first schedule to this Act together with a contribution by the State to the price calculated at 10 per cent. on, and added to, the standard price.

(2) As regards untenanted land the price shall, in default of agreement, be such an amount as may be fixed by the Land Commission (other than the Judicial Commissioner), or by the Judicial Commissioner on appeal from the Land Commission, and in fixing such sum regard shall be had to the fair value of the land to the Land Commission and the owner respectively.

Mr. JOHNSON: I move: In Sub-Section (1) to delete the words "together with a contribution by the State to the price, calculated at 10 per cent. on, and added to, the standard price." The matter dealt with in this amendment was discussed to some extent on the Resolution, and I suppose it will be considered waste of time to go very far into the discussion a second time. But I think it necessary to re-state shortly the objections to adding 10 per cent. for the benefit of the landlords. I think it was Deputy Magennis who tried to draw comparison between the bonus to the landlords and State contribution to the Unemployment Fund, and his friends of the Freeman's Journal took the cue and asked were we prepared to agree to the cancellation of the Unemployment Fund, as we demanded the cancellation of this bonus to the landlord. On the same terms we are. If the unemployed workman, as I said, wishes to be put in as good a position as the unemployed landlord, then it would be a very fair exchange for the abolition of the Unemployment Insurance Fund. The proposal of this Bill is to relieve the present landlords of their responsibilities as administrators of their estates, and they are to be recompensed for that disem-ployment by a payment in perpetuity of 65 per cent. of their present income from the land. I think they are making a very good bargain, and that they are being treated very generously, and if it could be afforded to every other citizen who was compulsorily disemployed then I would have no objection to giving the same kind of treatment to landlords. Unless we are thinking of the landlord as doing something for the rent he is drawing we can only think of him as having had a privilege conferred by the law which allows him to draw from the producer of wealth from the soil the annual toll of privately-imposed taxes. If that is the position, if that is the privilege, and it is that privilege which is being purchased from him by the State, then I repeat, what I said the other day, that what is being considered by the promoters of the Bill to be a fair sum to be paid annually for a number of years by the occupier should be the sum which is to be paid over to the landlord, and no more.

If, on the other hand, we are to conceive of the landlord as having given something in exchange for his rental, if, in fact, he has been a useful citizen, and is fulfilling useful functions as a landlord, but that you no longer require his services, then he is in the position of an employed man who has lost his job, and it is not usual to pay to an employed man who has lost his job 65 per cent., plus something as compensation, in perpetuity. I do not know whether anyone will say in this Dáil that the landlord has fulfilled a useful function and that his payment by way of rent is payment for services rendered. If there is such a one in the Dáil I should like to hear his defence of the landlord, and some explanation of what his service is. On the other hand, if he has not given any service, if this thing we are buying is merely the legal right to draw rent, then again I contend that the figure which has been deemed to be a fair charge upon the working occupier should not be exceeded in the payment to the landlord. The small sum, which was described as round about £40,000 or £50,000 a year, if that is an accurate estimate of the amount that will be called for, might do very much better service, and might be very much more usefully expended for the next generation or two than by paying it over to the landlords, even though those landlords may be people in America who invested money or may be charitable institutions or any public bodies. They took the risk with the purchase; they knew the position of Irish land; they knew the probabilities in regard to land purchase; they knew that there was a risk, and they had no right even to expect that the State would add to what the tenant might be deemed to be capable of paying. Notwithstanding all that was said upon the Resolution empowering this money to be paid, I still contend that there is no case, no satisfactory case, put forward to make a charge upon the State of this 10 per cent. to be added to the standard price, and I therefore move the deletion of these words: "together with the contribution by the State to the price, calculated at 10 per cent., to be added to the standard price."

Mr. SEARS: It has been said several times during this debate that this Bill is in the nature of a bargain—

Mr. JOHNSON: Between whom?

Mr. SEARS: The Minister for Agriculture has been congratulated upon striking a happy medium between the terms asked for on the one side and the other. If I mistake not, Deputy Johnson, himself, on the last day admitted it was in the nature of a bargain and that being so, it is waste of time to trouble the Dáil with disquisitions on first principles. Now, anyone considering the completion of Land Purchase in Ireland would certainly have that consideration governed by what took place under the former Purchase Acts. Under the 1903 Act there was a bonus. There was a considerable amount of money sanctioned by the State and approved by the people generally and by all classes of taxpayers, as a useful and necessary gift, in the phrase used then "to bridge the gap." Now we have argued on the tenants' side that the policy of 1903 should be continued and should be carried out to completion, and if we argued that on the tenants' side, is it not fair that the policy pursued under the 1903 Act on the landlords' side should also be carried to completion? Is there no necessity for a bonus under this Act? Now, take £100 rental; under the 1903 Act the average price paid for that was £2,585. Under this Act the tenant is only giving the landlord for the purchase of £100 rental £1,360, and, with the addition of the bonus, that only comes to £1,580 (or £1,570, I am not quite certain. Certainly if you compare the price £2,585 with the figure £1,580, you must admit there is a great disparity. If there was a bonus necessary in 1903 to make the 1903 Act function, then much more so is a bonus necessary under this Act, and if the principle was fair in 1903, and was sanctioned by the Nation, what reason is there now for objecting to it? I say there is no reason. We are in justice bound to it. There is a national consideration—to heal a great wound and to bring a long quarrel to an end. All classes are interested in bringing that quarrel to an end. Even the humblest worker in Ireland, whether a worker in the town or in the country, is vitally interested in this question, and he is vitally interested in seeing peace established. It means a better chance for the future for him to have this Act passed, and passed as satisfactorily as possible. I cannot imagine the humblest agricultural labourer in the country, seeing the landlords and tenants about to come to an arrangement, and, then, seeing Deputy Johnson coming on the scene striving to break up the bargain, to drive them asunder again, trying to delay the completion of this arrangement suggested by the Minister for Agriculture in this Bill. I cannot imagine him saying that Deputy Johnson was speaking for him.

I think we should take the Bill as a whole; it is a fair bargain. It follows on the lines of the Act of 1903, and it makes a very good attempt to do justice to both sides, as far as justice can be done. We would all agree with Deputy Johnson if we were dealing with virgin soil and could wipe away all the old claims, all those claims and all those precedents and rights which have accumulated, and which cannot be wiped out so easily. I think this Bill makes a fair attempt at justice and this amendment should not be accepted, as it would destroy the Bill and throw us back into the melting pot and defeat the intentions of all sides.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I think Deputy Sears will find that when the agricultural labourer makes himself vocal he will be found voting with Deputy Johnson, particularly as regards this amendment. The analogy between the 1903 Act and this Act does not stand at all. I am sure Deputy Sears knows perfectly well that there was not the unanimous sanction of the nation, or even of the taxpayers of Ireland, in 1903 to the bonus to the landlords. The conditions then were quite different to what they are now. In the first place, it was the British Parliament that brought in that voluntary purchase and sale Act. The credit behind it was not merely Irish, but British. That brings me to the question of the credit behind this particular Act, but I am not going to deal with that now. A good many people in Ireland were fooled into the belief that it was the British who in the long run were actually paying for the purchase of the Irish tenancies. That, of course, was not true. This, on the other hand is an Irish Parliament which is dealing with an Irish problem. The money involved is Irish money, and nobody, as Deputy Johnson says, in this Dáil, whatever about other places, will get up and say that the landlords, as a class, did real service to the nation in the past, or, as a matter of fact, fulfilled the duties that were fulfilled by landlords in other countries. They did not do that, and they have not done anything that makes them deserving of special treatment in this case, even in the small matter of improvements. It is notorious that, whereas English landlords looked after the improvements on the holdings of their tenants, and in many cases helped to capitalise their tenancies, there is not anything like that in the records of landlordism in Ireland. With the exception of a few who used to be called good and decent landlords, there is nothing creditable, decent, or serviceable in the whole record of landlordism in Ireland. If there was there might be something to be said for this bonus. Deputy Magennis and some others the other day advanced a rather ingenious theory that this 10 per cent. is really not in relief of the landlord at all, but in relief of the tenant; that the position of the tenants is so bad that they are not able to pay a fair price to the landlord, and because of that the community as a whole must make up what the tenants cannot pay. Apply that—and it is a logical thing for any man to do—apply the principle anyway generally and you will find that the Minister for Finance, at all events, will not be prepared to carry out that theory in other respects. You have certain disputes at the moment. There is one, for instance, in Waterford, where farmers say that they are not in a position to meet the demands that are made upon them by certain of their employees. If that is the case, why, then, should the Ministry of Finance not come along and put down what the farmers are not able to pay their employees. It will be said, I suppose, "Oh, in that case it is the labourers who are concerned, but in this case it is the landlords who are concerned, and that makes all the difference in the world." It is a surprising thing to me that Deputy Sears, above any man in the Dáil, should stand up in defence of the landlords. He knows better than I know, because he was in the movement at the time and I was not, that there was a good deal of dispute about the bonus under the 1903 Act, and he says this Act is merely to complete that. I do not think it is. It is an Act for the completion of land purchase, and in his really serious moments Deputy Sears would not, I think, agree that the 1903 Act was an Act such as an Irish Parliament, had there been an Irish Parliament at the time, would have passed. No, because there were other parties concerned; but now you have no parties concerned except three—the tenants, the landlords, and the Irish people. With Deputy Johnson, I object to pay the landlords out of the pockets of the Irish people.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Professor MAGENNIS: I am afraid I must disclaim the credit for affording Deputy Johnson a text upon which to hang a disquisition on property, on rights, and on the relation of the State with regard to both of these. It was not I who suggested this false parallel, as he called it, between the labourers and the land question.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am sorry if I made a mistake.

Professor MAGENNIS: There is really nothing to regret on the part of Deputy Johnson, although there may be something on my part. Some people have very peculiar notions with regard to property. A man rang up a pawnbroker between the hours of 12 midnight and 1 a.m., and when the pawnbroker at last appeared at the window the disturber of his peace asked, "What o'clock is it?" The pawnbroker said, "Did you take me out of bed merely for that?" and the other replied as well as he could, "Well, you have got my watch." Evidently some extraordinarily fantastic doctrine of the rights of man, the rights of a State, or the rights of people has got possession of Deputy Johnson's mind. We have in his speech, and in the speech of Deputy O'Shannon, all sorts of misleading analogies. I remember on a previous occasion Deputy Wilson and I crossed swords with regard to the imaginative character of the people and as to the desirability of training and developing the imagination. Imagination to-day runs riot in analogies. The first and most misleading of them is that by which a landlord is made to appear an employee who is now to be discharged. That is a delightful example of begging the question. Deputy Johnson is, of course, covertly formulating a doctrine which is one of the very latest put forward by a Law Professor in France, the substitution of the idea that rights are the correlative of duties, that rights are the correlative of functions, and only in so far as a man does some work for the community, has he any rights against the community, and that the measure of his right is the measure of the value of the functions which he discharges. Now, that may be a perfectly sound doctrine but it is not the doctrine that the world at large has accepted.

Mr. JOHNSON: It may be if we help it.

Professor MAGENNIS: Under cover of an amendment to the Land Purchase Act, to attempt the initiation of a new crusade is certainly not unambitious. There is such a thing as reasonable expectation. The doctrine of this has been already developed by Deputy Johnson himself. Therefore, I think I am right in regarding him as believing in it, for I am sure he would not teach any doctrine which he had not himself accepted. It is one of the foundations in all social intercourse in all steady institutions of society, that where a man is encouraged to entertain certain reasonable expectations in regard to life, it would be unjust, immoral, that is to say, to defeat these expectations. That no one knows better than Deputy Johnson, is the basis of a great many things that are the source of convenience in social life. For example, the whole law of estoppel is based upon it. If I permit a man to begin building a hotel on a piece of land, the title deeds of which are in my possession without his knowledge, and I look on and allow him to put up this huge fabric, I cannot then subsequently go into Court, having looked on and allowed him to do this thing; in technical jargon I am estopped. Suppose we were to take an analogy which has escaped the imagination of those Deputies, that landlordism was piracy—

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: Hear, hear.

Professor MAGENNIS: I am delighted to know there is one member of the Labour Party who is not afraid to put it into explicit language. Suppose the pirate is retiring from business compulsorily—

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: At the yard-arm.

Professor MAGENNIS: Is society obliged to compensate him for the loss? Obviously not, because, in the opinion of all right-minded men, the trade in which he was engaged was anti-social and immoral. Now, it has not yet been accepted by any reasonable body of men that private property, more particularly private property in land, is immoral, and until the Irish people who, as Deputy O'Shannon rightly says, are those concerned in this transaction, and the only people concerned, have been convinced that property, which is a necessary appanage to the development of personality, is an immoral and unrighteous thing, a doctrinaire is not to come and make his peculiar doctrine an absolute bar to the solution of a great problem, which brings peace and security to the whole Nation. As Deputy O'Shannon is so keen about logic, let us have some logic; I mean let us have some of his peculiar brand of logic, namely, deduce conclusions that you have first of all made up your mind to draw, by arranging to have premises from which these conclusions can be drawn. That is the conception of logic to which I am referring. The nation owns the land—

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: Hear, hear.

Professor MAGENNIS: When I quoted that a few days ago, Deputy Johnson said "hear, hear." Some of his henchmen say "hear, hear" again. Therefore, I am entitled to regard that as the accepted doctrine of the occupants of the benches on the left. Is there any meaning in ownership?

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes.

Professor MAGENNIS: Very good; what is it?

Mr. JOHNSON: Use.

Professor MAGENNIS: Control of the disposition and use; either ownership involves that; and if it does not involve that it is an idle word.

Mr. JOHNSON: Hear, hear. Ask the men behind you.

Professor MAGENNIS: The owners of the land are the Irish Nation, and in this Parliament, representative of them, they decide, for peace and future expansion, to convey to the tenant-occupier such control as is conventionally called ownership for the most beneficial use of the land, and, according to these Deputies, that is not legitimate.

Mr. JOHNSON: Who said that?

Professor MAGENNIS: Pardon me. I allowed you to develop your argument. It has become a set practice amongst the occupants of the benches on the left, from the moment I begin to speak until I sit down, to attempt to cultivate dialogue.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of explanation, I do not desire to interrupt the Deputy, or to prevent him developing his argument, but he has made a statement interpreting things we said which is certainly not correct.

Professor MAGENNIS: I am open to correction.

Mr. JOHNSON: I miss the point.

Professor MAGENNIS: It must be an exceptionally serious misrepresentation when it escapes the memory of the offended Deputy within the thousandth part of a second.

Mr. JOHNSON: If the Deputy will repeat it, I will question it.

Professor MAGENNIS: Very good. I was speaking about this 10 per cent. bonus being contributed by the State, and I had got thus far in the argument, that according to Deputy O'Shannon and Deputy Johnson the Nation is the owner of the land. According to Deputy O'Shannon nobody but the Irish people is concerned in this matter, which is dealing with the land that is theirs. I argued if that were so, any real exercise of ownership on the part of the Nation involved so dealing with the land as to secure the utmost production from it by way of benefit.

Mr. JOHNSON: Hear, hear.

Professor MAGENNIS: That was accepted by Deputy Johnson. I was invited to preach that doctrine to the Farmers' Party behind me—preach to those who already hold that, and have held nothing else but that for generations. I argued that when it becomes a question of the machinery by which this transfer of the lands to such men as would make the most of it for the benefit of the Nation as a totality, that this Parliament was entitled, in the name of the Irish Nation, whose legislative agent it is, to make such terms or such arrangements as render that feasible. Now, that is the stage at which I have arrived.

One of the obstacles to the feasibility of that arrangement is that there are other citizens in the Free State who hold a different doctrine with regard to the ownership of the soil and its disposition from what is generally entertained by the Irish people, that, as Deputy Sears put it, we are not in fact dealing with virgin soil, we are not, as I put it the other day, legislating in a vacuum. We are not theorists. We are dealing with facts as we find them, and as we find them we have a class of men who for centuries have been regarded as the land owners. Nobody ever declared that immoral. Many people have thought it undesirable and the sentiment of the Irish people, traditional and otherwise, is against it. Most progressive communities are in favour of peasant proprietorship, but the fundamental fact that we have to reckon with is that this class is the recognised—conventionally recognised—owner of the land. Unless an arrangement can be come to with that class, this Purchase Act becomes impossible. That is the situation as I envisage it. We could have no Land Purchase Bill without the condition precedent of an agreement with the landowners. That agreement was come to. I allege that as a fact. If it is not a fact it can be controverted. If it is a fact that an agreement was come to, and that that agreement is the basis of this proposed legislation, then what is the defence for a proposition that we who are always vocal with regard to the Gaelic tradition, the revival of our Gaelic past, and all the rest of it, that we should proceed to break covenants, to turn our back upon arrangements entered into, and to say—"Now, we are going to deal with this just as we please. We have a different view of proprietary rights from what you entertained, and what you have been accustomed to accept." In other words, what we are doing here is what practical men do. A man comes along and creates a nuisance by playing a barrel organ in front of my house when I want quiet. It is easier to pay him something to go round the corner—much easier—

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: Bribery.

Professor MAGENNIS: Bribery; that is the word. It is easier to do that than to expostulate with him about rights, and to enter into a long disquisition showing that his is an unnecessary function, that a right-ordered community has no room for an Italian barrel organ player there, and that if there was need for recreative music we should have a Gaelic piper instead of a barrel organ player. It is much easier to come to an arrangement with him than to do that. That is what practical people do. The arrangement that is come to here is an arrangement to pay a 10 per cent. bonus. Deputy O'Shannon, whose party is so sensitive about a quotation from them not being verbatim, and so sensitive about the drawing of obvious conclusions from their own statements, put into my mouth a statement which I did not use. If it had supported any argument of his I could have forgiven him, but he simply makes the gratuitous statement. I declared that the proper way to look at the payment of a 10 per cent. bonus was that that was done in relief of the farmer. That is not the same thing as saying it is paying money which the farmer cannot pay. It means that the State is paying money in order to bring about agreement between two clashing interests, between two antagonistic demands, and as our interests is in the farmer and in the setting up of peasant proprietorship, naturally I consider that the money I am paying as a taxpayer, in this regard, is money paid for the sake of a settlement. If somebody chooses to prejudice the situation by saying it is the landlord walks away with it in his pocket, he is welcome to do so. There is hardly a single transaction in life that could not be parodied by anybody who would give his ingenuity to the purpose. It is a complete parody of this transaction to say that 10 per cent. is being extracted from the pockets of the Irish people to fill the pockets of the landlords who have exacted so much from us already. I grant the exaction, I grant the iniquity of the past, but I am not dealing with the affairs of the past. I am dealing with the present as it shapes the future. The money has to be paid by the State for the advantage which accrues to the State from the bargain thus secured. That is the common sense of the thing. That is the equity of the thing

Mr. JOHNSON: The statement of Deputy Magennis which I objected to—I was momentarily confused by his magnetic powers—was that we objected to the State transferring the land to such men as would make the best use of it. That I deny absolutely. We make no such objection in any shape or form. On the contrary, what we desire is to ensure that the State will transfer the land to those who will make the best use of it, and, if necessary, take it from those who refuse to make good use of it. So far as I am concerned, State ownership means the right and duty of the State to find the best means of making use of it, and I am prepared to admit even the claim that the best use that can be made of land in this period of history in Ireland is by peasant proprietorship. But there is not the slightest justification for the Deputy saying that we object to the State transferring the land to such men as would make the best use of it. The Deputy has said that this Land Purchase Bill would not have seen the light without an agreement with the landlords. Deputy Magennis may know more about these things than the Dáil. But the Dáil does not know that there has been any agreement with the landlords to pay 10 per cent. bonus over and above what the [Mr. Johnson.] tenants can pay as annuity. No such agreement has seen the light and the Deputy is not justified in saying that this Land Bill would not have seen the light if there had not been previously an agreement with the landlords. So far as the public know, no such agreement was found possible.

Therefore the Bill was brought in in the way in which it has been brought in. So that there is no agreement with the landlords, and all the arguments of the Deputy regarding breach of covenants therefore fall to the ground. There has been no covenant. The Dáil, on behalf of the nation, has not yet made any covenant with the landlords to pay a ten per cent. bonus, or to add 10 per cent. to the price. Therefore, there is no breach of agreement or any throwing over of covenants by the acceptance of this amendment. So that part, too, of the Deputy's argument falls to the ground. The proposition is that the barrel organ player shall be removed. When the outraged resident with the musical ear, who is being disturbed, asks the barrel organ player to go away, and when the latter refuses calls a policeman, the policeman says "Please go away, here is 6d." The policeman has to pay the bonus to the barrel organ player. That is Professor Magennis's argument—that the disturbed resident who desires the barrel organ player to be sent to another neighbour shall be recompensed by the policeman. Deputy Magennis says there is such a thing as reasonable expectation, that because the landlords built upon a reasonable expectation it is not right of the Dáil to refuse to levy a tax of ten per cent. of the price upon the community. I want to know what grounds the landlords have for reasonably expecting that this 10 per cent. was to be put into this Bill? Not the slightest; not the semblance of a shadow of ground for reasonably expecting, or unreasonably expecting, or expecting in any degree, that this Section was to be put in the Bill.

Professor MAGENNIS: Of course not.

Mr. JOHNSON: The landlord contends that this is not a reasonable price that is being offered to him. Was the reasonable expectation something that the landlord says is reasonable? Is that the argument?

Professor MAGENNIS: No, of course not.

Mr. JOHNSON: Then it is not what the landlord expected to be reasonable that is the expectation which is to be satisfied. The reasonable expectation was an expectation that the landlord had in his mind. If not that, who had this expectation? I assert that the expectation may well have been that such sum as a tenant might reasonably be expected to be able to pay in the next fifty years should be the sum which the landlord might reasonably be expected to draw, but nothing more. Deputy Magennis talked about dissertations on private property. Private property was not thought to be immoral in Ireland. He went on to say that it was a necessary appanage of personality. I accept that proposition, and, with that definition, I am prepared to uphold private property to the uttermost. But I deny that any of these landlords' rights spoken of were necessary appanages of personality. It is simply a legal right to draw rent, which legal right is being interfered with by this Bill. To what extent is it to be interfered with? That is the whole question. There is no question of rights, no question of morality, it is a question of degree of interference. Then we come down to a practical question. What is the degree of interference? The proposal is that there should be a certain income guaranteed. The Ministry think that that income can only be made up by an annuity paid by the occupier, with the addition of 10 per cent. I deny that there is any necessity for the 10 per cent. There is no question of morality, no question of private property. No question of landlordism, as a matter of fact, enters into it in this respect at any rate. It is a question as to whether the extent of the interference with these property rights, with these legal rights to draw rent, is of such a nature that it cannot be met by the payment over of the sum drawn in annuities from the tenant. I say that that should be quite enough, and I am prepared to accept the view of the Minister that the amount that the tenants are able to pay, or are likely to be able to pay, is the amount which is embodied in the Bill. Consequently I deny the equity of adding this sum of 10 per cent., and I ask the Dáil to vote against the proposal in the Bill, and to vote for the amendment.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Johnson is undoubtedly right in saying that if I attribute to him the declaration that he is opposed to peasant proprietary, then I am uttering what certainly is not true. But surely one so versed, so proficient in disputation as the Deputy, is aware that one may show the falsity of an adversary's position by drawing from the conclusions to which his argument commits him. The Deputy interrupted me, as I pointed out at the time, before I had developed my argument completely. I was engaged in showing that if he refused the 10 per cent. bonus then he put up a barrier to the settlement—in other words, he was opposing the transfer of the land to the tenant. I see no incompatibility between these two things. All that I accuse Deputy Johnson of is inconsistency in argument. While he proclaims, and rightly so, that he is an advocate of such transfer of the land as secures the best usage of it, yet my contention is that if he were allowed his way, what he proposes to do would make it impossible to secure that best usage. As regards my argument about reasonable expectations, I thought it unnecessary to develop that in full and that the Deputy would see the application of it. But I have completely misled him. He thought that when I spoke of reasonable expectation it was a reasonable expectation on the part of the landlord of 10 per cent. That was not the application of it. I was arguing against the view—no matter how hostile one may be to landlordism as we knew it in Ireland—that landlordism and piracy were identifiable in any view of society. I pointed out that when men are allowed to engage, by the sense of the community, in an occupation generation after generation, that reasonable expectations are created. That is a wholly different thing. There are promises which a man may make and which are not enforceable in a court of law. There is no valuable consideration. Yet, in the law court of conscience they would be enforceable if there were any external sanction applicable. There is a reasonable expectation among men, in their intercourse from day to day with other men, that promises will be kept, although there is no legal sanction to enforce the keeping of the promises. I said that all our life, the life of intercourse, is based to a large extent upon the non-defeating of reasonable expectations which conduct and custom have created in a body of men. That is a different thing altogether from alleging that the landlords had a reasonable expectation created for them of receiving 10 per cent. I had no intention of suggesting any such thing. With regard to agreement, if I said anything that purported to declare that a specific agreement, a date and an hour for which could be given, was the basis of this Land Purchase Bill then I must withdraw it because it would be untrue. What I am referring to is the long line of negotiations of which we are all more or less cognisant—as regards myself, less cognisant—the long line of negotiations between landlord and tenant and various interveners between them. We know that before the Partition Act of 1920 there was an attempt at creating an understanding. We know—if we had no other authority we had the excellent authority of Deputy Gorey yesterday—that there were attempts at agreement, and we all know perfectly well that the attempt to reach something like perfect agreement antecedent to the introduction of this measure broke down. Deputy Gorey was one of the protagonists in the effort to reach agreement. I am not ignorant of all that. I am ignorant of a great many things, but I have a vague knowledge that that is the fact. Again let us not deal with things in a vacuum. It is enough for me that I deal with abstractions as a lecturer on metaphysics, but am I to be haunted with abstract discussions, spectres of the abstract, in every department of life? This position taken up by the landlord and that position taken up by the tenant, each of them has a history. All these have antecedents, and what they are can only be understood by considering them in relation to their antecedents. Take the whole concrete, complex as it is. Therefore I say, and I repeat it without fear of being contradicted, that no Land Purchase Bill capable of being put into intelligible words, and of being reasonably adopted by any reasonable body of men would be possible at all if it were not for these historical antecedents that have led up to and made the thing possible. That is a very different thing from [Professor Magennis.] alleging that there is something in the nature of a bargain—vague and indefinite, perhaps, but still something in the nature of a bargain. There is too great a tendency I say, with all respect to Deputy Johnson, to take the literal meaning of words without considering the context that gives them their colour and value. I am not going to repeat even by way of refutation of Deputy Johnson any doctrine about private property. The fact that we have to deal with is simpler than to come to a conclusion about private property. These landlords may be regarded as the enemy. Suppose we look upon them for convenience in that light. Although they are and will be I hope citizens of the Saorstát, let us call them the enemy. Now, in all disputes there are only three ways of reaching a conclusion. One is by war or by force, to use words that are not international in significance. Another is by law, the exercise of right reason, and the third is by one of the parties surrendering absolutely. That is to say, the dispute is settled by the dispute removing itself out of existence altogether. Neither of the disputants in the present case will resort to that easy solution, and consequently we have either to settle this dispute by force or by law. Force was tried from time to time. I am old enough to remember the moonlighters. I remember the land war. I also know that force was tried from the other side. I have read about the clearances of Westmeath, and I know what the plantings were in my own county. The time has arrived for compromise, for arrangement. "Compromise and barter," says Burke, "are the source of all the enjoyment in life." "We give and we take and we choose," he says, "rather to be happy citizens than to be subtle disputants." When that choice is forced upon me by my friends on my left, to be a happy citizen or the subtle disputant, I prefer to be the subtle disputant only in the lecture room.

Mr. JOHNSON: And we are the happy citizens.

Mr. HOGAN: I have nothing to add to what has been said. I want to point out, however, that we are not discussing price on this amendment. What we are discussing is whether a contribution should be paid or not. That has really got nothing to do with the question of price. Whether the price is big or small the same question arises. Deputy Johnson has altered his position from that which he took up on the discussion that took place on the Money Resolution. His position then was that if £1,500 was a fair price the tenant should pay the whole of it, and if £1,368 was a fair price then that is all that should be paid. I said that I accepted that position, and we need not, I repeat, now go into the question of price. It will come up later on the Schedule. What Deputy Johnson has forgotten is that we have got to borrow the money to pay the price. Assume, for the sake of argument, that £1,505 is a fair price. As I say we have to borrow the money at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. We could borrow it before at $2\frac{3}{4}$ or 3 per cent. We made up our minds that we would save the tenants from the consequences of dearer money, and that is why we pay this contribution. That is a very simple explanation, and it is the long and the short of it. The same argument would hold good whether the price were £1,368 or £1,500. We would be equally wrong and equally right in either case. What we did make up our minds to in any event, whatever the price was, we would save the tenant from the increase in the price of money that resulted from the European War.

There is not one single argument that existed in 1903 that could justify the bonus or what we call the bonus in 1903, and there is not one of these arguments now advanced. If the only arguments to justify the bonus were the arguments to justify it for 1903, then we would not have defended it. I am giving away on the point of bonuses. If the circumstances were the same, if the European War had never occurred, there would have been absolutely no reason whatever for the State paying a single penny, and Deputy Johnson's dilemma would have been unanswerable. There is only one argument in favour of this contribution which was not in existence in 1903, and which is in existence now notwithstanding all the arguments about 1903. That is that the European War has occurred and money has reached $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., and having regard to the fact that the tenants were unlucky in not purchasing under the 1903 Act, and before the war broke out, we came to the conclusion that we would save them from the consequences of this dear money, and we paid them this bonus, and it is upon that basis that we are justifying it.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 11; Níl, 39.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Tomás Mac Foin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Éabhróid.

Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Risteárd Mac Fheorais.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Donchadh Ó Guire.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Uaitéar Mac Cumhaill.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Pádraig Mac Ualghairg.
Seosamh Mac Suibhne.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Micheál de Staines.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Earnán Altun.
Sir Seamus Craig.
Liam Thrift.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.

Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Pítras Béasláí.
Finnán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dólaín.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dugáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seamus de Burea.

Amendment declared lost.

Motion made and question put:
"That Section 22 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Mr. HOGAN: Before we pass away from Section 22 might I make a suggestion? It deals with price, and we have disposed of the only amendment on the paper to that particular Section. It refers, however, to the Schedule. There is an amendment 96 to the Schedule, and I would suggest for the consideration of the Dáil that the most suitable time to deal with that particular amendment would be now immediately following this discussion on the 10 per cent. so as to deal with the whole question of price together. I would suggest it would be the most convenient and suitable thing to dispose of this question of price and of all the amendments, and that all the amendments on price be taken at the same time. It would necessitate going on to the Schedule and dealing with Amendment 96. The Schedule, however, is referred to in the Section we are dealing with. Though it might be unusual it would be more convenient for the Deputies, and such a procedure would be more likely to get full consideration for the whole question of price than if we were to deal with one part of the question now and another later on. I suggest we should deal with the whole Section before we pass away from this.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is a procedure which is unusual, and if we were to take it I think we would need unanimity.

Mr. HOGAN: I realise that. We could only do it with the consent of the Dáil.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think that suggestion is a very sensible one and might be well made a regular practice where the Schedule is appertaining to a particular section only. The only doubt in my mind is whether there might possibly be further amendments allowable which have not yet been sent in and which might be considered desirable in the minds of the Deputies in the course of the discussion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is to say, amendments to the Sections?

Mr. JOHNSON: To later sections, yes, or even to the Schedule.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Well, I can explain that. The amendments which have been circulated are the only amendments which I have accepted so far, and I have refused to accept certain amendments, including amendments from the Minister for Agriculture himself, so that there will not be any more amendments for this Stage. On the other hand, amendments may be moved later which will necessitate a further Committee Stage, but as far as this particular Committee Stage is concerned the only amendments to be moved are on the paper which is in the hands of Deputies. The Bill may be re-committed, either in whole or in part, later on, but as far as this Committee is concerned I think that all the amendments are on the paper.

Mr. HOGAN: In point of fact, I think everything points to the necessity for re-committing the Bill for the purpose of some amendments later on.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am not concerned so much with this Bill. I am rather concerned with the ruling, as to whether it ought to be taken as a precedent that when a Bill, which might be even longer than the Land Bill, is down for Committee Stage on a given date, all amendments should be in hand a certain number of days before the Committee Stage begins, where due notice, provided for in the Standing Orders, could be given, supposing there were a certain number of days before the actual section came under consideration. After all, the course of discussion in Committee might well suggest amendments to the later sections of the Bill, which amendments ought to be received while the Bill is in Committee.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is so. I think the strict interpretation of the Standing Order would be that amendments would be in time if they were received in time in relation to the day on which the particular section to which they referred would be before the Committee. But in this case the amendments were mostly to the first twenty sections, which were already down for a particular date. I did not like to confuse that matter by accepting amendments on the spot which were serious. There is actually provision in the Standing Orders for receiving amendments in Committee without notice and Deputies can, of course, avail of that, but with regard to this particular Bill there will be amendments which will necessitate its re-committal for their consideration. With regard to the precedent of considering the Schedule now, the matter that Deputy Johnson mentioned first, namely, whether it might not be a good thing always to take the Schedule immediately after the section in which reference is made to the Schedule, is one which I think should be considered by the Committee on Procedure with a view to making a recommendation if they thought fit. But with regard to the particular happening now no precedent is created beyond that by general consent we allow the Schedule to be taken after Section 22, in which it is mentioned.

Mr. GOREY: Am I to understand that when this Bill is re-committed to Committee we will have power to put up amendments to the particular sections already disposed of?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That would depend.

Mr. GOREY: What is re-committal for, then?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That would depend. The whole Bill might be re-committed, in which case we could go through the Bill again and amendments could be offered to every section, but the Bill might be re-committed with a view to considering certain sections which it is proposed to amend, and in that case only the sections which were re-committed could be reconsidered in Committee. If I understand Deputy Gorey's point aright I think this would suit his case. If, on Report, he tables amendments to certain sections, if, on Report, the Minister for Agriculture, or somebody for him, tables amendments to other sections, I think the Minister, while not being obliged, would actually in fact move that the Bill be re-committed to consider these amendments, and this would enable Deputy Gorey's amendments to be considered in Committee.

Mr. GOREY: Yes. There are a few amendments which have been already considered—two of them—but I think on reconsideration some amendments might be suggested.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: An amendment defeated in Committee cannot again be considered.

Mr. GOREY: But amendments to the same section can be?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Oh, yes.

Mr. GOREY: Of course, taking this question of prices out of its order does not affect us very much. I do not want to stand in the way of facilitating business if it is considered that this ought to come on now. Of course it takes us a little bit by surprise, because we did not expect it to be taken this evening, but I do not want to obstruct the business.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is agreed then to take Schedule 1 now.

An Leas-Cheann Comhairle took the Chair at this stage.

FIRST SCHEDULE.

STANDARD PURCHASE ANNUITY.

Part I.

Holdings subject to Judicial Rents.

The standard purchase annuity shall in the case of each holding be an annuity of an amount equivalent to a percentage of the judicial rent payable in respect of the holding namely—

- (a) in the case of rents fixed before the 16th August, 1911, 65 per cent.
- (b) in the case of rents fixed after the 15th August, 1911, 70 per cent.

Part II.

Holdings subject to rents other than Judicial Rents.

1.—The standard purchase annuity in the case of every holding to which this part of this Schedule applies—

(a) Where the landlord and tenant so agree in the prescribed manner and within the prescribed time shall be the amount so agreed upon, and

(b) Where the landlord and tenant do not agree shall be such amount as shall be fixed by the Land Commission (other than the Judicial Commissioner), subject to an appeal to the Judicial Commissioner whose decision shall be final.

2.—The annuity shall be fixed by the Land Commission on the report of their Inspector and without hearing in Court, regard being had to the nature and situation of the holding, the date of the commencement of the tenancy, the rent payable thereunder, and all the circumstances of the case.

3.—This part of this Schedule applies to every holding which (a) at the date of the passing of this Act is subject to a rent other than a judicial rent, and (b) vests, or will vest, as tenanted land in the Land Commission under this Act.

Amendment by Mr. GOREY:—

“ To delete Part I, and insert in lieu thereof the following:—

‘ HOLDINGS SUBJECT TO JUDICIAL RENTS.’

The standard purchase annuity shall in the case of each holding be an annuity of an amount equivalent to 60 per cent. of the judicial rent payable in respect of the holding provided that:

(a) where the judicial rent payable in respect of the holding has been adjusted by agreement between the landlord and tenant, the average yearly rent actually paid by the tenant during the period of ten years, up to and including the gale day next preceding the passing of this Act, shall be deemed to be the judicial rent payable in respect of the holding, for the purpose of determining the standard purchase annuity as aforesaid, and

(b) where the judicial rent payable in respect of the holding has been fixed by agreement between the landlord and tenant on the reinstatement of the tenant in his holding after having been evicted, the Land Commission, on the application of the tenant, shall cause the holding to be inspected, and shall fix an annual sum upon the same principles as a judicial rent upon receiving the report of their Inspector and without hearing in Court, and such annual sum shall be deemed to be the judicial rent payable in respect of the holding for the purpose of determining the standard purchase annuity as aforesaid, and the decision of the Land Commission shall be subject to an appeal to the Judicial Commissioner, whose decision shall be final.

(c) where the tenant of any holding in respect of which judicial rent is payable shall apply to the Land Commission for an inspection of the holding, on the ground that the holding is inadequate security for the advance to be made in pursuance of the provisions of this Act, and the Land Commission are satisfied that reasonable ground exist for such application, the Land Commission shall cause such inspection to be made, and on the report of their Inspectors, and without a hearing in Court shall fix the standard purchase annuity in respect of such holding on the same basis and having regard to the circumstances specified in this Act as if the holding were subject to a rent other than a judicial rent, and the decisions of the Land Commission shall be subject to an appeal to the Judicial Commissioner, whose decision shall be final."

Mr. GOREY: The amendment is to increase the standard reduction from 35 per cent. to 40 per cent. I think the chief things you require are reasons to prove that our contention is right. The Minister asked for some figures yesterday. We intend to make some comparisons that, we hope, will convince him that the price ought to be less than in the Bill. The question is the sale of land, and the value of land. We ought, I think, to take a parallel from the values of land in years gone by, from 1903, 1909, 1918, or 1920, when this question of land was under consideration, and was more or less the subject of agreement with the landlords in legislation, and we must, if we want to ascertain the value of land now, take a present day comparison and deal with the value at the time we are dealing with the case. There are reasons why sentiment makes Irish land more valuable than land in any other country. It is the only means of existence for the agricultural population; they have no other outlet; they have either to settle on the land or go away and the race is to die out. Men want to marry; they want a home and they want to settle down. The natural law urges them to find a home, and you cannot get behind that. Therefore the price of land in this country, what is known as the tenant's interest, brings more than its real value, and the price is not in proportion at all to the actual commercial value of the land. Let us take the nearest country to ourselves for a comparison. Take the sale of English farms, and in doing so, remember that we are measuring things on a standard different altogether from that which can be applied to this country. There is such a thing here as tenant interest and landlord interest. In England you have only the landlord's interest, and when they sell land they sell it absolutely in fee simple. English land in the open market is bringing about eleven years' purchase of the present rental. The holdings are much larger than in this country. There is no comparison at all—

Mr. HOGAN: What about the rentals?

Mr. GOREY: The rentals are larger in this country; slightly larger.

Mr. HOGAN: So I thought.

Mr. GOREY: The land is fallow in England this year. It is without tenants. They are waiting for somebody to go on and they cannot get them. There is no use in sneering at things at all.

Mr. HOGAN: On a point of order, I am not sneering.

Mr. GOREY: You know how sensitive I am.

Mr. HOGAN: I am quite happy at the prospect of large tracts of England waiting for landless men in Ireland to take them over for nothing.

Mr. GOREY: The Minister ought not to knock me off my balance. He did not need to interrupt at all, really. If we look at this thing from a commercial and sensible point of view, we must take into account what is done by the English landlord for the land. The English landlord undoubtedly has done much. Deputy O'Shannon speaking here this evening asked what has the Irish landlord done for the land, and he was answered truthfully—"nothing." In England you see farms of three or four or five hundred acres with valuable steadings. What relation do these steadings put up by the landlord bear to the value of the land; what could they be erected for to-day, and how would the value of the average English farm of three or four or five hundred acres compare with the value of the steadings of the land? What would it cost to put up these steadings, what is the value of them to the man who wants them; what would the average English farm come to if it were in Ireland; what would the fencing of the English farm be put up for, and what would its drainage be completed for? These are all valuable commercial assets that have been created by the landlord, and he is selling them at about 11 years' purchase, and is glad to get it, and glad to be relieved of the land at any price. What are the conditions in Ireland? We have small farmers, men with a few acres, men with a small valuation trying to eke a living out of a small patch of land, and these are the men who made the land, the buildings, fences and everything except the space on which the holdings are situated. They created by their labour, or by the lack of the landlord's labour, a tenant's interest in Ireland that is worth something in the open market. Any improvements the landlord ever did in Ireland were valued by the Land Commission, and put on to the tenant who had to pay for them. They were valued as against him. Anything that was done by the landlord was claimed by him, and a price was put on the land equal to the value of these improvements, and they were very few and far between, with the result that the landlord who did improve is now on the same level as the one who did nothing, because his improvement was valued as against the tenant. We are not told the real reason, but we are just told that the reason why the price of land should be the price in the Bill is to give the landlord fair play and justice. Now, if it is justice in England to sell land, the same class of land, or land of better quality and in a higher state of cultivation at a smaller price, why is it equity and justice to demand from a man almost twice the price for the same class of land? I have heard arguments in the Dáil, and I am beginning to think they count for more than the question of justice between the landlord and tenant, and that is the vested interests that have grown up. I think I heard in the Dáil from a semi-official of the Government party some reference to banks, charitable institutions, and other vested interests. Perhaps, it is in order to secure the full 100 per cent. value for the charitable institutions, banks, and other vested interests that this Bill was brought in. I think, probably it would be more in relation to justice had these institutions been put into the Bill than the talk of justice to the landlord or the tenant. I do not think we are asking too much. As a matter of fact we are asking too little;

we have come down to a smaller point than has been authorised by our people, in these amendments; they have demanded and believed they ought to get much more. It may be said what is 10s. or £1 per year to the small man. I do not think that is a statesmanlike argument, or that it has anything to recommend it. 10s. or £1 is as much to the small man as £10 or £20 is to the bigger man, and that is no reason why this 10s. or £1 is nothing to the small man, and that the landlord should get more than he is entitled to for the commercial value of his land. It ought to be based on what the land could produce, what could be sold out of it, and what profit could be made out of it, and not on any other question. If it is not based on the value of its produce or its revenue it is not based on justice, and justice cannot be done if it is not based on the commercial value.

Mr. WILSON: The Minister is reserving all his artillery to the end. The case has been put up by Deputy Gorey that land in England situated in close proximity to the best markets in the world is fetching a comparatively cheaper price than the land in Ireland, based on its unimproved value. Land in England has a value produced by the landlord or landowner and the land in Ireland that we are buying is the land in a state of nature, and the improvements on the land in Ireland are improvements produced by the toil of the workers on the land. Leaving that aside I come to compare the terms of this particular Land Bill with the terms of the Land Bill of 1903. The Minister for Agriculture the other night asked us to get out our pencils quickly and calculate how much per cent. better this Bill was than the Bill of 1903. I intended to reply to him, but An Ceann Comhairle did not give me the opportunity, and I reserved my calculations until now. One of the contentions that the Minister set up was that you must take the average as half way between 1903 and 1923. These are the premises which the Minister has set up, and thus you take the average tenant who bought his land between 1903 and 1923, and you are to take the average reduction which that particular tenant got under the 1903 Act, and then on those premises he can prove that this particular Land Bill is ten per cent.

[Mr. Wilson.]
 better. Now, I want to see how this man will stand. Take a man who is on this side of the ditch paying £100 a year rental. Under the 1903 Act he would get 25 per cent. reduction, and he would pay off his annuities in 69½ years, so that the total sum he would pay at the end of that period would be £5,212 10s. These were the premises which the Minister for Agriculture mentioned, and they were the terms mentioned by Lord Dunraven, that is, 25 per cent reduction, which would mean an annuity of £75, and that multiplied by 69½ years gives you the sum of £5,212 10s. Now, let us take the other man on the other side of the ditch waiting for this Bill to come along. He has paid a rental of £100 a year for 10 years past, which amounts to £1,000. Then he comes along to buy, and he pays £65 annuity for 68 years, which makes £4,420. He has already paid £1,000, so that his total is £5,420. Place that against the man who under the 1903 Act paid £5,212 and you will find that the man who buys under this Bill so far from being 10 per cent. better than the 1903 Act man has actually paid £200 more remembering that he has paid £100 rental for 10 years past and that it takes £52 to redeem every £1 of rent. It takes £52 out of a man's sweat and toil to redeem £1 in this case, so you can see what a bargain it is that the tenant farmers of Ireland are getting. Now here is the reason why we ask for 40 per cent. If we get a reduction of 40 per cent. or 8s. in the £ under this Bill, then a man who did not buy under the 1903 Act, taking the figures I have previously given, as a basis, would pay £132 less than the man who bought under the 1903 Act. If he only gets the reduction provided under the Bill he would pay £200 more than the 1903 man, but if he gets the 8/- he will pay £132 less. Is it too much to ask the Minister to make the price such, that we, who are here to-day legislating 68 years in advance, when we do not know what will happen, whether we shall have a Workers' Republic or not, should be put in a reasonable position by giving us the benefit of this reduction of 8/- in the £? You must remember that the times have changed. What was considered a fair standard of life, on a farm 20 years ago, will not be considered a fair standard today. We have got to look at the times in which our children are growing up, and we must remember that they require a better standard than was possible in the past. We must remember we live in a free country, and that we want to enjoy the benefits this Constitution brings. We will not live in poverty, and we do not think we are asking too much when we ask for £132 out of a purchase price of £5,212 by a reduction of 8/- in the £ now. I think that is a fair case. We all heard what was stated about the price of land in England. I had land myself in Africa and I sold it at 10/- an acre fee-simple, but here in Ireland we have to pay £52 to redeem £1 of rental, and not alone that but the State has consented to spend £50,000 a year to do that. Therefore if you think over what you are doing, and look at it from the point of view of giving justice to the citizens, I reckon you are overweighting justice on the side of a minority against justice that should be given to 350,000 people who will be affected under this Act.

Mr. JOHNSON: I support the amendment on somewhat different grounds. I want to supplement the argument of the last Deputy by the suggestion that the farmers of the country as Deputy Gorey has shown, are justified in expecting that the standard of living for the next generation will be higher than the standard of living in the past generation; that the people living upon the produce of the soil, whether tenant proprietors or labourers employed by tenant proprietors will live at a higher level generally in the future than in the past. If that is not to be so then there is very little virtue in the change here in national status. But if that is so, if we have a fair right to expect that the farmers and their families will live on a higher standard than their fathers then there will be, in succeeding revisions of judicial rentals, or there would be, a considerable reduction because there would be so much less available for rental, and one would imagine that with the new conception of the social standards the Commissioners who would be deciding future rentals, if they were to be revised, as under the old system, would take into account, and must take into account, not merely the profits derivable from the soil and market prices, but also the standards of life which become current, and which were due to the tenant or his labourers who were living upon the produce of the land.

Consequently there would be inevitably a smaller sum available annually for payment for the landlord. That is a reasonable expectation supposing there was no compulsory Purchase Bill and that, I submit, is good ground for looking for a considerable reduction in the amount which is to be paid in annuities, because it will all have to come out of the produce of the soil whether annuities or rental, and it is the balance from it that should be the balance after having provided a reasonable standard of life for those who work the soil, and only that balance, which should be available either for annuity or rental. Then we have to take into consideration also the new situation created by the War. I will take a lesson from Deputy Magennis's lecture, and recognise the facts that are round about us. I will recognise that there has been a war, and I submit that the memory of that fact leads us to this conclusion, not only that the standards of living demanded by the people have been improved and have been raised, but that the expectation of high prices for agricultural produce are not likely to be realised, and that the margin payable to landlords as rental or to the bond holders as annuities will be smaller henceforward than in the past. It is a fair expectation, looking at the future, and taking that expectation into account, the case for a larger reduction than that mentioned in the Bill is a sound one. The Minister told us yesterday that it was quite an easy matter for irresponsible people to make a claim for something higher, no matter how much or how little, than he had found practicable, and because it was easy, there was no need to justify it. There was some force in that. No doubt it is much easier for those who are not responsible to put forward a case, but it is their duty to put forward a case even if it is easier. It is their duty to point out that this imposition upon that very considerable section of the community who are occupiers of the soil, and even that smaller section of the community that will be effected by this Bill are not going to be in as good a position unless at the expense of their comfort, and at the expense of a reasonable standard of living in the future, to pay this annual sum to those possessing these bonds.

There has been no bargain. The demand that has been made on the part of the tenants is for a greater reduction than that which is offered. The case that is made for a greater reduction is based on the price of land in England, according to the arguments that have been adduced by Deputies Gorey and Wilson. There is a further argument, of reasonable expectation, that the amount available for distribution in the form of interest to bond holders or rentals to landlords will be smaller in the future than in the past. Let us bear in mind that the proposition in this Bill is to secure, for all time for the landlords against almost any risk, a settled income in exchange for what may be a problematical income in the succeeding generation. They are making a good exchange if the Bill passes even with the amendment proposed by Deputy Gorey, a very good exchange for something certain: the backing of the State against something problematical which would depend entirely upon the seasons, upon currency variations and upon the standards of life demanded by workmen and farmers against the general standard of life that exists in the country at present. I maintain that, we have a right to hope and expect that henceforth in this country the margin for unearned income will be smaller in the future than in the past. The landlords, too, do expect that in the future the produce of the country will, in an increasing degree, be absorbed and used by the people who help to make the wealth of the country. They have the right to expect that, and they do expect it. They are not expecting that henceforth the landlord element in the country is going to have as easy a time, or would be likely to have as easy a time, in the future as in the past; they have the right to expect that under a National Government the people who do the work of the country will be the people who will get the benefit of the produce of the country, and with that reasonable expectation they are doing very well if they get 60 per cent. of their net revenue. The amendment proposed by Deputy Gorey is, I think, easily sustainable in discussion, and would be before a tribunal which was not obsessed

[Mr. Johnson.] by the position that landlords have held in the past—by a tribunal that took into account all the facts of to-day and the prospects of the future; any tribunal that took full regard of these prospects and present facts would, I think, conclude that the suggestion embodied in Deputy Gorey's amendment would be very generous compensation, and is the fullest amount the tenant should be reasonably expected to pay. We want that 10 per cent. and 5 per cent. to be paid to the labourers, where there are any.

Mr. WILSON: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSON: We would like the whole 65 per cent. to be made available for improving the standard of life for the labourers, and we are at one with the farmers in this: an alliance between the farmer and the labourer.

Mr. HOGAN: An unholy alliance.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is a holy alliance between those who work and are owners and those who work and are not owners, against those who do not work but draw rents or annuities. That is a holy alliance which, I hope, we shall see consummated and then have, what Deputy Wilson suggests, a real republic of workers.

Mr. HOGAN: I was glad to hear Deputy Gorey's speech, and I assume from it that he will now hand over the interest he draws from his Debenture holdings in railway stock.

Mr. GOREY: I have not got any.

Mr. HOGAN: I shall not be surprised if I find members of the Farmers' Party coming along and making an offering to the State of the interest that I hope they draw from the various companies in which they have their money invested. I have stated my reasons so often for this figure of 65 per cent. that I propose to confine myself strictly to the arguments advanced. Deputy Gorey has saved me a lot of trouble, because he has not put forward one single argument against the figure in the Bill. He started with a great flourish with regard to his figure of 40 per cent. He gave a number of what, I suppose, he would call reasons for that figure, but I suggest that all these reasons would apply equally to reductions of 50, 60, 80 or 100 per cent., and his argument would also apply to confiscating the landlords' property. I do not know why he does not advocate that. But he gave no argument, nor did Deputy Johnson, for this 40 per cent. figure, and I am still waiting for their arguments on that. It is true that on the 40 per cent. figure Deputy Wilson came to the rescue, and I must say he was extremely flattering to myself. He pointed out that the effect of this Bill was to place a tenant, whose rent was £100, and whose Poor Law Valuation would be about £120, that is to say a man with about 200 acres of fairly good land, at an advantage. The tenant is in such a magnificent position that he only loses £200 as a result of not having purchased under the 1903 Act. Notwithstanding that he has been twenty years paying rent—

Mr. GOREY: Not twenty years.

Mr. HOGAN: Make the time anything you like. But this farmer owning 200 acres of good land, rent £100, Poor Law Valuation £130 or £150, finds that the only disadvantage he is at, as a result of not having purchased for such a long period, is a loss of £200. I accept that position; if I have really succeeded in rescuing all the tenants of Ireland to such a large extent from the loss that they suffered by non-purchase, then I am on the point of making up my mind to go ahead. Having made such a magnificent success of this, certainly we ought now tackle the 400,000 tenants who did purchase under the 1903 Act and compensate them in the same way for not having purchased in 1885—

Mr. GOREY: That proves nothing at all. That is not an argument.

Mr. HOGAN: The farmer who owns a holding of 150 valuation and who has 200 acres of good land—

Mr. GOREY: With £100 rent.

Mr. HOGAN: I am quoting a member of your own Party. If I can put this farmer in the position that he has only lost £200, in spite of the fact that he has not purchased under the 1903 Act, and in spite of the fact that he is purchasing now when we cannot borrow money on anything like the same terms as a result of the war—having done that I am tempted to go ahead and tackle this problem of the 400,000 tenants who purchased under the 1903 Act and make up their losses because they did not purchase in 1885. In any event, I want to say that I am quite satisfied with Deputy Wilson's figures. If I have saved his particular friend all he has lost except £200 I am satisfied that I have done a very good day's work. That was really the only argument put forward in favour of the forty per cent. All the other arguments would apply equally to fifty, sixty, eighty or one hundred per cent.

We are acquiring property compulsorily. Does Deputy Gorey suggest that we ought to give a price for it which is less than two-thirds of its current value? Deputy Gorey does not hold the same views about property as Deputy Johnson, and I want to try and split this alliance. We are acquiring property compulsorily, and I would like to hear from Deputy Gorey whether he is prepared to subscribe to the principle that we should so acquire it at less than two-thirds of its current value.

Mr. GOREY: Who had the fixing of the current value?

Mr. HOGAN: The current value has been fixed by law for a period of over thirty years and has not shared in the inflation of prices due to the war. Let Deputy Gorey take his courage in his hands and enunciate that theory. Remember that we are acquiring not only landlords' property under this Bill, but we are acquiring tenants' property. We are acquiring future tenancies—men who can be put out on six months' notice—men who might have taken their lands two years ago, who have no title to them at all, but who at the same time we are allowing to purchase. Suppose we find we have to resume a number of tenanted holdings and future tenancies in respect of which no improvements were done, will we acquire them at fourteen years' or sixteen years' purchase?

Mr. GOREY: I suggest that you buy the landlords' interest at the figure you mention and then you proceed to buy the tenants' interest.

Mr. HOGAN: I am talking of buying the tenants' interest in a future tenancy.

You have the case of untenanted land farmed by the landlord, and, remember, the landlord may be another tenant in this case—perhaps a man who has far less land than Deputy Gorey, perhaps fifty or a hundred acres. He may have let thirty acres of it as a future tenancy, four, or five, or ten years ago.

Mr. GOREY: What does all this prove?

Mr. HOGAN: We are acquiring, let us say, a future tenancy now. What price will we give for it? If we are acquiring any other tenancy, what price shall we give for it—what number of years' purchase? What is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander.

Mr. GOREY: On a point of explanation, perhaps the Minister would tell us whether there is such a thing as tenant proprietorship or tenant interest at all.

Mr. HOGAN: I am saying there is a tenant interest. What is that future tenant's interest—the interest of a man who had never to put up any buildings, who probably never did any improvements, who was making a big profit out of the land during the war, and who has no legal interest, and very little moral interest, in it. We may have to acquire those lands for the relief of congestion. What price would we give for them? That is what I want to know. The landlord, in such a case, has a bigger interest than the tenant, if anything. It was, perhaps, untenanted lands fifteen years ago. He let it for temporary convenience at the request of the tenant. The tenant took it to suit his own convenience. He has no tenure there. The landlord's interest, if anything, is greater. I am not talking of present or judicial tenancies. I am talking of future tenancies, of which there are many. Deputy Gorey wants us to acquire the landlord's interest at a certain number of years' purchase—I have not been able to discover whether it is fifteen years, or fourteen years, or twelve years, because his arguments apply equally to all. What I want to know is what are we going to give for the tenant's interest.

Mr. GOREY: We will deal with that when it arises. We are beginning to know where the boot pinches now.

Mr. HOGAN: I agree with the Deputy that this is where the boot pinches. People cannot have it both ways. If the Deputy likes to come forward on this, the first occasion when the Free State is acquiring property compulsorily, and, regardless of the fact that the property has been a well-recognised security in the past, and that banking and charitable institutions, and stock-brokers and all sorts of people, are interested in it, suggests terms which cut into the security value of the property, just in order to make a temporary profit, let him do so; but he cannot have it both ways. If that is to be the rule in regard to this sort of property, it will be the rule in regard to future tenancies. When the State wants property in future, it will have to take it at considerably less than two-thirds of its current value.

Mr. GOREY: The Minister has asked for figures as between these and previous purchase figures.

Mr. HOGAN: I asked you to justify the 40 per cent.

Mr. GOREY: To come to the first term tenancies under the 1903 Act, we know from the Blue Book figures that the average reduction was just thirty per cent. What the tenant got on an average in the 26 counties was a little short of thirty per cent. By purchasing under that Act in 1909, he would be now purchased for 14 years. On £100 rental, that thirty per cent. for 14 years would be £420. If he bought immediately on the passing of the 1903 Act, he would be purchased now for 20 years, and that would mean £600.

Take the average percentage for a second-term rental under the 1903 Act, at a little less than 24, and multiply 24 by 14 and you get £336. If he bought immediately after the passing of the Act it would be £480. What is £600 now worth to the man who bought under the 1903 Act a first-term rental? He would have a capital sum of £600, and that would be worth £30 at any time. If he did not buy until 1909, when the operations of the Act ended, he could not have less than £420 under a first term tenancy. If he purchased second term, he could not have a lesser sum than £336, and could not have more than £480. How do those figures compare with the case of the man who did not purchase at all? He has paid in the meantime £600 in one case, £480 in another, or £420 in one case and £336 in another. We are asking that you put those on equality. Will 40 per cent. put them in a position of equality?

Mr. HOGAN: It would take about 60 per cent. on your figures, and 50 per cent. on Deputy Wilson's.

Mr. GOREY: If you can contradict those figures, well and good. If we put the present man on the same level, regardless of the number of years as between him and the man who purchased 20 years ago, we would have 33 per cent. in the case of the second term man added to the present price offered under the Bill. You cannot put them on the same level short of confiscation. We do not want confiscation. Neither 40 per cent. nor 50 per cent. would be just. We have suggested the lowest figure that we could reasonably ask. We did not think for a moment we were asking too much.

We suggested 40 per cent. because we thought we would have a chance of that figure being accepted by the Government. If we put up 50 per cent. we knew it would be turned down; we put up 40 per cent. in the hope of its being accepted, and we see no reason why it should not be. The amount was made lower than it really should be, so as to make it possible for the Government to do what is right. The great argument in favour of the present price to a landlord is that his estate is encumbered—that many landlords' estates are encumbered, that the rentals are encumbered and other charges have to be met, and that vested interests have grown up that require to be protected. That may be true, but we want to know the facts. There is something between £1,000,000 and £800,000 rental. We want to be sure we are dealing out justice. We want to know how much of that £800,000 or the £1,000,000 is encumbered. How much of this philanthropy, this effort to preserve the public credit, is at stake? How much of this rental is encumbered and how much is not? Are we giving away £45,000 or £50,000 a year as a bonus where, perhaps, 10 or 12 millions would be sufficient? We have not had any figures. If the landlords' case or the Government's case is good we should have those figures. This matter should not be done on assumptions or presumptions. We should also know how much these charitable and banking institutions have advanced, and what rate it bears to the rental. 'How much is advanced in proportion to each rental?' If we had these particulars perhaps we might be able to do justice. I do not want to go into figures. I have always heard that figures can prove anything. Figures in the hands of experts who could juggle with them could prove anything. I try to avoid figures as much as I can, especially in this Assembly. The whole argument in favour of this price is based on justice. We owe justice to every member of the human family. The question of what the people require now and will require in future has been dealt with by Deputy Wilson and others, and there is no occasion to travel over the same ground. The human family in the future will require a higher standard than in the past, and it is time they had it. More than two-thirds of the human family in this country have not a standard as good as an average animal in England.

Mr. DAVIN: Or in Ireland.

Mr. GOREY: Or perhaps in Ireland—I quite agree. They certainly have not. They have not as good a house, they have not as good a floor, and they scarcely have as good a bed. It is very doubtful if they have as good food. They certainly have not such abundance of food to meet the requirements of the human being as the animal. The animal is very much better treated than the human being. If this was based on justice it should be based on the profit derived from the use of the land. If you are not able to approach it from that point of view you should leave out the word justice, and deal with it from some other standpoint.

Mr. HOGAN: What about the price of these tenancies I asked about?

Mr. GOREY: A Leas-Chinn Comhairle—will you try and control the Minister? He does not like this at all. With regard to the price that ought to be paid for the land to the different interests I would point out that while there is only one interest in England there are two interests in this country. I would be the last to put money into land at the present price that is being paid for tenant's interest. It is ridiculously high; it is madness. It has been madness to pay such a price since the war. I have always held and expressed that view, and I am not going to recant now. But in buying Irish land from the fee-simple up you buy the landlord's interest and the tenant's interest. If you acquire tenanted land the landlord's interest has probably been bought under some previous Bill. You should pay for the tenant's interest at some reasonable rate, not an extravagant or a wild rate—not the rate obtaining at present—but something in proportion to what you are depriving him of.

Mr. HOGAN: Twelve years' purchase.

Mr. GOREY: That will be a question for future Governments. If you are going to deprive a man of his living you ought at least to compensate him for it. This Bill is not based on justice. I contend that the word justice does not apply to it at all. It is based on the balance sheets and the incomes of vested interests. Those interests have to be met according to this Bill—and probably according to the great forces behind it—as near one hundred per cent. as possible—as near at least as figures can go, and they can go a long way. Why is it that large farmers for the last three years have lost money in agriculture? There is no doubt that they have lost money. They have lost it because there were no profits to be made out of the land after paying the labour bill.

Mr. DAVIN: They do not work themselves.

Mr. GOREY: There is an Agricultural Commission sitting, and you can go there and bring all your witnesses from all over the country, and prove otherwise if you can. That is your answer. Farming is run at a loss by the bigger men. Why is the small farmer able to exist? Because of his intensive efforts, and of the low standard of comfort that he is content with; because of his natural craving for independence, and because he is satisfied to be under-fed and under-clothed in order to have that independence. If it were not for the intensive efforts of the small farmer and his family they [Mr. Gorey.] could not exist at all. Not alone is the small farmer doing his duty to the State, but he is doing the duty of three men. Other elements in this country are able to live doing nothing, because of the efforts of the men who work. I saw in the country on Saturday evening last men going home to their supper at 8.30 in the evening (old time), after which they came back and worked until ten o'clock. I know these men are out from 5.30 or 6 o'clock in the morning. That is the sort of thing that makes existence possible—it is not possible without slaving.

Mr. WILSON: Our proposal boiled down into figures means that we intend that the capital sum which should be paid to the landlord would be £1,263 plus 10 per cent. contribution, which would bring him in all £1,389, or 62.5 per cent. of his rental based on the revenues and securities of the Free State. I think that is a fair proposition. If I were a landlord I would take £62 10s. 0d. safely secured, rather than a nebulous £100. I believe the landlord would be doing a good thing for himself. When we ask for the 40 per cent. reduction, we are not alone trying to do justice to the landlord, but are trying to uphold the security of the State. We are just as much concerned about the welfare, safety, and credit of the State as any of the Ministers. We do not want confiscation or spoliation. We are offering 62.5 out of a suppositious £100 that will not probably eventuate.

Mr. MILROY: I want to ask Deputy Gorey a question, and I hope I will get a straight answer. If we were selling two or three hundred acres of his holding would the price he would ask be less or more than that which the Bill provides for the unpurchased tenants?

Mr. GOREY: In other words, would the Deputy sell his clothes for less than he paid for them?

Mr. MILROY: I would like to press for an answer. If the Deputy was willing to sell any of his present holding would he ask for a lesser or a greater price than that which the Bill provides for the present unpurchased tenants to buy their land?

Mr. JOHNSON: The question that has been put by Deputy Milroy was the same question that was raised by the Minister for Agriculture, and I want to find out whether Deputy Milroy or the Minister for Agriculture makes any distinction between these two things that are talked about—these two properties. Do they contend that when they are buying the right from the tenant to work certain lands that they are buying the same thing, or anything like the same thing, as when they are buying the right of the landlord, not to work the land, but to draw rent from the land?

Mr. GOREY: Deputy Milroy does not want that at all. That is not what he is sent here for.

Mr. MILROY: On a point of order, I think it is about time for whoever is responsible for the regulation of this assembly to take steps to control this peculiar Deputy who thinks that he has a licence to insult any member of this Assembly. He has made an observation which I will ask you to ask him to withdraw.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I will ask the Deputy first to withdraw the word "peculiar."

Mr. MILROY: Did I use the word "peculiar"?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I ask you to withdraw it.

Mr. MILROY: Suppose I substitute "fantastic." I will withdraw the other word.

Mr. GOREY: I think there is a good deal of justice in what Deputy Milroy says. I am peculiar.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Gorey or any other Deputy should not cast a reflection on other Deputies, and any Deputy who does so must withdraw the insinuation. Deputy Gorey has suggested that Deputy Milroy came here for unworthy motives. It is not fair to make an insinuation of that sort, and I will ask Deputy Gorey to withdraw that expression.

Mr. GOREY: I quite agree. I should not have said it and I apologise.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am anxious that the Dáil should be made acquainted with the views of Deputy Milroy and of the Minister for Agriculture in regard to these two things that are being purchased or referred to as purchasable. The Minister for Agriculture made it quite clear in introducing this Bill that what was proposed to be purchased was a rental, not the land. It has been generally conceded in the discussions that it was the legal right to draw rent that was being purchased. Is it contended that that is the same thing as the tenants' interest, the tenants' interest being the right to occupy and work that land? I submit there is a very great distinction. You cannot and ought not to treat these two things as though they were parallel, and try to put posers to Deputy Gorey or Deputy Wilson or any other person, in regard to their right to work their land as contrasted with the landlords' right to extract rent from the land. While this may be an academic question it goes right to the heart of this Bill and the proposals in it. It is the right to extract rent which is supposed to be purchased and that may be of very little value in 10, 20 or 30 years' time. As Deputy Wilson said the future value is quite nebulous, and in two or three years' time it may not exist at all. According to some of the statements that are put into the Press the country is going to the dogs and there is not going to be any value at all in the landlord's interest. I ask the Minister for Agriculture if he lays it down that there is no difference in the kind of property that is under consideration—the property of the tenant occupier, the proprietor who works the land and the property which is merely the legal right to draw rent?

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy wants to know whether the right to draw rent is the same as the right of the tenant who works the land, or whether it is more or less. It depends on the nature of the tenancy. If a small tenant lets five acres of his land to a conacre tenant for a year, the right of the tenant at the same time is much greater than the right of the man who takes the conacre, even though this man does the work, and is worth more money. On the other hand the right of a present tenant is undoubtedly more valuable than the right of the landlord. The right of a future tenant is a totally different matter. It was the right of a future tenant I was discussing with Deputy Gorey.

Mr. SEARS: We have had a very interesting discussion this evening, and we on this side have watched the progress of the allies. We heard Deputy Gorey advance principles that were applauded more vehemently on the labour benches than any other principles I heard applauded in the Dáil. Then as a kind of return Deputy Johnson pressed the farmers' interests by advancing arguments that were of the most capitalistic colour. They were at once accepted, and there were gracious bows exchanged between the two parties. They have changed places. If you closed your eyes you would think that what Deputy Johnson was saying was what he should have allowed Deputy Gorey to say, and all that Deputy Gorey should say was put forward by Deputy Johnson in his usual clear and precise style. I am afraid you will see these arguments flung back again with scorn from one side to the other later on. After what we heard about what 9s. a week means to the poor farmer we will be told how much more it means to the poor worker. We also heard about these poor men who are living in bad houses, and who are getting worse feeding than cattle. The debate was very fair and legitimate as a debate. I would not say one word here in favour of encumbered landlords. I felt an echo in my heart for everything that Deputy Gorey said about these gentlemen who piled up big debts on Irish estates, and squandered the money. I have no sympathy for that sort of thing, nor has any man in the Dáil, but what we have to remember is that this is the heel end to a big question, and that it is settling up what was commenced in former Land Acts, and in particular the Act of 1903. Let us do the decent thing, and get this question out of the way. We are not saying that there is justice in giving all this to the landlords. The landlords are there, and as the other landlords got something the present ones should also get something. They are not getting too much, considering all the interests involved. I am sorry that the farmer is not faring better, though the landlord is only getting £1,500 compared to £2,500 that could be got under the 1903 Act. That does not represent a corresponding advantage for the tenant. This Bill, considering all things, is a very fair and reasonable Bill, and being so I ask the Dáil to keep that in mind. It is a bargain, an approximation. Deputy Gorey spoke of very real things when he spoke of the small farmer, and the small holding where all the family work, where they start at an early hour in the morning and finish at a late hour in the evening, and whose living is on a very low standard. By such means they carry on. It is in the interests of such men this Bill is introduced, and that the Dáil should pass it. This particular Bill is part and parcel of a certain policy, and the spokesman of that policy made it possible, and say it is the best thing that could be done as a bargain between all interests. The Bill is offered as a fair thing, and gives an opening and a chance in the future to the small man. Do some justice to those who are clearing it. This is your Bill and your bargain, and do not try to upset it, and take the best part of it away. Do not smash the Bill, and do not smash the whole thing. I have sympathy with all those points brought forward, but the fact that it is a bargain must be borne in mind. We have to take the good and the bad. We have to swallow the whole lot as it is.

[Mr. Sears.]

Mr. LYONS: I was more than pleased to hear the remarks of the last Deputy when he referred to the union that has been created here between the Farmers' Party and the Labourers' Party. I hope in the interests of the country that that unity will continue amongst us. I can, as a Labour man, assure the Dáil it will not be the fault of the Labour Party if a unity like that is broken.

Mr. CORISH: Send him down to Waterford.

Mr. GOREY: Come over here to these benches.

Mr. LYONS: I want to support this amendment, and not simply because it is put forward by Deputy Gorey. If the same amendment is put forward by any of the members in the Government benches I am sure that the Saorstát will rise in the morning and see in the Press where the Labour Party threw in their lot with the Government for this particular amendment. I think it is really necessary that this amendment should be accepted. For surely 60 per cent. is quite enough to give the landlords. Before this Bill was introduced, there were in the country some very large holders of land, who had actually advertised their land for sale. But when they read the terms of the Bill and found they were getting 65 per cent. they removed the posters and said they would wait until the Bill goes through, "Because" said they, "we would not get so much at the auction." Deputy Gorey spoke of the men in an impoverished state, and he also mentioned the amount of good that those particular landlords have done to the country, and the amount of employment they gave on the land and the amount of improvements they carried out while the land was in their possession. That reminds me of a little story I read in a book some years ago. It happened somewhere down in Waterford where a poor man went to a large landowner who owned something like 1,600 or 1,700 acres. The tenant thought to get into the good graces of the landlord and lay down at the hall door and started to eat the grass. The landlord came out and said "my poor man what is the matter with you?" And the tenant replied "I am impoverished and destitute." The landlord said to him "get round to the back of the house, the grass is much finer and sweeter there." These are the men to whom the Saorstát are now asked to give a rent that will cripple the future tenants or the tenants who are already in occupation. I certainly support this amendment not for the interest of the big farmer, the man with the £200 valuation, but for the small man, the man who possibly cannot afford to pay. Furthermore, I think that when we take into account particularly the two classes of farms taking the fee simple holding, say, of a £30 valuation, and take another farm of the same valuation that carries a rent of £12 a year, I think something more should be done for that man who is paying £12 a year, than for the man who is a freeholder more or less. That is why I support this amendment. Deputy Wilson was large in his remarks; He maintained that £200 will be lost by the tenant who will buy under this Act. That £200 will be lost by him. That was gained by the tenant who purchased under the 1903 Act. The Minister for Agriculture wants to know if Deputy Gorey or any citizen had money invested would they hand over the whole sum raised through that money being invested. I think that was a wrong remark thrown at Deputy Gorey and Deputy Wilson. I am not quite sure that the money they had invested was money they earned, but the money you give to the landlord has not been earned by him. They have not done anything in this country to deserve the amount of fairplay given under this particular Clause. I think it is high time that we asked those landlords to hand over to the original owners the land that belongs to the people of Ireland. The land of Ireland has been long enough in the hands of a few. I am sure that the Minister for Agriculture will try the influences he has, when this amendment of Deputy Gorey's will be put to a vote. I am sure notwithstanding the words that have been said in the previous speeches about the Minister for Agriculture throughout the country that he was the only man that could succeed in getting a Bill that could satisfy everybody, that it will be said to-morrow that he got that Bill to satisfy the landlords and that he had no interest in the tenants.

Mr. DOYLE: I support the amendment, and I believe myself that the Minister and Government ought to accept it—for State reasons alone. It has been debated from every point of view except from one, and that is the tenant's. The tenant should not be compelled to pay any higher rate than 60 per cent. of his present rent. At the present state of Agriculture, and the state it has been in for the last three or four years, it is impossible to pay any more. Agriculture has been losing for the last three or four years and everybody engaged in agriculture knows that thoroughly well. How then is a farmer to pay an impossible annuity? I consider that the State will be well advised in making his annuity as low as it possibly can. For this reason—that they will leave him in a position of being able to pay his annuity, and pay his rates and taxes. If they put too big an imposition on him, if they put too high an annuity on him, it will leave him in a condition that he will not be able to meet any of his engagements whatsoever. You know when the 1903 Act was passed, things were very different. Things were very different with regard to the men engaged in agriculture at the time. The cost of production at that time was very little—not more than one third of what it is at present. And then he came along for a number of years at that cost of production. He got a reasonable profit in those particular years. Then the Minister talked about inflated prices. He said nothing was to be had in those years. If he looks at this inflation from a tenant's point of view he will see that the latter had to pay more for every hand's turn he got done on his farm, and so the inflation was not as large as the Minister thinks. There was also inflation on his purchases. The farmer had to pay for any farm implements he purchased during those years four times as much as when the 1903 Act was passed for everything was dear in comparison with then. The inflation of his prices was brought down by the inflation of the purchases he had to make, and this is not a matter which is being taken into consideration at all. I say that the State and Government should try and leave that annuity as low as they possibly can so as to give the tenant purchaser a chance to pay his annuity, his outgoings, and his rates and taxes. If those things are not paid, that is the annuities, rates and taxes, the country will go bankrupt, and I say to the State and the Minister to accept the lowest annuity they can.

The PRESIDENT: Yesterday we were told that there were something like 70,000 tenants, and a rental in the neighbourhood of £800,000 a year. According to that a very large proportion of the persons affected by this Bill would be paying a rental of £10 a year. Now, under the Bill the sum for which they would be liable is this: a person who had to pay a rent of £10 a year would pay £6 10s., and the proposal is to reduce it to £6. We are told from one side of the Dáil that the difference between £6 and £6 10s. will compensate for what is regarded as the normal standard type of life, and put the tenant in the position to enjoy all the advantages of a higher standard. I am in some difficulties to know how this is to be done on 10s. a year. We are told from the other side that this 10s. a year spelt bankruptcy. I have never come across a case in which 10s. a year made a man bankrupt. The Deputies may know of such a case, and in justice to the Dáil they should tell us. There is one order we must admit, in connection with this Bill not represented here. The landlords have no representatives here. The Deputies have an excellent opportunity of pillorying the Government, and saying "you are fine specimens, and you are defenders of this Order that ought to be exterminated."

[The President.]

LABOUR DEPUTIES: No.

The PRESIDENT: Oh yes, you are in that position. You are able to say that. But we have got to strike a fair and even balance. We were not able to strike it in this case, and Deputies know it well. In the one case all that could be afforded was something like 13½ years' purchase. If one mentioned that in 1903 what would be said?

Mr. GOREY: It would be the same price if you got the money at 2½ per cent.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Order, you cannot interrupt.

The PRESIDENT: We have bolstered up that at the cost of the State. I may tell the Dáil that it was only after a very long and careful consideration that I even considered the question of bolstering up that contribution by reason of the fact of the condition of our finances. This particular order that has got no representation here at all has got to have something said for its side of the case. Deputies say it has none. If you say it has none, why then do you give it 60 per cent.? No honest man would stand up and say give them 60 per cent. if he thought that. He should say "give them nothing."

If you presume to give them anything at all you ought to give them what is fair. If we are prepared to give them what is fair then we ought to consider it on a fair basis, and consider how it will effect one and the other. We cannot get an acceptance from those concerned of a 60 per cent. payment of the former rental. We are then faced with the position that there are citizens of this State who are entitled to ask that the machinery of the State be put in motion, and Deputies know what that means. You can if you like at a particular time pass this Bill over the head of the Seanad. You may now—but I doubt it. It will be held up for nine months, and meanwhile the machinery of the State must operate. Suppose it is held up for nine months.

How many tenants will be deprived of what you are trying to save them now?

Mr. GOREY: I wish to God it were held up.

The PRESIDENT: You know well it cannot be done, and it is well known that it may not be done.

Mr. GOREY: I hope it will be held up. They will get an opportunity of holding it up.

The PRESIDENT: Well then you are going to justify the holding up of the machinery of the State. The citizen has his rights. Are you going to deprive him of them without having the law to back you?

Mr. GOREY: We will have the law at the next election.

The PRESIDENT: If it be elections that are mentioned it is a new matter. We can deal with that. This is the first time a question of this kind was mentioned in this Dáil. I thought that every member brought in what he could of ability which he contributed towards the solution of urgent, public matters regardless of whether or not he should be returned at the next Election. I may tell the Deputies that there is not any one on those benches here who cares about being in public life. They are here for the country. The majority of the members of this party want to get out. We can only keep them in by the greatest possible persuasion. We keep them in for one reason, and the Deputy knows that reason. You can dissolve this party to-morrow but will the Deputy deal with the difficult situation we are faced with?

Mr. GOREY: If the time comes, we will.

The PRESIDENT: If that be the case we are willing at any moment to give you an opportunity. It is not for love of office we are staying here. It is for one purpose we got into this thing for the last 6 or 7 years, and certainly it was not our intention at the beginning that public life would be the sport of any parties. I think it will be admitted that Deputies on this side have suffered, and lost a great deal. The real question here is what can you do in justice? You cannot maintain in justice that 10s. difference in a £10 rental is going to bankrupt you, and can it be proved that 10s. a year is going to give a man a higher standard of living.

One case put forward was that the landlords were getting security. Take care whether they are getting security or not. Take care what will be the value of the particular security. Take care how much it may affect very important interests in the State, in which the Deputy's interests are just as much bound up as those of the landlord, and perhaps more so, because I do not believe that there is any larger interest in the country than the agricultural interest. Take care that the industrial, banking and other interests are not lessened in amount, lessened in value, lessened in importance, for upon the security of these depends, to a very great extent, the value of the country's agricultural industry. It was stated that they would get security. I would like to know from the Deputies if we were in a position to say to-morrow, so far as labour is concerned, that they should have a forty per cent. reduction on the rather nebulous incomes that they have derived for some years and that we guarantee them that, would it be accepted?

Mr. JOHNSON: Tempt us.

The PRESIDENT: This has not been put forward in that way. If Deputies would put forward that, I am inclined to think that a great many of the important industrial interests of the country would accept it, and I am inclined to think that a great many supporters of the Deputies opposite, whom they represent, would not be agreeable to that proposition. Deputies might say "yes," but the men themselves might say "no." Forty per cent. is a very considerable reduction in income in the case of many of these estates. I do not know to what extent they are encumbered. I have been informed that there have been considerable mortgages in certain cases, and I do not think that the Deputy was wise in criticising charitable organisations which had certain mortgages on them. Certainly one must look for some security. Formerly, practically the entire security in a country was in its landed property, its landed estates. That has passed away; the world has changed; the value that formerly affected landed estates has passed away and other securities have been substituted such as War Loan, or things of that sort. People might criticise these charitable organisations, but they were perfectly entitled and justified in taking these mortgages and you are not justified in reducing their value. After all, it may be very much of an accident that Deputy Gorey has a pretty considerable farm and that a man beside him has a very small farm. The time may come when that man may think that that farm is too much for one man and he may attempt to get a slice off it, and other men may come along and take parts of it, and the Deputy might find himself in the position of a small farmer. If the majority of the people of the country are very poor----

Mr. GOREY: That argument is no good.

The PRESIDENT: Perhaps not. I am sure it would take a good deal to assure the Deputy of the danger of it, but the danger is there. Now, I have put it to the Deputies that this is a case for common justice. We approached it from that angle entirely. It would have been a very popular thing for us to have put down the 40 per cent. reduction. It would perhaps have involved the State in consequences in which we did not think we were justified in involving it. From all the information that we have been able to gain we are satisfied that the Bill as it stands is accepted in good faith by the people, who are just in their decisions in such matters. There is nothing in it to commend it to them but common justice, and it is in that spirit that we are putting it forward.

Mr. DAVIN: I regret that some of the things mentioned by the President were introduced, because I think they have no bearing whatsoever upon the conduct of this debate so far as we are concerned. If one were to take his speech seriously, one would be led to believe that the whole foundation of the State was trembling in the balance and affected altogether by the landlords' consideration, so far as this Bill was concerned. We were told by the Minister for Agriculture himself that this question is really a simple one because of the small acreage involved, because of the very small number of unpurchased tenants, and because of the very small number of landlords who would be concerned by the Bill, compared with those who had already purchased and settled under previous Acts. Therefore, the matter cannot really be so serious for the State as the Minister for Finance asks us to believe, Deputy Sears taunted Deputies on this side of the Dáil with the unity existing in this matter between the Farmers' Party and ourselves regarding a matter which, I think, concerns the agricultural workers and the small tenant farmers. If that unity—and I say this seriously—is any indication of a greater spirit of co-operation between the two being set up I welcome it most heartily, and, as far as we are concerned, we will do nothing that will impair or break it. The whole thing boils down to what is considered a fair price. In this matter it is very hard to find out who could be the best judge. The Minister for Finance said that the landlords have no representation here, and that therefore they are not able to put up any good case in defence of the attitude adopted by Deputy Gorey and his followers. I am sure that the landlords' side of the case is very well known to the Minister for Agriculture because of the many conferences that he has had with their representatives.

[Mr. Davin.]

Mr. HOGAN, Quite true.

Mr. DAVIN: Well then, I take it that the Minister for Agriculture is the defendant on behalf of the landlords on that particular point.

Mr. HOGAN: On a point of order, how does the Deputy deduce that from the fact that I happen to know the landlords' side of the case as they put it up to me? I did meet the landlords. I met the unpurchased tenants often. Is it because I met the landlords and heard their side of the case —

Mr. DAVIN: Is that a point of order?

Mr. HOGAN: That I am the defender of their side of the case here?

AN LEAS-CHEANN-COMHAIRLE:

It is a point of personal explanation more than a point of order.

Mr. DAVIN: Deputy Sears seemed to think that because the landlords of the larger and different class voluntarily agreed to sell under the 1903 Act, the landlords who have held out against any of the previous Acts are entitled to the same consideration. I may be pardoned for making the distinction between the two classes, and the distinction to me appears to be this, that the landlords who sold under the 1903 Act, or previous Acts, were people who were inspired with some national outlook, with some consideration for the other side, and who made what they considered to be a fair bargain. That class of landlord generally is a landlord who has lived and spent his money within the country and put it in circulation within the country. On the other hand, the landlord who has held out against any previous Act, and who has now been compelled to sell, is the landlord who has drawn rent out of a small number of unpurchased tenants and who has spent the money outside this State. That is a different matter altogether, and to me, at any rate, there is quite a difference between the two classes of landlords. I look upon any person, whether he be a landed proprietor or otherwise, as patriotic in the sense that whatever money he derives, by rent or by other means, he spends within the State. That type of man is a patriotic citizen whether he be a landlord or a worker, and he is the man who keeps this or any other State going.

My concern in regard to the question of price is mostly with the person who has lost the most during the past two or three admittedly very bad years. Deputy Gorey has pleaded very well on behalf of that particular class and the small tenant farmer who, it has been admitted, has been very badly hit because of circumstances over which he has had no control, and who is called upon to pay a price out of the labour of his family, although he has no control over the prices of the produce which he helps to grow. I think that is a very unfair thing so far as the man who helps to produce the food of the country is concerned, and I think that should be taken into consideration.

The Minister for Local Government seems to be amused at some of these statements, and the Bill has been defended by the Minister for Agriculture and the Front Bench in a very amusing way. They apparently believe there is nothing in anything put up except by themselves. Deputy Sears went very far when he said that the people who are responsible for this Bill are the people who are responsible for making it possible for the Dáil to meet and to bring forward the first Irish Land Bill. Let me ask him whether he thinks that the people who are sitting with him on that side of the Dáil are the only people who made it possible for us to meet in the Dáil. The small tenant farmer and the working classes have taken their share of the sacrifices that have made it possible for us to meet here just as much as those of whom Deputy Sears speaks. It appears to me he is inclined to give no credit except to that particular class. I put to the Minister for Finance a fair question which I think has some bearing on the aspect of the case which even he himself put up. Would he be prepared to offer to the labourers of this country 60 per cent. of their present wages while they did no work? That is what he is giving to the landlords who held out against previous Acts, and to whom he is offering this under the terms of this Bill. I ask him that in all fairness, seeing the attitude he has adopted and the case he has put up for the people who have never done any work so far as this country is concerned.

Mr. GOREY: I have reserved some little facts and figures for the last. The Minister for Finance has inspired me with them. I know that the Minister for Finance knows a little about finance. He is a business man, and business was his object in life until he started politics, and his view point ought to be the view point of a business man. I know a little, too, about Land Purchase from its business aspect. Since 1919 and 1920, when money was in the country, twelve estates were sold in my county, voluntary sales between landlords and tenants, and the terms were arrived at by agreement at a round table at which I sat, and all those sales were carried out under a cash transaction. The average price was between 11 and 12½ years for cash. The Minister for Finance talks about 100 per cent. of the landlord's income. If he was a landlord and knew anything about property, or landlordism, or the collection of rents, or even the history of the recent Acts, he would know that that 100 per cent. was never received by any landlord. He would know that he had the cost of collection, that there were legal expenses and other charges incidental to the collection of the rents that could not be got away from. If he read up the report of the Convention held at Trinity College, he would know that the net income of the landlord at that time was voluntarily agreed on as 75 per cent. of his income. That is 25 per cent. gone west, and that he never had. He would have 75 per cent. of his income—if he could collect it. He, as a man who owned a property, got as much as he could collect; he had to meet bad years and good years, and got what he could collect, and no more. What was the average collection of many of the Estate Offices in this city? Go back before the fat years of war and tell us what was the average collection on £1,000. How much of that was collected? I challenge the Minister to get these figures for me.

The PRESIDENT: I thought the Deputy was going to give me information, but it appears he is asking for it.

Mr. GOREY: I am giving him the information, and I challenge him to contradict my figures. What was the average collection? According to the Convention Report it was 75 per cent., if he could collect it. How much did he collect in the forties, the fifties, the eighties and the nineties, and even in the tens of this century? Did he collect 75 per cent.? Nothing of the sort; he was entitled to that if he could get it, but he never got it. There were circumstances in every case which made it impossible for him to get it. Deputies smile. I want to tell them that this is not a joke, and it was not a joke when one and a half year's rent had to be forgiven. Deputy Hughes knows nothing about it.

Mr. HUGHES: Apparently no one knows anything about it except Deputy Gorey.

Mr. GOREY: Deputy Hughes knows more about trade.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: It would be better if these interruptions would not take place. The Deputy has spoken three times already. The first time fourteen minutes, the second time thirteen minutes, and he must be short now.

Mr. GOREY: The President has spoken of extermination. There is no question of extermination at all; it is a question of offering these landlords a fair business proposition. There is £75, if he can collect it, but there is always a considerable element of doubt about that collection, and about how much of it he [Mr. Gorey.] can collect. How much would any sensible business man, the President, for instance, accept as an absolute certainty for that sum of considerable uncertainty?

THE PRESIDENT: The Deputy has paid rent himself; if he tells us how much he has paid on £100, I will accept that.

AN CEANN-COMHAIRLE at this stage resumed the Chair.

MR. GOREY: How much I paid on £100? I owe a few years' rent at present, and my father owed more before I came along. Perhaps some of the Deputies would call him dishonest or immoral, but it never troubled his conscience. I asked the President a question, and he has not answered me. What would he take as a fair equivalent for seventy-five years, an absolutely gilt-edged security, for a security of considerable uncertainty? What would he or any sensible business man take? The landlords in my county agreed to take twelve and a half years' purchase. They agreed to take less than 60 per cent., and they thought they were doing good business; and here we are met by talk of confiscation and extermination when we make a lesser demand. But the men who had property to sell, and did sell it voluntarily within the last three years, were sensible men and knew their business, and knew what certainty was as against uncertainty. There is no use in coming here and talking about extermination and confiscation, and indulging in the histrionics we have heard about the unfortunate landlord. The speech of Deputy Sears a few minutes ago was witty, and there was no malice in it; but if you take the wit out of it there was nothing left. This is a question I think the President, as a business man, or any other business man in the Dáil, ought to answer—how much as a fair proposition would he take for £75 when his chance of recovering it would be very remote? How much as a bulk sum would he take? Would he take £60 or £55? If he was a business man he would, and he would not grumble about it.

MR. HOGAN: I really did not think it was worth my while to rise to answer the points put forward by Deputy Gorey or by any of the other speakers up to the present. There has not been a single attempt by Deputy Gorey to produce a single intelligent argument in favour of the figure he put forward, or a single intelligent argument against the figure that I put forward. We simply have had a lot of hot air from Deputy Gorey and a lot of hot air, more or less, from the Farmers' party.

MR. GOREY: Hot air on the part of the landlords has been put forward by the Minister.

MR. HOGAN: And we have had all this for 10s. per annum.

MR. GOREY: Yes, why not?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Order, Order. Deputy Gorey will have to sit quiet and cease from interrupting. I am getting completely tired of Deputy Gorey's interruptions, and I cannot allow him to continue.

MR. HOGAN: Let me now try to bring a little common sense into this debate. We have been here for hours and the proceedings have been a perfect farce so far as the Farmers' party is concerned. We have had plenty of histrionics, plenty of excitement, and there has been a lot of hot air about. For the average tenant 10s. is the figure involved, and that was only arrived at a couple of days ago. It had been 50 per cent.—that was the figure put forward through the organisation; they started at sixty and it reached fifty-four and three-quarters, on one occasion, which was meant, of course, to show how accurately the figure was arrived at. Now the figure is forty per cent. As the President has pointed out, that is for the average tenant 10s. per annum. The business of the Dáil must be held up, in order that the country may be shown how some people's hearts are bleeding and are broken for the unpurchased tenant, and how other people's hearts are not. The very party that Deputy Gorey represents agreed with the landlords to take a twenty-five per cent. reduction in 1920.

MR. GOREY: Nothing of the sort!

MR. HOGAN: Was there not an agreement between the landlords and the Farmers' Union in 1920 to settle upon a twenty-five per cent. reduction basis?

MR. GOREY: There was an agreement between the Farmers' Union and the landlords of those days.

MR. HOGAN: What! 1920?

Mr. GOREY: There was an agreement between them in that year to take thirty per cent. reduction on first term rents, and twenty-four per cent. reduction on second term rents. I want to say that the Farmers' Union in those days was a Landlords' union led by a landlord, Colonel O'Callaghan Westropp, and backed up by landlords' men, in the union. They were kicked out of it and then we formed the Unpurchased Tenants' Organisation. They did not represent the unpurchased tenants and never acted for them.

Mr. HOGAN: We could all get excited if we wanted to, as well as Deputy Gorey. I take his own figure. They accepted thirty per cent. for first term rents, and twenty-four for second term rents. They accepted the terms of the 1920 Act, which gave an average reduction of 25 per cent. on first and second term rents. I am giving a reduction of 35 per cent. The Farmers' Union accepted the 25 per cent. reduction under the 1920 Act, and, I ask, did Deputy Gorey or any member of the Farmers' Union ever denounce the action of the Union at that time for accepting such a reduction, or write a single letter to a newspaper in Ireland denouncing this betrayal of the interests of the unpurchased tenants by what we are now told was this renegade Farmers' Union.

Mr. WILSON: The price for produce was different then.

Mr. HOGAN: Here is a serious question, be it big or small, and as Deputy Davin knows, it is not the number of tenants involved, it is the principle of how much you are going to pay where you acquire property compulsorily. The serious question is, how much you are going to give for it. It is a serious question, even from Deputy Gorey's point of view, the question of how much you are going to pay for property that you acquire compulsorily. How did the Farmers' Union tackle it? They started off with a demand for a 60 per cent. reduction, then they came down to 54½ per cent., and later to 50 per cent., and now we have a demand for a 40 per cent. reduction. Previously, as I have stated, they were satisfied with a 25 per cent. reduction. I say this is pure casual guess work. I said before that I do not begrudge the farmers or the Labour Party their pic-nic. They have a magnificent opportunity, and if we on these benches had such an opportunity I am sure we have splendid imaginations and would look for a 60 per cent. reduction if we thought we could get it. We could have made tremendous speeches about the poor tenants of Ireland, but we did not talk about land purchase; we did not go around the country when the confusion was at its height and when you had the energies of any man who had the good of the country at heart trying to bring about conditions of peace and security, and trying to do what they could to allay the class war that was developing at the time. We did not go around the country at that time preaching doctrines that we did not believe in in regard to the price at which property should be compulsorily acquired. On the contrary, we tried to see to it, as far as we could, that any man in the country whether a landlord, a tenant or a workman would get his legal rights. We have done that, and we are now introducing this Land Purchase Bill. I have heard a good many speeches from people who were never within half a mile of an unpurchased tenant, and who know nothing about his condition. They talk now about his rights and his wrongs, but I say that 95 per cent. of the unpurchased tenants of the country know perfectly well that the price in this Bill is a tip top one from their point of view. Deputy Gorey knows that, too, just as well as I do, and so does the rank and file of the unpurchased tenants. A reduction of 35 per cent. is considerably more than they ever expected to get, and Deputy Gorey, and every other Deputy in this Dáil, I do not care to what Party he belongs, knows that perfectly well. The unpurchased tenants know that that reduction is a good deal better than they ever expected to get, and that it is more than fair. I explained on the First and Second Reading of the Bill why we arrived at this price. I put forward specific reasons, and I have waited here since to hear one of them deliberately met or to be shown to be inaccurate or unsound in any respect. I have not heard it done. No one has attempted to do it. It was simply histrionics from all Parties when they were not engaged in an academic discussion on the rights of property, histrionics which are about twenty years out of date and which deceive nobody. I said in introducing the Bill that we tried to be just to the landlords and generous to the tenants. These terms are generous to the tenants; the tenants know they are generous and Deputy Gorey knows it also, and if, as a result of any monkey tricks, this Bill was beaten, and that the price in it was not obtained, it would be very bad business for Deputy Gorey and the Deputies sitting with him. Amendment put.

[Mr. Hogan.]

The Dáil divided: Tá, 21; Níl, 33.

Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Domhnall Mocháin.
Tomás de Nóglá.
Liam de Róisto.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlucháin.

Séamus Éabhróid.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Broin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghoasa.
Risteárd Mac Fheorais.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Nil.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Uaitéar Mac Cumhaill.
Seán Ó Maolruaith.
Pádraig Mac Ualghair.
Seosamh Mac Suibhne.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Sir Séamus Craig.
Liam Trift.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béasláí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.

Séamus Ó Cruadhlh.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Proinsias Bultin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Aindriú Ó Laimhín.
Liam Ó hAodha.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Eamán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faote.
Séamus de Burea.

The amendment was declared lost.

DAIL RESUMES.]

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: As it is now after 8.30 the Committee reports progress and will sit again to-morrow.

As has already been decided the Dáil will meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.35 p.m. until Friday, July 6th, at 12 o'clock, noon.

DÁIL EIREANN.

DE HAoine, 6ADH IúIL, 1923.

(Friday, 6th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar a 12.5 p.m. Bhí an Ceann Comhairle, Micheál O hAodha, sa Chathaoir.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

[ORAL ANSWERS.]

ANCIENT BUILDING AT HOWTH.

EARNAN ALTUN asked the President whether the Government are taking any steps to prevent the erection of a shop in the ancient building known as The College, which forms a portion of the Abbey at Howth; whether, in view of the fact that this building is probably the only example of such structures left in Ireland, the Government will endeavour to protect it and secure it for the nation.

MINISTER for FISHERIES (Mr. F. Lynch) replying for the President: The Abbey at Howth is in the guardianship of the Board of Works as an Ancient Monument, but the building known as The College is not included in the premises vested in the Board, and they have no power over it. If the Deputy will let me have the evidence on which he bases his view of the historic interest of the building, I will consider it.

Mr. ALTON: I will be very glad to let the Minister have the information required.

CENTRALIZATION OF POOR RELIEF.

TOMAS de NOGLA asked the Minister for Local Government whether he has received a resolution from the Glin Rural District Council, protesting against the centralization of poor relief, and the administration of the Medical Charities Act under a County Committee, and whether he is prepared to make any arrangements which would meet the Council's desire for local control of these matters.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. E. Blythe): The resolution referred to has not yet reached me. There need be no apprehension on the part of the Glin Rural District Council as to the effects of centralising local administration in these matters.

MALLOW-MITCHELSTOWN-WATERFORD RAILWAY LINE—QUESTION OF RE-OPENING.

MICHEAL O HAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he will state if preparations are being made to re-open the line Mallow to Mitchelstown, to Waterford; whether he is aware that the people in this large area are suffering severely for want of this service, and when he proposes to have this line re-opened.

Mr. BLYTHE (replying for Minister for Industry and Commerce): On the Dungarvan-Waterford Branch the main repair is that of Ballyvoile Viaduct. This is a specially difficult job, and has been delayed by an alteration in the method of repair designed to keep as much of the work in the country as possible. It will necessarily take some months before the repair is completed according to the altered design.

On the Mallow-Dungarvan and Fermoy-Mitchelstown Branches all damage has now been made good with the exception of the Carrig Viaduct and the bridge at Cappoquin. The repair of Carrig Viaduct is being carried out by the Government and the contract for the timber centering has been completed. The contract for the masonry work is now proceeding and the whole is due for completion on the 22nd August next. The repair at Cappoquin is being carried out by the Railway Company and, if no interruption to the work is caused by any stoppage at the Ports, is due for completion on or about the same date as Carrig Viaduct.

OCCUPATION OF CASTLEGREGORY (CO. KERRY) PREMISES.

SEAN O CRUADHLAIOICH asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that the premises of Mr. John O'Donnell, Castlegregory, Co. Kerry, have been considerably damaged while in the occupation of National troops, and that he has suffered great hardship by the closing down of this business, and that no effort has been made to adjust the claim or visit the premises; to ask that this claim is adjusted immediately.

[Sean O Cruadhlaioich.]

Mr. LYNCH (replying for the Minister for Defence): I am aware that the premises referred to have been occupied by troops but have no information as to the damage stated to have been caused during occupation. An immediate inspection in this case is being arranged.

ARMY ACCOUNTS (CORK COUNTY).

MICHEAL O HAONGHUSA asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that a large number of accounts still remain unpaid by Army Authorities in Cork City and County, such as billeting of troops accounts, motors, etc., commandeered and damaged accounts; that many of these accounts are still outstanding since last September and October; whether the Minister will have payments expedited in these cases, and whether, in the case of persons seriously financially embarrassed as a result of the delay in paying these accounts, the Minister will confer with the Minister for Finance and arrange that a certain reasonable sum on account be advanced in such cases, pending final investigation and disbursement.

Mr. LYNCH (replying for the Minister for Defence): A considerable clearance has taken place in the matter of paying outstanding accounts in the Cork area. The number that at present remain unpaid are comparatively small and consists principally of accounts whose certification is difficult owing to the particular circumstances in which they were incurred. A special responsible Officer has, within the last few days, been sent to Cork to report on the immediate steps required to clear up all outstanding accounts in the City and County.

I should be glad to receive from the Deputy a written statement of any information at his disposal that might help in the matter.

QUESTION ON ADJOURNMENT.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I desire to give notice that on the adjournment I will raise the question of the strike in the Ballyhaise Agricultural Station.

PRIVATE NOTICE QUESTION.

ACQUISITION OF GOREY HOSPITAL.

RISTEARD MAC FHEORAIS asked the Minister for Local Government if any arrangement has been entered into between his Department and that of the Minister for Defence, on the lines indicated in the latter's statement on Wednesday evening, namely, to transfer the patients at Gorey Hospital to the County Hospital.

Mr. BLYTHE: The answer is in the affirmative.

Mr. CORISH: That is to say that the Minister for Local Government has agreed to the transfer of patients? Has the Minister agreed with the Minister for Defence on the subject of transferring the patients?

Mr. BLYTHE: Yes, provided the doctor finds them fit at the moment to be transferred.

Mr. CORISH: Is the Minister aware that that is in conflict with the proposals of the scheme provided by the County Council? Is he aware it is doing away with the District Hospital in Gorey?

Mr. BLYTHE: It is not doing away with the District Hospital in Gorey. It is being taken possession of by the military for the time being.

Mr. CORISH: Am I to understand that the Minister will see that the Minister for Defence will provide alternative accommodation for the patients?

Mr. BLYTHE: I do not think so.

Mr. CORISH: That is very unsatisfactory. In view of what I consider to be the very unsatisfactory reply of the Minister, I desire to raise this matter again on the adjournment.

Mr. BLYTHE: Put it off until Monday or Tuesday.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Notice has already been given by Deputy O'Shannon to raise a matter on the adjournment, and we can only have one matter raised then.

THE DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

LAND BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We have disposed of Amendment 96 to the First Schedule. Amendment 97 appears to me to fall consequentially. Has Deputy Gorey anything to say on that?

Mr. GOREY: No, if it is consequential on the other.

Amendment: To delete all the words in Part 1, occurring after the word "namely," and to substitute in lieu thereof the words "60 per cent." Not moved.

First Schedule put and agreed to.

Question: "That Sections 23 and 24 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 25.

(1) The tenant of every holding of tenanted land vested in the Land Commission by virtue of this Act, and to which this section applies, shall be deemed on the appointed day to have entered into a subsequent purchase agreement for the purchase of the holding from the Land Commission at the standard price.

(2) There shall be payable by the tenant to the Land Commission an annual sum, equivalent to the standard purchase annuity for the holding, from the appointed day until the gale day next after the holding is vested in the tenant. The Land Commission shall have for the recovery of such annual sum the same remedies as they have for the recovery of unpaid instalments of purchase annuity.

(3) Every holding to which this section applies shall be vested in the tenant by the Land Commission by vesting order or otherwise.

(4) All payments made by the tenant after the appointed day on foot of the annual sum payable by him to the Land Commission under this section shall, from and after the vesting of the holding in him, be treated for all purposes as if they had been payments in respect of purchase annuity.

(5) This Section shall not apply to:—

(a) Any holding in respect of which the standard price exceeds three thousand pounds; or

(b) Any holding in the beneficial occupation of a tenant who is on the appointed day the proprietor of lands for the purchase of which advances have been made under any of the Land Purchase Acts, and whether redeemed or not, if the total amount resulting from the addition of such advances to the standard price exceeds £3,000; or

(c) Any holding as respects which the Land Commission declare that it is not in the public interest that the holding shall be resold to the tenant as aforesaid, whether on the ground that the improvement of the holding is essential and practicable, or otherwise; or

(d) Any holding which in the opinion of the Land Commission ought to be retained for improvement or enlargement, or for utilisation in connection with the relief of congestion, all which holdings are in this Act referred to as retained holdings.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move amendment 45 standing in the name of Eamon O Dugain. It is:

To insert a new Sub-section after Sub-section (2), as follows:—

"There shall be payable by the tenant to the Land Commission on the gale day on which the first instalment of the said annual sum shall become payable by him an additional sum, equivalent to a proportion of the said annual sum in respect of the period between the said gale day and the day on which the next dividends are payable on Land Bonds issued under this Act. The Land Commission shall have for the recovery of such additional sum the same remedies as they have for the recovery of unpaid instalments of purchase annuity."

The object is to enable the Land Commission to meet the amount that will be payable in respect of dividends for the short period that will elapse between the gale day and the day indicated.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:—

To add at the end of Sub-Section (3) the following:—

"Provided that the Land Commission is satisfied that the tenant is cultivating, and will continue to cultivate the land as an ordinary farm in accordance with the proper methods of husbandry, and if he fails so to satisfy the Land Commission within a period of five years from the appointed day he shall no longer be deemed to have entered into a purchase agreement for the purchase of that holding."

[Mr. Johnson.]

The object of the amendment is to ensure that a proper method of husbandry referred to in a later clause as a condition shall be applied to all the land that is sold to the tenants. This is to endeavour to secure that the land that is purchased will at least be farmed in such a way as to satisfy the Land Commission, and to militate somewhat against the pure grazing system. There is no need to enlarge at this stage on that question. We are all satisfied that the advantages to the country are greater by reasonable methods of husbandry than by mere grazing. One of the conditions under which the State should come to the assistance of the tenants should be that a reasonable proportion of the land should be brought into cultivation. This amendment will not affect, to any appreciable degree, the great majority of the farms that are affected by this Bill, inasmuch as they are small holdings which in the main are cultivated. It will affect a minority of the holdings which are merely grazed and are not farmed. That is to say, they are not held by agriculturists.

The object of the amendment is also to ensure, as far as the Land Commission can, that the land that is being transferred under the ægis of the State should be brought into cultivation.

Mr. HOGAN: This is an amendment to Section 25, that is to say, to the Section that deals simply and purely with tenants. There is an Amendment 62 to Section 28 in the same sense. Section 28 deals with advances for parcels of land, that is, advances to landless men for new holdings. I am prepared to accept something on the lines of Amendment 62—not in the terms of the amendment but something on these lines. When we reach that amendment I hope to read out the one which I will be prepared to accept. I would not be prepared to accept the amendment in connection with Section 25, which deals with tenanted land, for the very good reason that it would mean nothing. We are dealing with tenants; people who for one reason or another have vested interests in their holdings, grown up over a long period, and under all sorts of conditions, and around which a great lot of Irish history has been made. In that state of affairs it is idle to put in a provision which means that if the Land Commission official is not satisfied with the operations of the particular tenant he shall have power to take the holding from him. You could not do it. It could not be done. These are the facts as we find them at the moment. I do not believe, and I think the Deputy admitted it, that, except in the case of a very few holdings, it can make any difference. If you make economic holdings and give the small man sufficient land to make his holding economic without the assistance of any inspector, either of the Department of Agriculture or the Land Commission, he will work that holding economically. That has been the experience of the 1903 Act. Practically all the tenants who got economic holdings are farming their land as well, perhaps, as land is farmed either in Germany or France. Ownership made a tremendous difference. There is no real reason, therefore, for this in connection with tenanted land. It might, possibly, apply to two or three per cent. of cases, and it might, possibly, do some good in two or three per cent. of cases. But it has a great many drawbacks, and in 95 per cent. of cases it would be unnecessary and, if necessary, impossible to put into operation. Hence I could not accept it in connection with Section 25, but I am prepared to accept something on the lines of amendment 62 in connection with Section 28.

Mr. JOHNSON: Did the Minister not consider that even two or three per cent., at least, should be deprived of the advantages which the Bill gives? That is all that the amendment proposes to do. It simply says that the purchase agreement shall not be entered into, that the purchase of the landlord's interest shall not be entered into, if the obligations laid down have not been fulfilled.

I admit this is only going to apply to two or three per cent. of cases, but it is for the two or three per cent. that I would like the amendment to be carried, or something to take its place to secure the same end, even for the tenanted land. We have been reminded frequently that there are black sheep even among small holders, that there are small holders who are not doing their duty by their holdings, and even the moderate pressure that this would apply to those might be sufficient to induce proper cultivation. The effect of the amendment would be to leave them as they are, not to give them the advantage of this Bill. That, I think, is not a great penalty, but it might be sufficient to induce that two or three per cent. to do their duty by their holdings and by the State. I think something of the same kind which is proposed to be applied to other classes of holders might well be applied to the tenant holder who does not do his duty by his land.

Mr. HOGAN: I think the answer to that is—that any amendment of that sort would really put a duty upon the Land Commission to keep inspecting holdings even though they would not find it necessary. You would have there in black and white in an Act of Parliament a provision which would make it the duty of the Inspectors to keep inspecting the holdings of the 70,000 tenants, between the appointed day and the date of vesting, in order to make sure that they were farming properly. We all know that they could not do that. It is hardly sound to put into an Act of Parliament something which we know cannot be carried out effectively. Further, take the two or three per cent. of cases of people who are not farming their land efficiently. We are in a position to deal with them under the Bill. When the Land Commission is making up its mind as to whether it will sell £3,000 worth or more of land to any farmer, it will certainly take into account whether he is a good farmer or not. They ought to take that into account, and they will be able to penalise the man who is not likely to make a good farmer by refusing to sell and exercising their discretion. With regard to the small tenant, I have seen cases of small tenants who were bad farmers, and lazy, perhaps, allowing their holdings to get into disrepair, and who after two or three years of ownership have become really good farmers. The best thing you can do with a small holder of that kind—even the two or three per cent.—is to give him an economic holding and make him the owner. Even though he has been an idle farmer up to then, even though his conditions made him rather careless and, perhaps, hopeless, still if you give him an economic holding, after two or three years of ownership he will begin to bend his back to the work, and in five or ten years will turn out one of the best farmers. Under that provision we might take up the holdings. These are the very cases in which we might take up the holdings, and we would be simply defeating our own object. We have ample powers within the four corners of the Bill to penalise any farmer who is not doing his duty to the State. Such a section I am afraid would be a dead letter. You have to consider the expediences of the case as there are 400,000 tenants who have purchased without such a section. You put in a section which gives in a general way the idea that the Land Commission or the Department of Agriculture have some control after vesting, even when the tenant becomes the owner of the holding, which will cause further discontent amongst small tenants, who are rather shy of reading Acts of Parliament, and which will do more harm than good. I am afraid we are prisoners of history in the matter. We are dealing with 70,000 tenants and in respect to their proprietorship you cannot make distinctions between the 70,000 who have not purchased and the 400,000 who have purchased.

Mr. McBRIDE: Deputy Johnson's idea of farming is only theoretical, and I presume the knowledge that the Minister for Agriculture has on the subject is much the same. All farmers, large and small, are out to make money. If the economic conditions permit it the large farmer will till a certain amount of his land in order to carry his stock during the winter. If he does not do so one or two of his neighbours will till portion of their land, and those who do not till can buy feeding from them. Supervision or over-riding of the economic wishes of small holders, or even of large holders, is not at all agreeable, and would not have any results commensurate with the ideas of Deputy Johnson.

Mr. GOREY: This strikes me as a peculiar amendment. There are only 70,000 unpurchased tenants in the country while there are 400,000 who have purchased. This condition that it is sought to impose on the smaller number was never imposed on the larger number. It is compulsory interference, compulsory tillage or compulsory husbandry in the minds of theorists. I wonder would Deputy Johnson advance the principle of compulsory State interference about which we have heard a good deal in every business? Deputy Johnson and some other people seem to get it into their heads that it is only with land cultivation and farming that the State should interfere, or that it has room to interfere. I think this view is borne by people who know nothing about agriculture, and who do not live on the land. The men who know least about land are ready to talk the most about it. I know very little about business, and I do not want to interfere in anything I know nothing about. I leave business matters to commercial men. I do know a little about farming, and I say, and I know, that the State would be doing the worst thing it could do, to start compulsory interference in an industry run by men bred to it, and who have always, with a few exceptions, done the right thing. Deputy Johnson must assume that people engaged in agriculture are fools and that they do not know their business. This is really the thin end of the wedge towards compulsory tillage and compulsory supervision of the land. We had enough of that before. I oppose this amendment most heartily.

[Mr. Gorey.]

Mr. SEARS: A point made by Deputy Johnson was that if this amendment is carried, so far as the small men are concerned, it will only put them back in the position they were in before, and merely deprive them of the advantages of the Bill. They will not be able to enjoy the full advantages of the Bill as under it they will get a reduction of 30 per cent. on the rents. If the amendment is carried they will not get that reduction. As the Minister for Agriculture stated they will not get that chance of becoming industrious self-supporting tenant farmers.

Mr. JOHNSON: One is surprised to hear the arguments against this amendment. We have been led to believe for many years that the acquirement of the tenants' interest, and security of tenure had, as a matter of fact, ensured that the holdings would be well cultivated. Now we are told that that cannot be secured unless this transfer that is sought for in this Bill takes place—that there is really no security of tenure and no fair rent fixed—that, as a matter of fact, until the landlord's interest has been purchased out, the tenant is as he was before the 1881 Land Act. That contradicts all the claims that have been made in the past in furtherance of land purchase and fixity of tenure. The argument of Deputy Gorey, and more particularly the argument put forward by Deputy McBride, really go to the heart of this question. It comes to this, that under the Bill tenant purchasers may, if it pays them better, leave the land in grass. If it pays them better to let the land to the promoters of any new amusement then they may do so, that the interests of the State are not to be considered if those interests run across the monetary interests of the peasant proprietor. I join issue with that at once, and I would have understood up to this morning that Deputy McBride would not subscribe to such a doctrine. It is the argument of the grazier. It was the argument of the landlords who cleared their estates. They owned this property and might do what they liked with it. It is the argument, the policy, and the practice that led to the depopulation of Ireland. I dissent from that at once, and I say, as I have said before in this debate, that this land is held in trust, and the proprietor has not a right to let it go to wreck and ruin or to let it go into grazing at the expense of the people, if that policy means, or might mean, the depopulation of the country and the driving of still larger numbers away from the land. We contend—and it is sought to apply that contention to these holdings—that there should be some check upon even the possibility that the new proprietors will allow their land to go to waste.

It may be more profitable—it has been—to allow the land to be grazed than to allow it to be tilled. Therefore, the argument runs, the land must be grazed. If the demand for Irish cattle in England grows and grows, and if the demand for store cattle is growing, and the profits out of store cattle are to be increasingly greater as compared with the profits out of other produce, then, the argument runs, the landholders may and should have perfect freedom to allow that grazing system to be developed. I am surprised that Deputy McBride should put forward such a proposition, but I am still more surprised that Deputy Gorey should do so, in view of amendment Number 62. In that amendment he does, as a matter of fact, propose certain restrictions.

Mr. GOREY: Not of the same kind at all.

Mr. JOHNSON: Certain people shall prove their competence to work the land and if they do not prove it then the Land Commission shall have power to resume the land. I am surprised that Deputy Gorey should denounce the proposition that I have put forward on the grounds that he has done while at the same time he is proposing an amendment of a similar kind to another section. It is really not a very germane argument to say that because 400,000 tenants have become proprietors under Acts passed in the British Parliament without restrictions that we, when passing another measure to make 70,000 tenants into proprietors, must not put restrictions forward which we deem to be desirable. Because there were certain omissions, because past generations made mistakes in regard to 400,000 people, it is not a sound reason why we should make a similar mistake in regard to 70,000 people, and I do not think the alleged evil effects of the amendment are going to affect any but those who are incompetent. If it is true that proprietorship, and a sense of proprietorship, will make the change that the Minister believes, then all that is required in the amendment is that the Land Commission should be satisfied that a person is likely to prove a good husbandman, and as it will only affect two or three per cent., and perhaps even a smaller proportion, of the larger holders who are keeping their land out of cultivation because it pays them better, against the well-being of the State. That is the reason why I ask the Dáil to support the amendment.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: Apart altogether from any question of policy, it does not seem to me that this amendment could possibly be put into operation. How is the Land Commission to be satisfied that the tenant will continue to cultivate the land as an ordinary farm? What period is that satisfaction to cover? Is it to the end of time or is it only a particular tenant or the particular tenant claiming by descent or otherwise from him? I am trying to put myself into the position of some one on behalf of the Land Commission. I am trying to discover whether my mind is satisfied or not that a particular tenant who has been on the land sufficiently long for him to be a purchaser under this Act has an intention that is going on for some interminable period to continue to cultivate his land as an ordinary farmer. Why, the thing is quite impossible. If it is to be done merely by the tenant making a declaration to the Land Commission:—"I hereby declare that it is my intention to go on cultivating," why, this thing is meaningless. All he has to do is to make a declaration of his intention to cultivate. If, on the other hand, his statement of intention is not sufficient, how, in the name of heaven, the Land Commission is to be satisfied of that intention I cannot see. Moreover, this amendment does not say what is to become either of the tenant or the unfortunate holding.

Supposing the Land Commission is not satisfied? The tenant is no longer to be deemed as having entered into a purchase agreement, but he is the tenant of the holding. This section deals only with what we may call the sitting tenant. He is no longer liable for rent, because his landlord has gone. He is only liable to the Land Commission by reason of his being assumed to have entered into a purchase agreement. Therefore, it seems to me that this amendment, if enacted in the form it is at present, creates the simple position that the tenant who is in possession and did not satisfy the Commission should, therefore, remain free of rent or purchase annuity. There is no condition that the Land Commission, or any one else, is to resume possession of the holding, as there is in Deputy Gorey's amendment later on. At all events, part of the objection I have to the present amendment applies to Deputy Gorey's as well. The main thing is that if the tenant fails to satisfy the Land Commission at a certain date, he shall no longer be deemed to have entered into a purchase agreement. He is back to where he was before, with the exception that he is no longer under liability for any rent to the landlord or purchase annuities to the Land Commission or anyone else.

Mr. ROONEY: In this Dáil we hear a lot about the duty of the farmer to the State, but we would also like to hear the duty of the State to the farmer. Deputy Johnson seems to think that it would be a far better and wiser policy for the farmer to engage on a line of production which does not pay. Nobody says that it does. The Agricultural Commission is sitting, and no one has come forward to say that agriculture pays. What I want to know is—is the farmer to run his business at a loss for the benefit of the State? That is what Deputy Johnson's argument comes to, to my mind.

[Mr. Rooney.]

Mr. MacBRIDE: Deputy Johnson is under a misapprehension as far as I am concerned. At a matter of fact nine-tenths of the land in Connaught, with which we are immediately concerned, cannot be continuously grazed; it must be tilled in order to carry the store cattle which Deputy Johnson considers are sold at enormous profit in England. But while I say that, there are other portions of land that cannot profitably be tilled. What would Deputy Johnson say about growing a field of potatoes where every stalk would be five or six feet high, with no potatoes underneath? That is not economy by any means, and that is what we want to guard against. Every farmer in Connaught, or any other place, must be as free as any shopkeeper in Dublin. He must support himself and his family, and in order to do that he must economically work his farm. He must till one field and graze another, or he must graze one farm and till another, and so on.

Mr. JOHNSON: If the Deputy will read the amendment he will see that is provided for. I would draw the Deputy's attention to the provisions of Section 29. When we come to it I will listen with interest to his objections, but I do not know whether he intends to object to the provisions requiring that proper methods of husbandry shall be applied. If it is wrong in this case it is wrong in that case. If there are no proper methods of husbandry applicable to the case of the tenant purchaser, then there are no proper methods of husbandry applicable to the owner and the persons affected by Section 29. If Deputy Rooney is interested I tell him quite frankly that I will apply the same principle to every holder of every factory, mill, or other productive institution in the country.

Mr. GOREY: And every shop.

Mr. JOHNSON: Every shop.

Mr. GOREY: And every salary.

Mr. JOHNSON: Every factory and productive institution in the country. They are held in trust for the common good, and if they are held out of use, or not made reasonable use of, then they have a right to be interfered with and brought into proper use. If that is not sound morality as well as sound economics then I am open to be convinced to the contrary, and to have explained to me what is sound morality, and what is sound economics. One would have thought that we would not have had expounded the doctrine that every man has a right to do what he likes with his own. That is the doctrine that Deputy MacBride, Deputy Rooney, and Deputy Gorey want to impress us with. I deny it, and particularly if there is any satisfaction in that, in its application to that which is the very basis of life, the land. The whole theory of land holding in this country is that it is held by the occupier for the common good, and if its use by that occupier is against the common good then he has no right to further trusteeship over the land.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. O'Higgins): This discussion brings us back to the Constitution, and reminds me very much of the debates which took place when that Bill was going through this Dáil. I doubt if we ought to waste time, at this stage, and on this Bill, in discussing abstract principles. In one sense Deputy Johnson stated nothing that will not be found on the first stage of "Williams on Real Property." Land is held from the State, and in the past the State, not this State, but the British Government in its time here, has acted on that. In the course of the European War, when there was a food shortage, they insisted that owners of land should use it in the interests of the State, or putting it at the lowest, that at any rate they should not use it in the worst interests of the State, and cases occurred in which people were put out of possession of the land on the ground that they were not using it in the best interests of the State, or that they were using it contrary to those interests.

There were, of course, those who held it was an absurdity to indulge in urging petty prosecutions for food hoarding and to connive at the hoarding of the raw material of food production. Now, from time to time, in the face of great public needs, other States have shown, and no doubt, this State has shown, that there is no absolute property in land. One speaks of a "holding" rather than of absolute property. There is not, for instance, that absolute property in land that a man may claim in his watch, which he can wind or leave unwound if it suits him. Land has been taken, from time to time, compulsorily for railways. We, ourselves, have admitted that principle from time to time, not merely with regard to land but also to premises. We have admitted it lately in passing a Bill for the compulsory acquisition of premises for the Civic Guard. That principle is not seriously questioned. I doubt if this amendment is calculated to improve this Bill. Everyone knows it suffers, as Deputy FitzGibbon pointed out, from much vagueness. What is an ordinary farm? Who is to decide whether a tenant is going to continue to cultivate it as an ordinary farmer? What is the proper method of husbandry?

Mr. JOHNSON: If you refer to Section 29 of the Bill you will find these matters stated there.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It seems to me there will be various opinions as to the proper methods of husbandry, and the proper methods of husbandry will vary a good deal with the quality of the land and the nature of the soil, so that you are going to put a rather big task on whoever is to interpret this amendment if it becomes part and parcel of the Bill. I think that Deputy Johnson, although it was pointed out to him that this was a matter of two or three per cent., is rather out, through this amendment, to get recognition of a principle which is not challenged.

Mr. JOHNSON: All that is required is that the principle that is advocated by the Minister in regard to one set of holdings shall be applied to the other set.

Mr. HOGAN: All I need say is that I do not think there is any doubt whatever that it is the duty of the State to make arrangements to provide that the National resources, and in particular the land of the country, shall be used to the best advantage. The question is, how? I maintain, as far as the particular case we have under discussion goes, that the best way to do that is to divide the land among the tenants of the country by making them the owners of their holdings, by making their holdings economic and putting them in a position to get the best themselves out of the land.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 10; Níl, 37.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógha.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Seamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daibhín.

Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Risteárd Mac Fheorais.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Donchadh Ó Guaire
Seán Ó Maolruaidh
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Pádraig Mac Ualghaigh.
Seosamh Mac Suibhne.
Peadar Mac a' Bhaird.
Darghal Fíges.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Eamán Altún.
Sir Séumas Craig, Ridre, M.D.
Gearóid Mac Giobáin, K.C.
Liam Thrift.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máillo.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.

Séumas Ó Cruithlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Caoimhghlin Ó Uigín.
Proinsias Bullin.
Aindriú Ó Lámháin.
Liam Ó hAodha.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaire.
Alasdair Mac Caba.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Eamán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Domhnall Ó Broin.
Seamus de Burea.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. GOREY: I move Amendment 47:—To delete from the word “of,” line 5, page 10, Sub-section (5) (b), to the word “or,” line 7, inclusive, and to substitute therefor the words: “To the standard price of the amount obtained by capitalising at the rate of four and three-quarters per cent. the original annuities payable on such advances, exceeds £3,000, or.”

This amendment does not require much commendation. It is merely to put the average tenant on the same level. Under the other Acts the part-purchaser would not be on the same level as the part-purchaser under this Act. The capital sum required at 2½ per cent. under the Wyndham Act and the capital sum required at 4½ per cent. under this Bill would be different sums altogether. This amendment proposes to add annuity to annuity instead of advance to advance, as required by the Section as it stands. This would secure uniformity in assessing the real value of each of the holdings, whose price is to be added together for the purposes of this Section. Under the method proposed by the Section five holdings each paying an annuity of £100, payable under the Land Acts of 1885, 1891, 1903, 1909 and 1923, would all work out at widely different capital sums. The amendment proposes to substitute the annuity for the advance as a real test of the value of the holding. No matter what Acts the annuities are payable under they will be added together and capitalised for the purposes of this Section at the 4½ per cent. annuity rate of the present Bill. I am sure that the reasons I have advanced in favour of this amendment will appeal to every member of the Dáil. I am not seeking to put one man in an advantageous position as compared with another. I am seeking to put them on the same level, and I would ask the Minister to accept the amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: I am accepting this amendment. It is perfectly just and meets the particular cases equitably. It is quite possible that the tenant who had purchased one part of his holding under the 1903 Act would not be able to purchase the balance under a different title now, whereas if he had not purchased under the 1903 Act he would be able to purchase both portions now.

That is the result of the operation of the Bill, and the result of the price sections of the Bill, about which we heard so much last night. It is a correct principle, I think, to capitalise, as is suggested here, the original annuity at 4½ per cent. instead of at 3½ per cent. or 3½ per cent., as the case might be, when arriving at the advance.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. HOGAN: That will lead to a slight consequential amendment in Section 30, which we will deal with later.

Amendment 48: In Sub-section (5), Clause (d), line 16, page 10, to add after the word “congestion,” the words: “or for the development of agriculture, or otherwise in the public interest.”
—Tomás O Conaill, Tomás de Nógla.

Mr. O'CONNELL: This amendment is consequential on an amendment which has been already lost.

Amendment not moved.

Motion made and question put: “That Section 25, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

Agreed.

SECTION 26.

In the case of every holding retained by the Land Commission

- (1) The Land Commission shall have, and may exercise all or any of the powers exercisable by them as respects holdings on Estates vested in them, including powers of resumption of the whole or part of the holding, whether the holding is or is not part of an Estate or subject to a judicial rent; and in exercising the powers aforesaid shall have regard to the necessity of relieving congestion, the desirability of increasing the food supply of the country, and the manner in which the holdings have been used.
- (2) When the Land Commission resume part of a holding they may apportion the rent which was payable in respect of the holding at the date of the passing of this Act between the part resumed and the remainder of the holding as the justice of the case may require.
- (3) On any application by the Land Commission for or in connection with the resumption of a holding, the powers of the Court under Section five of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, shall be exercised exclusively by the Judicial Commissioner whose decision shall be final.

In fixing the compensation payable to the tenant under the said Section the Judicial Commissioner may have regard to payments made by the tenant to the Land Commission under this Act.

- (4) There shall be payable to the Land Commission by the tenant of every retained holding an annual sum equivalent to the standard purchase annuity for the holding until the appointed day:—

- (a) if the entire holding is re-sold to the tenant until the gale day next after the vesting of the holding,
- (b) if the holding is resumed by the Land Commission, until the date of such resumption,
- (c) if part of the holding is re-sold to the tenant or is resumed by the Land Commission, until such date as the Land Commission shall appoint but subject to such apportionment or variation before that date as the Land Commission shall direct.

The Land Commission shall have for the recovery of such annual sum the same remedies as they have for the recovery of unpaid instalments of purchase annuity.

- (5) If the entire holding is re-sold to the tenant, all payments made by the tenant after the appointed day on foot of the annual sum payable by him to the Land Commission under this section shall from and after the vesting of the holding in him be treated for all purposes as if they had been payments in respect of purchase annuity.

In every other case such proportion of the payments aforesaid as the Land Commission shall direct shall from and after the vesting of any part of the holding in a purchaser be treated for all purposes as if they had been payments in respect of purchase annuity charged on that part of the holding.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move Amendment 49:—

To add, at the end of Sub-section (3), line 44, the following:—

“The compensation payable to the tenant shall be paid in $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds, equal in nominal amount thereto, and all claims attaching to the compensation shall be paid and discharged as if they were claims attaching to Purchase Money paid by means of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds under this Act.”

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move Amendment 50:—

To insert a new Sub-section after Sub-section (4):—

“There shall be payable by the tenant to the Land Commission on the gale day on which the first instalment of the said annual sum shall become payable by him an additional sum, equivalent to a proportion of the said annual sum, in respect of the period between the said gale day and the day on which the next dividends are payable on Land Bonds issued under this Act. The Land Commission shall have for the recovery of such additional sum the same remedies as they have for the recovery of unpaid instalments of purchase annuity.”

Amendment put and agreed to.

Motion made and question put:—

“That Section 26, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

Agreed.

SECTION 27.

Motion made and question put:—

“That Section 27 stand part of the Bill.”

Agreed.

SECTION 28.

(1) Advances may be made to the following persons for the purchase by them from the Land Commission of parcels of land:—

(a) A person being the tenant or proprietor of a holding which in the opinion of the Land Commission is not an economic holding.

(b) A person who has entered into an agreement with the Land Commission for the exchange of his holding.

(c) A person who within 25 years before the passing of the Irish Land Act, 1903, was the tenant of a holding to which the Land Purchase Acts apply, and who was evicted from that holding in consequence of proceedings in ejectment for non-payment of rent taken by or on behalf of his landlord, or in case such person is dead, a person nominated by the Land Commission as his personal representative.

(d) A person being a labourer who by reason of the sale of any lands under the provisions of the Land Purchase Acts has been deprived of his employment on the said lands.

(e) Any other person to whom in the opinion of the Land Commission an advance ought to be made.

(2) The Land Commission in deciding as to the suitability of applicants under this section shall be satisfied as to their competence to work the land, and their intention to do so, and not to sell, let or assign it.

(3) The Land Purchase Acts shall, subject to the provisions of this section, apply to the sale of a parcel of land in pursuance of this section in like manner as if the same was a holding and the purchaser was the tenant thereof at the time of his making the purchase, and the expression "holding" in those Acts shall include a parcel of land in respect of the purchase of which an advance has been made in pursuance of this section.

(4) Section 17 of the Irish Land Act, 1909, shall cease to have effect save as regards the sale of any parcels of land in respect of which purchase agreements have been entered into before the passing of this Act, and, save as aforesaid, any reference in any enactment to that section shall be construed as a reference to this section.

Mr. J. BURKE: I beg to move:—

In Section 28 to insert after the word "persons," Sub-section (1), line 18, the words "or bodies." This is merely a technical amendment, dependent on a later amendment I am moving which inserts a new paragraph after Sub-section (1) (d) and proposes that advances be made to trustees for the purposes mentioned in Section 4 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, as extended by this Act, for the purchase by them from the Land Commission of parcels of land. I do not think there is anything controversial in this amendment. Section 4 of the Land Act of 1903 which governs the amendment reads:—

"In the case of the sale of an estate, advances under the Land Purchase Acts may be made for the purchase by any trustees approved of by the Land Commission of any parcel of the estate held subject to the provisions of this Act, for the purposes of turbary, pasturage, the raising of sand or gravel, the cutting or gathering of sea weed, the planting of trees or the preservation of game, fish, woods or plantations."

It is amended by this present Bill to include the tillage. There is nothing controversial in that and it is merely a technical amendment to include all the trustees in the provisions of this Bill. Some of them might be excluded if we were to leave the word "persons" in alone. I am proposing to include the word "body" as well as "persons"

Mr. HOGAN: This is a necessary amendment and I accept it. In the operations of the Land Commission it may be found expedient to make advances to bodies as well as to persons, and we are including the word "bodies" for that reason.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. HENNESSY: In the absence of Deputy de Roiste I wish to move: In Sub-section (1) to insert before paragraph (a), line 21, a new paragraph, as follows:—

"(a) A person whose holding has been acquired by the Land Commission for the reinstatement of the former tenant thereof or his representative."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I wish to ask the Deputy if he happens to know whether the person mentioned in the proposed amendment will occur anywhere else in the Bill.

Mr. HOGAN: Yes there is an amendment further down.

Mr. HENNESSY: This is on the same principle as the amendment which was moved under Section 21 on the previous evening. The Deputy considered that the Land Commission should be invested with certain powers to investigate all cases of evicted tenants, and many of those claims date further back than 1878. If the Land Commission is to deal with those claims it would be necessary that they should also in this Section be empowered to get advances under Section (28). Section 53 runs in the same direction.

Mr. HOGAN: "A person whose holding has been acquired by the Land Commission for the reinstatement of the former tenant thereof or his representative." That is the amendment, and the next amendment is to delete lines 26 and 27 in Sub-section (1) (c) and to insert in lieu thereof "a person who was heretofore the tenant of a holding." That has not yet been moved. We may as well deal with the two together. The Deputies will note that there is an Amendment No. 60 in the name of Padraic O'Maille. "In selecting persons under this paragraph the Land Commission may have regard to the cases of persons who, or whose predecessors in title, have been evicted from their holdings in consequence of proceedings taken by or on behalf of the landlord, and who are not included in paragraph (c) above." There is also an amendment to the same Section in the names of Deputies Johnson, O'Maille and others, No. 57: "In Sub-section (1) (c), line 30, to delete the words 'in ejectment for non-payment of rent.'" I am accepting Amendment No. 57 and also Amendment No. 60. In the Section as amended the word "bodies" will be added after "persons" and it will go on in accordance with Amendment No. 60.

"In selecting persons under this paragraph the Land Commission may have regard to the cases of persons who, or whose predecessors in title, have been evicted from their holdings in consequence of proceedings taken by or on behalf of the landlord, and who were not included in paragraph (c) above." The effect of all that is to make it mandatory on the Land Commission to deal with evicted tenants since 1878. If the Land Commission succeed in completing that work, they will surprise me. There is no use in making promises that we cannot carry out. We will do our very best, and if we do that we will be doing more than most people think it possible the Land Commission will be able to do. We cannot right all the wrongs that have been done. That is absolutely impossible, but we will do our best. In the event of any obviously good case which, for technical reasons, would not come within the 1878 ruling, it is provided in the amendment I have read that the Land Commission may have regard to cases of persons who, or whose predecessors in title, have been evicted from their holdings in consequence of proceedings taken by or on behalf of the landlord. That means that the Land Commission must deal with tenants evicted since 1878, and may take into account, as special qualifying circumstances, the fact that a tenant was evicted before 1878. That is all we can do. Everyone who understands the evicted tenants' question, will realise that if we succeed in doing anything like what we promised we will do, we will be doing a lot. There are some amendments here that it would be really a misuse of language to describe as absurd. I cannot think of any other word. Take, for instance, Amendment 53, which suggests deleting lines 26 and 27 in Sub-section (1), and inserting words which would make the Sub-section read: "A person who was heretofore the tenant of a holding to which the Land Purchase Acts apply." I believe there is an amendment later on to the effect that in the event of this person or his representative preferring to take money to land, he should get it. In the event of his preferring to take money, we may have to go back to the time of Niall of the Nine Hostages, or the time of Brian Boru. Nice legal questions will arise as to whether some of the ancient Irish chieftains, who advanced on their neighbours with clubs or spears, were really taking proceedings for ejectment against occupants of holdings, and whether those persons would be effected by the amendment. There are about one million representatives of Irishmen in Chicago, Poland and France, and for that matter all over the world. We are to send them out say, £1,000 each, the price of a good economic holding. That is the meaning of amendments which responsible Deputies have put in connection with this evicted tenants question. Fancy Deputies putting in amendments like those. Men capable of putting in amendments like those are utterly irresponsible. Even if the amendments were inserted in the Bill, they would mean nothing. They are not meant seriously to be put into practice, and 75 per cent. of the talk we hear about evicted tenants is purely opposition. It is, if I may say so, insincere.

[Mr. Hogan.]

We are doing all we can for evicted tenants, first of all by specifying the limit of 25 years prior to the 1903 Act, and then giving the Land Commission a discretion, in the event of any case, for technical reasons, falling outside those limits, to deal with the persons concerned and regard the eviction of themselves or their ancestors as a special qualification.

Mr. HENNESSY: I think the Minister has overlooked the fact that sentiment has been carrying us a long way in this country for some time past, and I suppose it will continue so for some time to come. Naturally, we would all like to get back the homes of our fathers, grandfathers, or great grandfathers. It would be much better than giving them to people from outside.

Mr. WILSON: I would like to know from the Minister, seeing he has doubts as to having a sufficiency of land to deal with congestion and evicted tenants, to whom would he give the preference? Will he settle congestion first and then deal with evicted tenants, or will he give an equal share to both parties, and divide any available land as well as he can?

Mr. HOGAN: I will not have the giving of the land; but I expect the Land Commission will, of course, deal with congestion first. At the same time I have no doubt that after having dealt with congestion, there will be a considerable amount of land available for deserving evicted tenants or their representatives. The fact is that under this Bill we have power to take holdings from tenants, and if some of these people were not evicted, but were in possession of their holdings at the moment, we might be taking those holdings from them for the purpose of relieving congestion.

Mr. HENNESSY: Deserving evicted tenants, in my opinion, have a prior claim.

Mr. McGUINNESS: With a view to meeting the difficulty of a shortage of land, I suggest that large ranchers and landholders should have their acreage reduced, and a man holding 150 acres should not be allowed the possession of any more, if there were congestions in the vicinity of evicted tenants who required land.

Mr. HOGAN: Section 27 provides the limitation of advances. We passed that Section in Committee, and I thought Deputies would know about it.

Amendment put and declared lost.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I hope I understand the next three amendments clearly. Amendment 53, I take it, means that the Land Commission can go back any distance, even to the time, as the Minister for Agriculture suggested, of Niall of the Nine Hostages.

Mr. HENNESSY: If the Land Commission deem it necessary.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 54 means that we go back 70 years from the Act of 1903—back to 1833. Amendment 55 proposes to go back to 1860. The proposal in the Bill is to go back to 1878. The Amendments are in proper order.

Mr. HENNESSY: I move Amendment No. 53:—

“To delete lines 26 and 27 in subsection (1) (c) and to insert in lieu thereof ‘a person who was heretofore the tenant of a holding.’”

I do not say that every case of an evicted tenant, or that every imaginary claim or alleged claim should be investigated by the Land Commission or by any other authority. I do not put forward a claim like that, which would be a silly claim. If I were to put forward a claim like that, very possibly I would be looking for a farm myself, and I hardly think there is any Deputy in the Dáil who, in that event, would not be looking for a farm somewhere or other. I do say that the Land Commission should have power to investigate claims put forward. We know that there are hundreds of unsound claims put forward, and no Land Commission could deal with all these, but there are claims that should not be confined to the twenty-five years limit. Other Deputies as well as myself have received letters during the past month from people all over the country, some of whom I know to be really deserving, and I think they should be investigated.

I think the Minister's reply to the previous amendment is most satisfactory, and I think Deputy O'Maille's amendment will satisfy us.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then this amendment 53 is withdrawn?

Mr. HENNESSY: I think I will withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment by Uáitéar MacCumhaill: In Sub-section (1) (c), line 26, to delete the figures and the word "25 years," and to substitute therefor the figures and word "70 years," not moved.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:—

"In Sub-Section (1) (c), lines 26 and 27, to delete the words "within 25 years before the passing of the Irish Land Act, 1903," and to substitute therefor the words: "since the passing of the Irish Land Act, 1860, (23 and 24 Vic., cap. 154)."

The object of this amendment was to bring the period back to the date when the modern movement, at least for eviction, began under the Deasy Act. That seemed to be the beginning of what might be called the preliminaries to the Land League, and it seems to be a natural starting point. I admit that the amendment which the Minister has proffered to accept goes a long way to meet the case. Nevertheless, I think that the proposal should begin after the passing of the Land Act of 1860, which does really date the period which led to the passing of the 1881 Act. If the Minister resists this, I am not going to press it in view of the agreement to accept amendment No. 60 and 57. He accepted those two, and they meet the case to a very great extent.

Mr. HOGAN: I am quite certain that we are indicating as much as we can possibly do in sub-section (c) as amended, taken together with sub-section (e) as amended. We are putting into this Act as much as could possibly be done. We could accept that, but we could not do it. That will enable us to deal with all genuine cases for the twenty-five years before 1903. That will enable us to try to pick out the deserving cases and to deal with them. It will enable us to deal with the border line cases.

Amendment withdrawn.

Amendment:—"To delete all from the word 'was,' Sub-section (1) (c), line 28, to the word landlord," line 31, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "is not now the occupier or owner of that holding."—Liam de Róiste. Not moved.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move: "In Sub-Section (1) (c), line 30, to delete the words "in ejectment for non-payment of rent."

Mr. HOGAN: I am accepting this amendment.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. J. BURKE: I move: After Sub-Section (1) (d), to insert a new paragraph as follows: "trustees for the purposes mentioned in Section 4 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, as extended by this Act."

Mr. HOGAN: I accept that.

Amendment put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The next amendment is consequential on that. It reads "in Sub-section 1 (e) to insert in line 38, after the word "person," the words "or body."

Amendment put and agreed to.

Amendment by Pádraic O Máille:—"Immediately after sub-section (1) (e) to insert a new paragraph as follows:—"In selecting persons under this paragraph the Land Commission may have regard to the cases of persons who, or whose predecessors in title, have been evicted from their holdings in consequence of proceedings taken by or on behalf of the landlord, and who are not included in paragraph (c) above."

PADRAIC O MÁILLE: Is maith liom-so an leas-rún so do tharaisgint, agus sílim gur leas-rún é go mba cheart do'n Dáil glacadh leis. Déanfaidh fé deagh-shocrú ar chúis a lán daoine gur serios na tighearnaí taluham amach as an dtalamh a bhí acu féin, nó ag a n-athur-aca. Tá mórán acu san a bhí i gcuairt cás mar gheall ar an ndibirt a cuireadh orra. Is féidir le Comisiún na Taluham iad a thabhairt ar ais arís.

I beg to propose this amendment. I think it is a very essential amendment, because there is a number of cases of great hardship of people who suffered very much in the past through these evictions, and their immediate ancestors before them suffered. Deputy Ward on yesterday spoke about the wholesale clearances on the Glenbeigh Estate in Tírconail, and it would be possible in this Sub-section to bring most of those tenants who have bona fide cases under this Land Bill. There are other tenants about the country, too, that it will bring in. These and their [Padraic O Maille.] immediate ancestors suffered harsh and unfair treatment at the hands of the landlord and it would be quite possible under this Section also to deal with their cases. I am glad that the Minister has agreed to accept this amendment.

Mr. WARD: With regard to this amendment, it covers the cases of people to whom I referred here the other day. The Land Commission is given power in those cases, and that is all that we require, that the power shall be there and that once the land passes into the hands of the Land Commission all these cases shall be adjudicated upon. There is a just claim.

Mr. HOGAN: After the Bill passes all the lands of Tírconnaill will be in the hands of the Land Commission and, as the Deputy says, under these sections we will have power to do what is asked for in this amendment.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I think you ought to strike out the words "in title" after the word "predecessors." That deals with a person who is on the land. The people you are dealing with are people here who have no title. They only come in because their predecessors were evicted. I think you should say "sons who, or whose predecessors been evicted."

PADRAIC O MAILLE: I will that alteration.

Mr. HOGAN: I accept the amendment with the alteration.

Amendment, as altered, put and agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNELL: On behalf of Deputy Day and Deputy Davin I beg to move to delete Sub-section (2) and to substitute therefor the following:—

"A parcel to be purchased under the provisions of this Section shall not be vested in the person to whom the advance is made for a period of five years from the date of the advance, and if, within that period, such person fails to satisfy the Land Commission that he is using and cultivating the land in accordance with proper methods of husbandry, or if he applies for permission to sell, let, or assign the land, the parcel shall not be vested, but shall be resumed by the Land Commission, and an advance may be made for the purchase of the parcel to some other person upon the like conditions."

I think that amendment is self-explanatory.

Mr. HOGAN: Amendments 61 and 62 are practically similar; their intention is the same. I am prepared to accept something like this; to add to Sub-section 2 "The agreement between the applicant and the Land Commission for the purchase of a parcel of land shall in all cases provide that the parcel shall not be vested in the applicant unless the Land Commission are satisfied that it is being worked by him in a husband-like manner, and that if the Land Commission are not so satisfied they may demand and recover possession of the parcel freed and discharged from any claim by the applicant." The Section would read something like this then:— "The Land Commission in deciding as to the suitability of applicants under this Section shall be satisfied as to their competence to work the land, and their intention to do so, and not to sell, let or assign it." Then I would add: "The agreement between the applicant and the Land Commission for the purchase of a parcel of land shall in all cases provide that the parcel shall not be vested in the applicant unless the Land Commission are satisfied that it is being worked by him in a husband-like manner and that if the Land Commission are not so satisfied they may demand and recover possession of the parcel freed and discharged from any claim by the applicant." That would give the Land Commission a certain amount of control over holding up the date of vesting, and between the date of the agreement and the date of vesting they would be enabled to satisfy themselves that the purchaser whom they had put on this parcel was likely to make a good farmer in the future. After the date of vesting they would have no control—none whatever. But from the date on which the agreement was entered into for the parcel up to the date of vesting they would have control. They would reserve control, and if before the date of vesting they came to the conclusion, from the conduct of the person who was getting the advance up to that date, that he was not a likely sort of farmer, they could eject him from the holding and resume possession. That is as far as we can go, and I think that would meet the case. Deputies will have to remember that, of course, the Land Commission have power to prevent a man from sub-letting or sub-dividing his holding after vesting, so that they have power to see that the holding will be retained as an economic holding in the possession of the tenant.

Mr. GOREY: I presume the two amendments are being taken together. The only objection I see to the proposed amendment of the Minister is that there is no date mentioned. The vesting of the land may take place at any time after the man gets possession, and it may take place very quickly. There is no time of probation mentioned. The reason we put down our amendment is that men are likely to be put into holdings who have no agricultural training. My experience of land being divided is that in a good many cases the land was not farmed in anything like a proper manner. It was either continuously meadowed or let on the eleven months' system, and in many cases the men who got it were not suitable for working land, and they only held the land as a gamble until such time as the five years, or whatever limit it was, expired, and then sold it for whatever they could get for it. Some of these men had no intention of making a living out of the land, and it was simply wasted on them. It is to prevent such cases as that that our amendment is put down. It is very different from the previous amendment which Deputy Johnson took exception to. This amendment is meant to deal with men who have no experience of agriculture and never intended to make a living out of it. There should be a period of some years laid down to see if these men can make good. If, after a few years, a man has made good, and can satisfy the Land Commission that he intends to live out of the holding, then he should get his Vesting Order, but not until then. If the Land Commission are of opinion that he is not farming, and that he does not intend to make a living out of the land and is only treating it as a gamble, I think he ought to be dispossessed and the land handed over to somebody else, because we have any amount of men in the country who would make good if they got a chance. As a matter of fact, we have more men of that kind in the country than we can find land for. There is no use wasting land on people who, to put it mildly, are not suitable for the occupation of land. I would be better pleased if there were a definite period of probation, say three or five years, inserted in the Minister's amendment, so that a man could show whether he was going to make good or not.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the statement of Deputy Gorey would show that there are stages between the Minister and ourselves in moving this amendment. The Minister is prepared to insert a provision which will mean that the Land Commission must be satisfied as to the competence of the person in whom the land is to be vested before vesting. He does not say what the length of that period of probation shall be.

Mr. HOGAN: Not only satisfied of his competence, but that the holding is being worked in a husband-like manner up to the date of vesting.

Mr. JOHNSON: Deputy Gorey desires to fix a date, but that after that date the purchaser may relapse into ignorance and laziness and carelessness, and that there shall be no interference. We would prefer that that power to intervene might be retained so as to ensure that the good farming shall not be restricted to a short period, but that it shall be a continuous process—that there will be some assurance that the good habits of the farmer as a farmer may be continued in the son when he takes possession. I agree that the amendment suggested by the Minister does go some length to meet the arguments, but I do not think it goes far enough, and I would like a period to be stated, even if the Minister could not go as far as to accept the whole of the amendment put down by Deputies Day and Davin.

Mr. WILSON: I would like to know the condition of mind of a farmer's son who would be under a state of perpetual observation by the Land Commission in order to see whether he was tilling his land properly. I think the Minister's amendment meets the case. Although I would like to see some period inserted, still this provision would ensure that a farm is being farmed before it is vested. I would be opposed totally to any such thing as placing a man, after he gets a holding, under the perpetual observation of the Land Commission.

Mr. HOGAN: This is the amendment which I favour. I must admit that there is not such a vast difference in principle between the policy which Deputy Johnson has outlined, and which the farmers disagree with, and this policy here which they are prepared to accept. There are some slight differences, but actually the principle is the same. There is very little difference in principle. There may be some arguments for confining this inspection up to the date of vesting, but the arguments that do apply to inspection up to the date of vesting apply, perhaps, with less force, but still they apply to some extent to inspection after the date of vesting. I am not in favour of inspection after the vesting, as I think the right way to get the best out of the land is to put the tenant purchaser on it under conditions which will enable him to put his best into it. I must observe that it is rather interesting that the differences of opinion over which there have been so much heat are really small. There is very little between the Farmers' Party and the Labour Party, if they thought this out. The reason I did not insert five years is this: There will be 75 per cent. of purchasers who will farm the land excellently for two or three years, obviously first-class men, and we should not hold up their vesting orders. I never thought I would hear arguments in the Dáil to delay vesting. I was prepared to hear arguments to the contrary, and to have it impressed on me that it was necessary to vest the holdings as soon as possible, and that one of the disadvantages of the previous Acts was that vesting was so long delayed. I certainly thought I would never hear an argument here in favour of delaying vesting. It is extraordinary how points of view change when applied to different problems. It would be unfair to hold up vesting in a very large percentage of cases where it is obvious that the purchasers of the land are good farmers or are going to be good farmers. It would be open to the Land Commission to hold up vesting if a man was not going on well, and perhaps hold it up longer than five years. That would meet the case Deputy Johnson puts up. It is not right to hold up vesting in the case where the purchaser is working his land properly and is likely to continue to do so.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. GOREY: We do not mean to hold up vesting, but we want the Government to retain machinery that gives them power for supervision for three or five years—not more than that. We think a man will show his worth in that time, and will have made good, or bad. We did not at any time purpose, as Deputy Johnson suggested, that the purchaser should be treated as a cart-horse and taken out and made do what others wanted him to do. That is what continuous supervision and compulsory powers really mean—that the man would be driven around between leading strings. I did not mean that vesting orders should be held up. The Minister has an amendment that meets our view, if three or five years were inserted.

Mr. JOHNSON: I assume the amendment represents the view of the Deputy who moved it when he says quite definitely that the leading strings shall apply for a period of five years, during which the holding shall not be vested. Is that definite or not?

Mr. GOREY: Definite so far as the amendment goes.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is to say, it was the meaning the Deputy intended when he wrote down the amendment. It is quite right that he should be allowed to change his mind in the course of a discussion. I think the Minister has met the case fairly well. I would like to ask him whether it would not be more in conformity with custom to use the same phraseology in the amendment he now proposes as is in Section 29, instead of "husband-like manner," which rather suggests the back streets of Dublin.

Mr. HOGAN: What do you suggest?

Mr. JOHNSON: The words in Section 29.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The words are "proper methods of husbandry."

Mr. HOGAN: I am quite prepared to insert these words. I hope I will be pardoned for observing that if this Land Bill is before the Dáil much longer the Labour Party and the Farmers' Party will come very close together. Deputy Gorey has now suggested a certain amount of supervision even after vesting. He is approaching Deputy Johnson rapidly.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is hope for him yet.

Mr. GOREY: I mean from the time possession is given.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This is the amendment the Minister proposes in place of Amendments 61 and 62:—
 “To add to Section 28, Sub-section (2): ‘The agreement between the applicant and the Land Commission for the purchase of a parcel of land shall in all cases provide that the parcel shall not be vested in the applicant unless the Land Commission are satisfied that it is being worked by him in accordance with proper methods of husbandry, and that if the Land Commission are not so satisfied they may demand and recover possession of the parcel freed and discharged from any claim by the applicant.’” In order to keep ourselves clear we will have to have Amendment 61 withdrawn and 62 not moved.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I beg to withdraw Amendment 61.

Amendment 61, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. GOREY: I am not moving Amendment 62.

Mr. BURKE: I move the amendment suggested by the Minister.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Motion made and question put: “That Section 28, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

Agreed.

SECTION 29.

Where the owner of a parcel of untenanted land which is vested in the Land Commission by virtue of this Act uses and cultivates the same as an ordinary farm in accordance with proper methods of husbandry; then

(a) If the price of the land does not exceed £3,000 the Land Commission shall, unless in their opinion it ought to be retained for improvement or enlargement or for utilization in connection with the relief of congestion, resell it to the owner at the said price, if before the appointed day he has undertaken to purchase it at that price; and

(b) if the price of the land exceeds £3,000 the Land Commission may resell to the owner either the whole thereof at the said price or any part thereof at a price bearing the same proportion to the said price which the value of the part bears to the value of the whole of the parcel as ascertained by the Land Commission, but the advance shall not in any case exceed £3,000, the difference (if any) between the amount to be advanced and the price being paid in cash by the owner to the Land Commission.

Mr. BURKE: I move: “To delete the word ‘land’ in line 61, page 11, and in line 5, page 12, and to insert in lieu thereof the words ‘parcel together with the value of any other lands in the possession of the owner as ascertained by the Land Commission,’ and in line 2, page 12, to delete the word ‘it’ and to substitute the word ‘parcel.’” The object of this amendment is to put a person all of whose land comes within the purview of this Bill in the same position as a person only part of whose land comes under it for the purpose of this Section. I think this amendment is very necessary in the interests of equity.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Amendment by Mr. BURKE: “To insert after the figures ‘£3,000’ the words ‘unless in the opinion of the Land Commission it is expedient that this amount should be exceeded.’”

Mr. BURKE: This is more or less a consequential amendment.

Amendment put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 65 is not moved.

Motion made and question put: “That Section 29, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

SECTION 30.

Where in the case of a holding retained by the Land Commission, the Land Commission do not exercise their powers of resumption or if they exercise their powers of resumption in respect of only part of the holding, then if the tenant has used and cultivated the holding as an ordinary farmer in accordance with proper methods of husbandry, the Land Commission may resell to the tenant the holding at the standard price, or any part thereof not resumed at the proportionate part of such price applicable thereto as determined by the Land Commission, and may make an advance for the purpose of the purchase not exceeding such sum as with the amount of the advances, if any, whether redeemed or not, which may already have been made under any of the Land Purchase Acts for the purchase of lands of which the tenant is the proprietor at the date of such resale, does not exceed £3,000, the difference (if any) between the amount to be advanced and the price being paid in cash by the tenant to the Land Commission.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It was mentioned that in Section 30 there would be an amendment consequential upon Amendment 47. Where does it come in?

Mr. HOGAN: It comes in in line 25, to delete the word "of." The amendment I would ask the leave of the Dáil to move would be this: "To delete the word 'of,' and to insert 'obtained by capitalising at the rate of 4½ per cent. the original annuities payable on the advance.'"

Mr. FITZGIBBON: Would the Minister, between this and the next stage, look into the word "original," because I fancy that there might be some annuities that have been subjected to decadal reductions, and therefore to make it quite clear that it is the actual annuity being paid at the moment, and not the original annuity?

Mr. HOGAN: I had that point in mind, and it was in view of that that I used the word "original."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Burke moves this as a consequential amendment to 47.

Amendment put and I to

Mr. BURKE: I move: "To insert after the figures '£3,000,' the words 'unless in the opinion of the Land Commission it is expedient that this amount should be exceeded.'" This is consequential.

Amendment put agreed to.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 30, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Section 31 agreed to.

SECTION 32.

The Land Commission may purchase any untenanted land which they consider necessary for the purpose of providing parcels of land for any of the persons to whom advances may be made under the provisions of this Act, for such price, payable in 4½ per cent. Land Bonds of equal nominal value, as shall be agreed upon between the owner of such untenanted land and the Land Commission, and such land when vested in the Land Commission shall be subject to all the provisions of this Act relating to the providing of parcels of land for the persons aforesaid.

Mr. BURKE: I move: "To insert after the word 'persons' the words 'or bodies.'" This is consequential on an amendment to Section 28.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment by Messrs. O'Callaghan and Colohan:—

In line 58, after the word "Commission," to insert the words "or, in default of agreement, as shall be fixed by the Land Commission (other than the Judicial Commissioner), or by the Judicial Commissioner on appeal from the Land Commission, regard being had in the fixing of the price to the fair value of the land to the Land Commission and the owner respectively."

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: I formally move the amendment. This amendment should be inserted after the word "Commission" on line 57, and not on line 58. The Section as it stands provides machinery where there is agreement between the owner of untenanted land and the Land Commission. The amendment provides machinery where there is no agreement, or where there is a conflict, and there may be a considerable block in the purchase if this machinery be not provided.

Mr. HOGAN: I could not accept that amendment. I think I explained the reasons before. The Bill takes power to take up compulsorily, and in fact automatically, all lands required for the relief of congestion or for facilitating the resale of untenanted land. The immediate operation of that would be to take up all untenanted land in the congested counties. That would be immediate under the operation of the Bill, so that it would be necessary to take up practically all the untenanted land elsewhere also for the relief of congestion, or otherwise to facilitate the resale of untenanted land. As I say, this Bill deals not only with congests but with evicted tenants, and it also provides for advances to evicted men. We want to have it perfectly clear that congests have the first claim, and we want to obviate as far as possible any difficulties that are in the way of dealing with the relief of congestion. If we started out to take power, in the first instance, to acquire land compulsorily for landless men, we would find that the Land Commission would be faced with an organised demand to take land here, there, and everywhere for landless men, who are more numerous and who have more influence and, perhaps, organising ability than the ordinary congested tenant, and probably before they quite realised what they were doing the Land Commission might find itself in the position of having to acquire land for landless men which later they might find necessary for the relief of congestion. It is only as the Act begins to operate that it will become clear whether or not it will be necessary to acquire land for the relief of congestion. There are congests on practically every estate in Ireland. There are so many congests in the congested districts that it would be necessary to acquire land outside of these districts for them. Nevertheless, we will be able to deal with considerable numbers of landless men and evicted tenants in congested areas, because we will find, as the Bill is put into operation, that it will be more suitable, perhaps, to migrate congests to lands outside the areas than to put them inside. That has been the experience in the operations of the 1903 Act. There are congests on practically every estate in Ireland. When the Land Commission require land for a few congests, they might buy a parcel of five hundred, six hundred, seven hundred, eight hundred, or a thousand acres, or whatever acreage is contained in any one title. They can deal with these few congests, and they can give the balance to the evicted tenants or the landless men. That arrangement preserves the proper sequence, and it is made quite clear that we owe our first obligation to the congested tenants, and that we are prepared to withstand any pressure that may come to deal with the more numerous and less deserving class in the first instance. I expect myself that practically all the available untenanted land will be acquired compulsorily under previous sections, and the only reason why this is put in at all is that the landowner may find himself left with a certain amount of land which he may wish to sell voluntarily to the Land Commission, but which you would not take under any circumstances. I want to put the Land Commission into the position to buy that and pay for it in Bonds, and without this Section they could not do so. I think the operation of the Act will prove that this will be the only function of this Section. The other available land will be taken up under the compulsory clause.

Mr. WILSON: All the land is untenanted land under this Bill. I should like to know whether in respect of every holder of land who pays an annuity to the Land Commission if, under this Bill, that land is not untenanted land.

Mr. HOGAN: I am not quite clear as to what the Deputy wants to know.

Mr. WILSON: I want to know if a man holds land in the Province of Connaught in a congested district, and is paying an annuity to the Land Commission under the terms of this Bill, is he not a holder of untenanted land?

Mr. HOGAN: No.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: He is a holder of untenanted land, excluded by Section 21, 2 (a).

Mr. HOGAN: But not for the purposes of this Act. Section 21 deals with the question, and it specifically excludes land which has been purchased under other Land Acts.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, Sub-section 2 (a).

Mr. HOGAN: Yes, there is a proviso. Notwithstanding anything contained in the foregoing sub-sections, where the Land Commission before the appointed day declare in the prescribed manner that any land wherever situated, hereinbefore excluded from the operation of this section (other than land which comes within the description in Clause (c) of sub-section (2) of this section) is required for the purpose of relieving congestion, then such land shall vest in the Land Commission pursuant to this section." That means that holdings that have already been purchased will not vest automatically in the Land Commission; like untenanted land, they could be acquired afterwards if it is found that the land which vests automatically in the Land Commission is not sufficient for the relief of congestion.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. GOREY: And would the tenant of this particular property get land elsewhere?

Mr. HOGAN: Yes.

Mr. WILSON: Will the annuitants in the congested area in Connaught first have their land taken before you proceed to another province? Would not that be the proper thing?

Mr. HOGAN: I should imagine the Land Commission will take the first cases first, wherever urgent, whether in the congested areas or areas outside the congested districts. No one could say now where they would begin. The events of the next three or four months, and the result of their operations in connection with estates between this and the appointed day, will probably enable them to make up their minds where they should begin. They will probably be operating in different parts of Ireland at the same time.

Mr. JOHNSON: The intention of this amendment was to complete, as was thought, the wish of the Minister. "The Land Commission may purchase any untenanted land they consider necessary for the purpose," and so on; that is if they consider it necessary, and the parcel of land which is in question is owned by a man who is not prepared to enter into an agreement regarding price, then the Land Commission's intention is frustrated, and there is no machinery of any kind whereby what the Land Commission thought is necessary can be carried into effect. The object of the amendment was to assist the Land Commission to have certain machinery at its disposal; inasmuch as the Minister thinks no machinery is necessary there is no occasion to press the amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: The Land Commission may purchase any untenanted land which they consider necessary for the purpose of parcelling land. Assuming a man holds 150 acres of land in fee farm grant, farming it as an ordinary farmer, and comes to the Land Commission and says, "I will sell you this land, as I do not want it," the purpose of this section is to enable the Land Commission to buy such farm if they consider it is necessary for the purpose of making advances to the various parties whom I mentioned. It would be necessary, but at the same time nobody would take up 150 acres of fee simple land held by an ordinary farmer, compulsorily. He would be entitled to farm that land, and he should not be put at a disadvantage by reason of the fact that he happens to own land in fee simple any more than his neighbour who owns 200 acres subject to an annuity. I want to put the Land Commission into the position that if such an owner offers to sell they can buy his land and give it to the landless men, and pay for it in Bonds.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: After listening to the explanation of the Minister, I wish to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (69) by Liam de Roiste:—
To add a Sub-section as follows:—

"Where a former tenant of a holding or his representative is ascertained in the prescribed manner to be entitled to re-instatement, or to an advance to purchase other land, but from other cause it appears that a money grant would be a more equitable compensation, the Land Commission may ascertain and award such compensation in the prescribed manner, and the source or sources from which the same is to be provided, and moneys to be provided under Section 58 may be used to pay such compensation in whole or in part, or for the purchase of land under this Section."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 69 involves a considerable expenditure of money. I would like Deputy de Roiste to explain that. There is one thing in the amendment, "The Land Commission may ascertain and award such compensation in the prescribed manner, and the source or sources from which the same is to be provided."

Mr. DE ROISTE: I ask leave to withdraw that amendment.

Amendment not moved.

Motion made and question put : That Section 32, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Agreed.

Section 33 agreed to.

SECTION 34.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to move—

“To insert before Section 34 a new Section as follows :—

In the case of any holding, purchased under a previous Land Act, which is still subject to a superior interest or other charge existing from before the time of the said sale under the Land Acts, the redemption price of such charge shall, on the application of the registered owner of the holding, be determined by the Judicial Commissioner, and shall be paid off by the issue to the owner of such charges of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds, as in manner prescribed by Section 3 of this Act, and the amount thereof shall be deemed to be an advance made under this Act, and shall be repayable by means of an annuity to be charged upon the lands, and consolidated with the existing purchase annuity, if any. The contribution of price shall not be payable in respect of any transaction under this Section.”

This is an amendment to deal with a remarkable situation—a situation that even some of those responsible for the Bill were not aware of. In different parts of Ireland land is still subject to tithe rents and superior interests. We want these interests bought out under this Bill, and a period put to the payment of these interests; otherwise the land question is not settled. I would like to hear the views of the Minister on this question.

An Leas-Cheann Comhairle took the Chair at this stage.

Mr. HOGAN: That is in a manner prescribed by Section 3 of this Act. I am in sympathy with the principle of this amendment, but as it is drafted it might mean that the annuity would be much larger than the fee farm rent. The fee farm rents, as a rule, are very small. We are really dealing here with untenanted lands which, in most cases, the ordinary owner would be selling, and not buying.

Generally, of course, they are small holders, but under the Act they would be actually selling to the Land Commission in the ordinary way. As I say, I am in sympathy with the principle of the amendment. If we ask the Land Commission to redeem these rents, they may come down on the holding, and regard it as tenanted land, and fix a price. If they adopted anything like the principle adopted in fixing a fair rent, and based their price on that they might fix a price on which the interest would be considerably higher than any fee-farm rents, because fee-farm rents are extremely low; in some cases they would not be more than three or four shillings an acre.

I am suggesting an alternative amendment which, I think, meets the case Deputy Gorey has in mind. It reads :—

“Where a holding has at any time been vested in a purchaser under the Land Purchase Acts, subject to a superior interest or charge the Judicial Commissioner shall, on the application of the proprietor after hearing all persons concerned, order the redemption of the said interest or charge, and all interests superior to them, and fix the redemption price thereof. The redemption price so fixed together with such costs as may be allowed by the Judicial Commissioner shall notwithstanding the provisions contained in subsection (4) of section 9 of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, be advanced and paid by means of $4\frac{1}{2}$ Land Bonds, and distributed by the Judicial Commissioner as if the redemption price were the purchase money of lands vested in the Land Commission under this Act. The advance shall be repayable by the proprietor of the holding by means of an annuity calculated at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the amount of the advance, and the said annuity shall be consolidated so far as circumstances permit with the existing purchase annuity (if any) to which the holding is subject.”

We are approaching it from the point of view of redeeming the rent, and that is I think what is in Deputy Gorey's mind.

Mr. GOREY: Not exactly. There is the peculiar position that where purchased agreements have been already come to, and annuities paid in pursuance of those agreements the lands are still subject to these head charges. It is an extraordinary thing, I never heard of it until it was brought to my knowledge in the counties of Cork and Limerick. I believe Deputy Wilson has evidence of it in some cases in County Dublin. My amendment makes the matter clear in the case of holdings purchased under previous Land Acts which are still subject to these superior interests. There are, and I think it is news to the Minister to know it, some special cases of land already purchased but still subject to these head charges. At one time I did not think that was possible, but it is so and it cannot be disputed.

[Mr. Gorey.]

Mr. DAVIN: I desire to support the case put forward by Deputy Gorey, because I am aware that in my own area there are several cases of this kind. I have a letter from one individual in this peculiar position. He has tried to make an agreement with the head landlord, but without result. I think the amendment moved by Deputy Gorey would relieve many people from obligations of that kind by leaving it in the hands of the Judicial Commissioners to fix what will be a fair figure at which to get rid of these head charges to which the Deputy has referred.

Mr. HOGAN: As I say, I am in sympathy with the principle of this amendment. We agree, at any rate, that the question should be settled and I think we would be able to settle it on Report Stage.

Mr. GOREY: I was going to suggest that.

Mr. O'DONNELL: There is another point which touches upon this that I would like to mention. I spoke to the Minister about it and he, certainly, gave me satisfaction, but there is still another point I wish to be clear about. There are tenants who are still unpurchased who have a big lot of turbary within the ambit of their holdings. Formerly, about twenty-five or twenty-six years ago, the landlords got no rent whatever for bog. There was a big area of bog and the tenants had the grazing rights of it and anybody could cut turf anytime and any where. Bogs then got scarce outside this area and a lot of people came in, with the result that the landlord is getting more now in payment for bog than he got for rent before. Even after we had Land Acts passed and Judicial reductions took place in the Land Courts, the landlord continued to get money for the bogs on the tenant's holding. The landlord claimed the mineral rights and is getting more rent from turbary, as a mineral right, than he got previously as rent from the land. When we come to this I would ask the Minister to consider what price should really be paid for these bogs. This is a matter that will apply to the bogs in general, and I would like to bring it forward in order that the Minister might be able to open up all these large tracts of bog so that when people want to cut turf they may be able to get it. Turf is a great necessity in the country. I would ask the Minister to see that all tenants have a right to get turf.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

A discussion on that matter cannot be raised on this particular amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: I will read Section 23 for the Deputy: "The powers of the Land Commission to acquire compulsorily any untenanted land shall be extended to include power so to acquire any bog whether the same is or is not subject to any right of turbary of other persons than the owner, and whether or not an advance under the Land Purchase Acts has been made for the purchase of lands including such bog, and if made, whether redeemed or not."

Then you have Section 36 which says:—"The powers of the Land Commission to make regulations with respect to turbary on bogs on holdings shall be extended so as to include power to make regulations with respect to turbary on any bog, whether the owner thereof has or has not an exclusive right of turbary thereon, and so as to include power of defining the area on which the owner may cut turf and to make regulations conferring and defining rights of access to and through the bog over any land for the purposes of turbary."

I think that meets the point.

Mr. GOREY: In view of the statement of the Minister on my amendment I ask leave to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question—‘That Section 34 stand part of the Bill,’ put and agreed to.

Sections 35 and 36 put and agreed to.

SECTION 37.

(1) Where it appears to the Judicial Commissioner that any watercourse, drain, embankment, or other work has, prior to the appointed day, been cleansed or maintained in whole or in part by or at the expense of the landlord, or in the case of untenanted land the owner, either alone or in conjunction with other persons, and whether under terms of contract of tenancy or otherwise, he may direct that out of the Land Bonds representing the purchase money there shall be transferred and applied in manner hereinafter provided, Land Bonds sufficient to yield an income equivalent to the average annual expenditure incurred by a landlord or owner in such cleansing or maintenance during a period of ten normal years.

(2) Land Bonds so ordered to be transferred and applied shall be transferred to the Public Trustee, and the income shall be applied in or towards the cleansing or maintenance of the watercourse, drain, embankment, or other work in accordance with a scheme to be framed by the Land Commission which may if thought fit authorise the sale of the said Land Bonds or the investments for the time being representing the same or any part thereof and the application of the principal moneys arising from such sale in or towards the reconstruction of such work.

(3) The Land Commission shall have power to determine all questions in connection with watercourses, drains and embankments, and the cleansing and maintenance thereof, and to define or prescribe the rights, obligations, and liabilities in relation thereto of all parties.

(4) The Land Commission shall have power to enter on any lands for the purpose of cleansing, repair maintenance or restoration of watercourses, drains, embankments, or other works, and to take such soil and materials therefrom, and to do such things thereon as may be necessary for the said purposes.

(5) The Land Commission shall have power in their discretion to expend in or towards the reconstruction of any watercourse, drain, embankment or other work a sum to be advanced by the Minister for Finance at their request out of moneys to be provided by the Oireachtas, and so much of such sum as the Land Commission certify in that behalf shall be repayable by means of an annuity or annuities charged upon any land, which the Land Commission certify to have been benefited by such expenditure, as if the said sum had been advanced for the purchase of the land in pursuance of a subsequent purchase agreement, the said annuity to be consolidated, so far as circumstances permit, with any existing Land Purchase annuity to which the land is subject.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to move the following amendment to the Section :

In Sub-Section (1), line 28, to add after the word “embankment” the word “foreshore,” and in line 36 to delete the words “Land Bonds sufficient to yield,” and to substitute therefor the words “such amount of Land Bonds as will be adequate to place the said works in repair and in addition to provide.”

We want to have this amendment inserted in the Bill because, in a good many cases where landlords had liabilities with regard to foreshore and embankments, they have been neglected for the last fifteen or twenty years, and at present are in a very bad condition indeed. I know in the case of an embankment on the River Barrow, that the money set aside under the purchase agreement for its maintenance has been exhausted, and now the question of its maintenance rests between the tenants and the Land Commission. I might say that before the money was set aside for its maintenance the bank was not in a proper condition, with the result that the amount set aside is altogether inadequate for its maintenance. We want to have these embankments, and the water courses, maintained in a proper condition, and the object of the amendment is to have reasonable safeguards provided for that purpose. We suggest that it is only fair, because the property that is being sold is the property of the landlord, and if the property has deteriorated, owing to the neglect of the water courses or the embankments, the money required to put them in a proper condition again ought to be provided out of the proceeds of the sale of the property. Otherwise, the State will have to assume a huge [Mr. Gorey.] responsibility which, I suppose, would fall ultimately on the tenants.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I rise to support the amendment because it proposes to deal with a matter in which the people in my area are vitally concerned. When the landlord is being purchased out, he must be purchased out on conditions that applied in the past as regards his obligations to maintain embankments. This is a matter that concerns not only the people in my area, but a great many others as well. When the landlord is bought out, there should be deducted from the amount payable to him a sum sufficient in Land Bonds to ensure that his obligations in the past will be fulfilled in the future and so that protection will be afforded for the tenants who acquire that property. In the past, the landlords were bound to comply with a condition of that kind. We have a very important question of that sort in our area, and it applies to a great many people. The landlord now is under no obligation to keep the embankment, or at least the greater portion of it in repair, so as to protect the interests affected by these embankments. That is a matter, I think, that must be watched very carefully by the Land Commission, who must have power to deduct from the landlord, or rather from the purchase price, a sufficient sum in Land Bonds to continue in the future the protection afforded in the past by the landlords on these embankments. The Land Commission should see that the whole responsibility will not be thrown on the tenants, and that this obligation of the landlord in the past will not be overlooked in carrying out the purchase transactions.

Mr. MacBRIDE: I do not see what relation "foreshore" has in regard to this question. I think Deputy Gorey does not understand what that word covers. It might cover an extent of seashore a mile broad.

Mr. GOREY: I mean on tidal rivers, such as the Shannon.

Mr. HOGAN: I do not think Deputy McGoldrick quite realises the nature of the amendment. I will read the Section for him: "Where it appears to the Judicial Commissioner that any water-course, drain, embankment, or other work has, prior to the appointed day, been cleansed or maintained in whole or in part by or at the expense of the landlord, or in the case of untenanted land the owner, either alone or in conjunction with other persons, and whether under the terms of a contract of tenancy or otherwise, he may direct that out of the Land Bonds representing the purchase money there shall be transferred and applied in manner hereinafter provided, Land Bonds sufficient to yield an income equivalent to the average annual expenditure incurred by the landlord or owner in such cleansing or maintenance during a period of ten normal years."

That provides that out of the purchase money there shall be set aside "Land Bonds sufficient to yield an income equivalent to the average annual expenditure incurred by the landlord or owner in such cleansing or maintenance during a period of ten normal years." That is what Deputy McGoldrick was speaking in favour of, and it is in the Section. Deputy Gorey's amendment goes further, because it says to delete the words "Land Bonds sufficient to yield" and to add therefor the words "such amount of Land Bonds as will be adequate to place the said works in repair and in addition to provide" (the Section to read on) "an income equivalent to the average annual expenditure incurred by the landlord or owner in such cleansing or maintenance during a period of ten normal years." That is to say, that not only should there be deducted, and be set aside from the Land Bonds, an amount sufficient to keep the embankment and the foreshore in repair, but that there should be set aside from the Land Bonds an amount sufficient to put them in proper repair to start with. The Deputy quoted the case of the Barrow. I suppose if you bought out two or three of the biggest estates adjoining the River Barrow, the total purchase money would not be sufficient to do even half the work that Deputy Gorey contemplates in his amendment. In practically every case, the work would eat up the whole of the purchase money.

Mr. GOREY: What about the Shannon?

Mr. HOGAN: The Shannon is in the same position as the case I have quoted. It may be that it was the landlord's fault, or it may be that it was not right at any time that the landlord should have had to keep the embankments on a river like the Shannon. No private individual could keep the river embankments of the Shannon or Barrow right. It would be quite impossible, and that is the real point in the case.

Mr. GOREY: That is true with regard to embankments, but I am urging the cases of watercourses and drains.

Mr. HOGAN: Your amendment includes "embankments" and "foreshore." As I have stated, to do work of that kind would take practically three times as much as the purchase money of the estate in most cases.

Mr. GOREY: I believe the word "foreshore" is too broad a term to use in this connection.

Mr. HOGAN: Under your amendment there is the question of maintaining the embankments, and that, I think, is really a matter for the State. If you do set aside, out of the price you give the landlord for the land, a sum sufficient to keep these things in repair, or in the repair they were kept in for the last ten years, then you are taking a big sum out of the purchase money, and you are doing as much at his expense as you should do. Anything further should be done by the State.

Mr. GOREY: The Minister, I think, has missed my point. It is all right to say that a certain sum of money has been expended on works of this kind during the last ten years, but I say that no money has been expended on them during that period, and they have been utterly neglected. This amendment applies to watercourses and drains and not to embankments, and I hold that they have been utterly neglected during the last ten years. No money at all has been expended on them.

Mr. HOGAN: I am sure that during the last two or three years at any rate the sum expended on them has been nil.

Mr. GOREY: I maintain that the period goes back ten years.

Mr. HOGAN: The words in the Section are "any watercourse, drain, embankment, or other work." That does not refer to the streams that flow through the tenant's holdings. If small streams of that character have been allowed to become choked, then really the tenant himself is to blame. The tenant who would allow a stream three feet wide to become choked on his farm and do incalculable damage, even though the landlord should have kept the stream cleaned, is really to blame himself. The tenant who would allow that to occur is as much to blame as the landlord, even though it is supposed to be the landlord's duty. Let us be clear. The section says "water course, drain, embankment or other work." That does not mean the ordinary stream you find flowing through a tenant's holding. I presume we are not disputing about that. Two men could do that in a day.

Mr. GOREY: I am not disputing about ordinary drains. I am dealing only with main water courses.

Mr. HOGAN: We are dealing then with the bigger water courses—the River Shannon and the Barrow and the Suck, and numerous other big rivers that take a lot of upkeep. We propose to set aside from the landlord's purchase money a sum to yield a sufficient income to keep the works in an average state of repair. We propose to do that in the Section, but the Deputy proposes to go further and to set aside, not only what would yield an income sufficient to keep them in repair, but to set aside an amount which would put them into proper order. In 99 cases out of 100 that would eat up three times the purchase money. On the Barrow or the Shannon or on any of the big rivers it would simply eat up the purchase money. It would be for the Land Commission to say, in all fairness, what ought to have been expended for the last 10 years in upkeep and to set aside a reasonable amount. The Land Commission are not going to force a landlord or a landowner to drain the Barrow or the Suck or any of these bigger rivers.

Mr. GOREY: I did not ask them

Mr. DAVIN: Deputy Gorey, in moving this amendment, referred to the Barrow. Everybody is acquainted with the conditions concerning the flooding of the Barrow. I would like to know what is to be given under this Clause to the tenants who, in order to save their land from flooding, made drains when in some cases that was the liability of the landlords. When the question of the Barrow and the Shannon, and the question of drainage generally, comes to be inquired into, the liability of the present owners of the waterways to maintain the embankments or drains will have to be inquired into. Tenants did a certain amount of work voluntarily which was really the landlord's work or the work of the people who owned or controlled the waterways. These are cases that should be taken into consideration when this matter is being considered by the Commissioners, and credit should be given to those people who have done work voluntarily in order to save their land from the flooding on the Barrow and the Shannon.

Mr. O'CONNELL: It will probably be necessary, in view of what the Minister has said, to introduce words into this Section to make it clear that the landlord who has neglected his work will not get off scot free in this matter. Otherwise it might happen that a landlord who spent £50 per annum during the last 10 or 15 years on these works would have stopped out of his purchase money a certain amount of bonds to produce that £50, whereas another landlord who expended no money and did no repairs would have nothing stopped out of his purchase money. It should be made quite definite that it will be within the power of the Land Commission to say what would have been a reasonable sum to expend in the upkeep of such works, and that a certain amount should be stopped from the purchase money of such a landlord to provide for the work which he should have done.

Mr. GOREY: A good many of these properties are only valuable by reason of the condition in which the water courses are kept. Kept badly, the lands are valueless. I would like to know what will be the position in regard to foreshore rights. Where tenants' property abuts on the foreshore, will the landlord still have the right to the sea front and to the seaweed, which is very important in certain districts of the country? Personally I am not interested in it, and I know very little about it, but it would be well that the right should be defined. I know big tracts of the Midlands where drainage has been neglected and the water courses neglected. Down in Kildare and Queen's County—

Mr. HOGAN: On a point of order, the Deputy should draw attention to these matters on Report. We are on a specific section now, and if we get away from specific sections we will never get through with the Bill.

Mr. GOREY: In line 37 of this Section it says "Land Bonds sufficient to yield an income equivalent to the average annual expenditure incurred by the landlord or owner." I know a case where there has been no expenditure at all for the last 10 years, and the work is absolutely defective.

Mr. HOGAN: I will undertake to put in words to meet the point made by Deputy O'Connell and Deputy Gorey—that is, where you have two landlords equally liable. One landlord did work and the other did not. The landlord who did the work might, as the Bill stands, be mulcted for so doing. There is a danger that something like that might occur, and I will put in words to meet it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 37 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 38.

On the vesting of any lands under this Act, all sporting rights within the meaning of Section 13 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, and all fisheries appurtenant thereto, shall vest in the Land Commission as if the owner had agreed to sell them at such price as in the absence of agreement shall be fixed by the Land Commission (other than the Judicial Commissioner) or by the Judicial Commissioner on appeal from the Land Commission, regard being had in fixing such price to the fair value of the sporting rights and fisheries to the Land Commission and to the owner respectively. The purchase money of all such sporting rights and fisheries shall be paid in $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds.

Mr. GOREY: I move amendment 72

To add after the word "shall," line 8, the words "(a) in the case of tenanted land vest in the tenant, and (b) in the case of untenanted land shall."

The Minister gave a promise on the Second Reading that this matter would be attended to, and we have put in words which would give effect to the promise.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Gorey's amendment would hardly meet the case. The Section would then read: "All sporting rights and all fisheries appurtenant thereto shall '(a) in the case of tenanted land vest in the tenant, and (b) in the case of untenanted land shall' vest in the Land Commission." That would apply to fisheries as well as to sporting rights as you have it drafted. I am not prepared to agree to that. Fishing is one thing, but sporting rights is another. I suggest the following amendment in Section 38:—

To delete this section, and insert:—

38.—(1) On the vesting of any lands in the Land Commission under this Act, all sporting rights as defined in Sub-section (2) of Section 13 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, including such sporting rights as may be superior interests, and all fisheries appurtenant to the said lands shall vest in the Land Commission, subject to any lease then existing, as if the owner or owners had agreed to sell them at such price as in the absence of agreement shall be fixed by the Land Commission (other than the Judicial Commissioner), or by the Judicial Commissioner on appeal from the Land Commission, regard being had in fixing such price to the fair value of the sporting rights and fisheries to the Land Commission and to the owner or owners respectively.

Provided that in the case of tenanted land the sporting rights other than fishing rights and fisheries shall be deemed to be of no appreciable value.

(2) Where the tenant of a holding of tenanted land is deemed to have entered into a subsequent purchase agreement for the purchase of the holding from the Land Commission under this Act, the sporting rights on and over the holding other than fishing rights and fisheries shall be vested in him with the holding.

(3) The purchase money of all such sporting rights and fisheries shall be paid in $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds.

(4) The Land Commission shall have power to make regulations conferring and defining rights of passage through and over any lands to any river or lake and along the banks or shores of any such river or lake which in the opinion of the Land Commission may be necessary or expedient for the proper user and enjoyment of any fishing rights vested in the Land Commission under this Act.

There is no purchase money for sporting rights on or over tenanted land. The monies referred to are for sporting rights on untenanted lands which are extremely valuable. There are large tracts of bogs which are valuable for sporting rights. They will be vested in the Land Commission, who will let them in the ordinary way. They will let them to the people who are most entitled to them. There are previous clauses in the Bill which give us the power to make sure that we have rights-of-way on banks of rivers or any rights-of-way we require in connection with fisheries.

Mr. GOREY: We have not had time to read that amendment, but I expect the Section is going to be recommitted to Committee.

Mr. HOGAN: It should be clearly understood I am not going to recommit any section that is passed. I shall only recommit those that I have given an undertaking to recommit.

Mr. GOREY: We had not time to study this. This is one of the sections we would like to have power to recommit.

Mr. HOGAN: It is open to the Deputy to propose an amendment to this section later on.

Mr. GOREY: That will be done.

Mr. JOHNSON: Does the Minister propose to introduce that now as an amendment at this stage?

Mr. HOGAN: I was going to ask the permission of the Dáil to do so.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Does Deputy Gorey consent to withdraw Amendment 72 and substitute this instead?

Mr. DOYLE: I know of several harbours the sporting rights of which never have been protected. The tenants along the foreshore make their living out of them. I would like to ask the Minister would those be included in sporting rights?

Mr. HOGAN: The sporting rights of tenanted land will go to the tenant for nothing. Whether in a particular case certain sporting rights will go I cannot say until I know all the facts. The case would be governed by the facts. We cannot do more than to say that "the sporting rights of tenanted land will go to the tenant."

Mr. DOYLE: But this is not land at all; it is a kind of foreshore.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I suggest that the proposal of the Minister, which he will admit is very important, and I think will be generally acceptable, be deferred to the Report Stage, and that this amendment be circulated meantime, with notice that it is to be moved on the Report Stage? That would meet the desires of Deputy Gorey and the rest of the Dáil.

Mr. HOGAN: I will do that.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I want to ask a question with regard to mineral rights.

Mr. HOGAN: On a point of order, may I ask are we dealing with mineral rights on this section?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: No.

Mr. GOREY: I shall withdraw my amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I do agree it is very desirable that we should see this proposed amendment if possible, but would it not be better to adopt it now, so that we will have it in print as soon as we get this Bill circulated for the next stage, rather than adopt a section which seems not at all consistent with the amendment that the Minister has read out? As far as I can understand his amendment, it carries out pretty much what was in this Section, only in a different way. All sporting rights, he suggested, on untenanted land shall vest in the Land Commission, and to this he adds some proviso that in the case of tenanted land those sporting rights shall be deemed to be of no appreciable value—that is to say, that it will exclude them from the provision in this Section that they are to vest in the Land Commission, as if the owner had agreed to purchase them at such price as in the absence of agreement shall be fixed by the Land Commission. The Section fixed nothing for sporting rights, which is probably the value of sporting rights on tenanted land to anybody except the tenant, who, of course, can enjoy them himself, and prevent anybody else from getting any value out of them. Fisheries are another matter. The amendment of Deputy Gorey might have been very dangerous. It is right that all fisheries that vest in somebody other than the present owner should vest in the Land Commission, because if you happen to have two purchasing tenants with fishing rights on their holdings on opposite sides of the river, neither fishery will be worth anything either to the State or anybody else if the tenants choose to exercise the rights they possess. No doubt fisheries are capable of being of great value to the State in many different ways. Therefore it is quite right that they themselves should see that those who now become possessors of their holdings, and who had leased their fishing rights to persons who owned the general fishing rights of a stream, should not be in a position to destroy the whole value of the fishing rights in the stream to others above and below. This amendment vests all fisheries in the Land Commission, and all sporting rights of untenanted land, at a price to be fixed. On tenanted land it will work automatically; there will be no price at all. I suggest we would have a better opportunity of seeing the full bearing of this amendment if we had it in print as a part of the Section when we come on to the next stage rather than if we had the Section as it stands here, with a slip of paper containing the amendment. It would be easier to study it if you had it in the place it would be in if the Bill is passed, rather than try and read it into the Section with which it has no actual physical connection. Therefore, I would ask Deputy Johnson to adopt the amendment read out, and then we will be in a position to tackle it on the Report Stage when we have time.

Mr. JOHNSON: The only point in this matter is that the Dáil would be entitled to see an amendment of so important a nature before committing itself to accepting it. I think, however, it will be generally acceptable, and my first proposition was that it should be circulated in typewritten form at an early date, so that it could be considered on the Report Stage. If the Bill is to be printed and circulated with due notice before the Report Stage, then the proposition made by Deputy Fitzgibbon is quite satisfactory, and on that assumption I have no objection to accepting the amendment in this form at this stage, especially as I think it does meet the case made to the Minister in regard to those rights of fishermen who have for generations been working, say, at the mouth of the Shannon about Limerick, and on other rivers. I think it secures for them something for which they have been looking, and which prevents possible evils arising affecting them. If there is time to consider this amendment after the Bill, as amended, is circulated, and before the Report Stage, then I think the amendment might be accepted now.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputies may take it that there will be time. There will be three days or more between the time the Bill will be in the hands of Deputies and the Report Stage. Of course, this Section can be recommitted.

Mr. WILSON: I am very much interested in the question of sporting rights. There are, as everybody is aware, a number of mountains in Wicklow on which there are sporting rights.

Mr. HOGAN: If this Section is to be recommitted, the Deputy, I suggest, will have an opportunity of later arguing the case. He should defer his argument until the recommitted section is introduced.

Mr. WILSON: The Minister for Agriculture does not recollect that I will be going home to-morrow, and I will have twenty-four men outside my door waiting to know something about the sporting rights.

Mr. ROONEY: I beg to propose the suggested amendment.

Mr. GOREY: We will be quite satisfied if the section is recast so as to include the substance of what we are now agreed on.

Mr. WILSON: All I want to know is what the Minister is doing.

Mr. HOGAN: We are vesting the sporting rights on tenanted land in the tenants for nothing.

Mr. WILSON: Quite so, but as regards the men owning the mountains, they pay rent for them, and they want the sporting rights.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: They are getting those rights under the suggested amendment if they are tenants.

Mr. WILSON: The landlord at the present time keeps a gamekeeper on these mountains, and the tenants cannot go looking for any game except surreptitiously. Those men are quite willing that when the Land Commission buys the rights from the landlord, as provided in the Act, to pay for them to the Land Commission, if that would meet the case.

Mr. HOGAN: That would exactly meet the case. The Land Commission can let the lands to whom they like if there are valuable sporting rights.

Mr. WILSON: I would like to point out that if the Land Commission gets the sporting rights, and the tenant gets permission from the Land Commission, there will then be no sporting rights, no game. This is a matter on which some agreement should be come to.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: Where does the question of mineral rights arise in the Bill?

Mr. HOGAN: It will be dealt with on recommitment in a section that will be proposed later.

Question: "That Section 38, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Question: "That Section 39 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: On a point of order, before we reach those new sections under the heading of the National Land Bank, I may say that I have read them, and I am perfectly sure that I do not understand what they mean. I have asked learned Deputies what they mean, and they too have failed to get a grasp of them. It is perfectly apparent they introduce something entirely new, and that was not before the Dáil on the Second Reading. I suggest it would be fairer to the Dáil, to the Clauses, and to whatever they intend to achieve, that the Minister might be able to deal with them all as one, and if necessary take a further Second Reading. I do not know whether that is practicable or possible, but certainly some procedure ought to be adopted by which we will be able to deal with all the amendments from No. 73 to No. 80 as one, in order that the Minister might explain to the Dáil why they are being moved, what caused them to be introduced now, and what exactly they mean.

[Mr. Darrell Figgis.]

Mr. HOGAN: I do not think everybody is in such a state over those new sections as the Deputy who spoke. The meaning of the amendments is quite clear to anybody who knows anything about land purchase or the operations of the National Land Bank. I referred, as a matter of fact, to this matter on the Second Reading. The amendments are long, but they effect a very simple purpose. The National Land Bank financed £339,000 worth of sales during 1919, 1920 and 1921. A number of men got together and purchased fee-simple land. The National Land Bank put up the purchase money. They compelled the purchasers to form a co-operative society, and they made an advance to the society. The society gave a mortgage to the Land Bank for the full amount of the purchase money, so that the present position is, so far as this £339,000 is concerned, the Bank hold mortgages for that amount for land in various parts of the country, the land being owned in fee-simple by these co-operative societies. The trouble is over interest and sinking fund. The Bank compelled the co-operative societies to repay the money at the rate of 7 per cent for seven years, 6 per cent. for ten years, and 5 per cent. for thirteen years. Most of these societies are paying something like 7 per cent. on the money. That was all right in 1919 and 1920, but under present conditions it is not an economic proposition. We have come to the rescue, and the Land Bank is quite agreeable. We are advancing the money. In effect we are buying the land from the society, reselling to the society, and paying off the Land Bank mortgage. Roughly, if there is a mortgage of £10,000 on the lands of any society, the Government can buy the land at £10,000, advance £10,000 worth of Bonds to the Land Bank, and allow the society to repay that at the rate of four and three-quarters per cent. for 68½ years.

If we take a specific case it would make it quite simple. Assume a society owns a farm of land in fee-simple, a farm of about 600 acres, and that there is a mortgage on that of £10,000, a mortgage held by the Land Bank. The Land Commission, under the provisions of this Act, purchased that 600 acres. They are enabled to pay off any mortgages in Bonds. The provisions of the Act allow the society who are the owners of the land to pay off any mortgages in Bonds. The society does pay them off; they pay them £10,000 in Bonds. They repay that £10,000 worth of bonds by an annuity, just the same as any other tenant purchaser. The advantage to the society is that they are getting the money at 4½ per cent. interest instead of a 7 per cent. loan. That will help to put these societies on their feet.

Mr. ROONEY: Before this amendment is passed I would like to ask the Minister if societies are formed to purchase land in a similar way to the land purchased under the Land Bank, would these societies also come under this amendment?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: We cannot have a discussion on it before the Dáil, but the Minister may answer a question.

Mr. ROONEY: I thought the Minister would include societies such as these.

Mr. HOGAN: This only deals with Land Bank societies.

NEW SECTIONS.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move: To insert before Section 40 the following new section:—

The provisions of Part II. of this Act shall not, save as provided in this part of this Act, apply to any lands which have been purchased by a Co-operative Farming Society (in this part of this Act called a Society), or by a body of trustees, by means of advances made by the National Land Bank, Limited (in this part of this Act called the Bank), and which, at the date of the passing of this Act, are subject to a charge for repayment of such advances, or any part thereof.

One of the reasons why it is confined to the Land Bank Societies is that the Land Bank was started by the Dáil. It was financed by the Dáil, and we cannot escape responsibility for the transactions in which it was involved. It was formed at a time when there was a danger that a special land division movement would cut across the national struggle that was going on. To prevent the energies of the country being dissipated the old Dáil set up Land Courts, which gave decisions as to land to which claims were made. Then, in order that these decisions might be financed, the Land Bank was set up, and it carried on its work very largely as political work in order to prevent, as I said, the land agitation from cutting across the national struggle and reaching unmanageable dimensions. The idea was to give the hope to the people who would otherwise be inclined to go in and secure land on their own, to secure it by purchase. It was only able to carry out its work to a small extent. The total number of acres purchased was 10,730, and the number of people in the Societies who acquired land was 879.

It was, perhaps, as well that the Land Bank was not able to buy more land than was bought, for at that time these people were willing to pay anything for land. The Land Bank was continually refusing to finance transactions because the people concerned were willing to pay a far greater price than the Bank thought they ought to pay. It was not able to keep the price down in the way in which it should be kept down. In those boom years people were willing to pay any prices, without regard to the future. These transactions served a very good purpose in their time, and there is no reason why the people who entered into these transactions should be let down, as they would be let down if we allowed that very heavy burden upon them.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Will the Minister say where is the provision in the Bill which says the Land Bank is to be paid off in Bonds?

Mr. BLYTHE: It is in a subsequent section.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I have looked through the subsequent sections, and I failed to find it.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before Deputy Gavan Duffy spoke I was going to suggest that the explanation of the Minister for Agriculture is a very clear and lucid one, and that it is much more clear than these sections with which it deals. His explanation deals with matters not included in those sections.

Mr. HOGAN: Will the Deputy point out the matters not included in the section?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I may say that I asked that question for the purpose of information. I am considerably interested in the Land Bank, and I am glad to see that at last it is getting something like official recognition. A statement has been made to us which opens up a new vista for the future of that bank, and one would like to see this particularly important point as to the bank having to take Bonds.

Mr. BLYTHE: It is in a subsequent section. It is dealt with by Amendment 77.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move:—To insert before Section 40 the following new section:—

All land purchased by a society or body of trustees, by means of an advance made by the Bank, shall, if any part of the advance is unpaid, vest in the Land Commission on the appointed day, in like manner and with the like consequences as if Vesting Orders under the Land Purchase Acts had been made on the appointed day in respect thereof, in pursuance of subsequent purchase agreements entered into by the Land Commission with the society or body of trustees, at the price fixed under the provisions contained in this part of this Act.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move:—To insert before Section 40 the following new section:—

The Bank shall furnish in writing to the Land Commission particulars of the lands so purchased, of the portion of the purchase money (if any) deposited with them by the society or body of trustees, of the advance made by them for the purchase thereof, of the amount due them in respect of such advance, and of the superior interests and other charges (if any) subject to which the lands were purchased by the society or body of trustees, together with such other particulars as the Land Commission may require and prescribe, and shall lodge with the Land Commission such deeds, documents, and maps as may be necessary for the purpose of verifying the particulars so furnished.

Mr. HOGAN: This Section merely provides that any particulars that the Land Commission wants can be obtained by it from the Land Bank.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move:—"To insert before Section 40 the following new section:—

The Land Commission shall, from time to time, publish notices containing particulars of the lands so purchased, and of the superior interests and other charges, including the charge for the repayment of the advance due to the Bank, subject to which they were purchased, and such notices shall prescribe the time within which and the manner in which objections to such notices may be made, by reason of the inclusion or non-inclusion therein of any lands, or the omission or misdescription of any such superior interest or charge as aforesaid.

Mr. HOGAN: That speaks for itself. It is a very simple thing. I do not know why any Deputy cannot understand that.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move:—"To insert before Section 40 the following new section:—

The Land Commission (other than the Judicial Commissioner) shall consider all objections duly made, and there shall be a right of appeal to the Judicial Commissioner, whose decision shall be final. The Judicial Commissioner shall, if he is satisfied that prior to the date of the passing of this Act the Society or body of Trustees had a good title to the lands so purchased, free from incumbrances, save the charge securing the repayment of the advance due to the Bank, and any superior interests or land purchase annuities, ascertain the superior interests issuing out of the lands, and shall fix the redemption price of all such superior interests and annuities, and shall also ascertain the amount due for principal (without giving credit for the deposit, if any, lodged with the Bank by the Society or body of Trustees) and interest on foot of the charge securing the repayment of the advance due to the Bank, and shall fix the price of the lands at such sum as shall be sufficient to redeem and pay off all such superior interests and annuities, and the charge securing the repayment of the advance due to the Bank, together with such costs as may be allowed by him. When the Bank shall have satisfied the Land Commission that they have repaid to the Society or body of Trustees such deposits as aforesaid, the price so ascertained, of which one-eleventh shall be contributed by the State, shall be paid in $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds on the appointed day.

Mr. HOGAN: I might mention that it was the custom of the Bank to require societies to lodge on deposit in the Bank one-fourth of the purchase money. The Bank took a mortgage, however, for the full purchase money. This money here was merely lodged on deposit account. The interest accumulated, and helped, together with the 7 per cent. interest, the current interest, to redeem the loan. The State is paying one-eleventh of the purchase money in relief of the societies.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: If the Minister will look more closely at the Section he will see that the objection I ventured to raise was not wholly unreasonable, because the Section to which he refers provides for the price being paid in Bonds. Of course, if that means the redemption price, the money to be paid for redeeming the mortgage to the Bank, it does provide that the Bank is to take Bonds. But I do not think it is clear. It would look as if it were an ordinary provision as to purchase price. The question you have to deal with is the payment back of money to the Bank, so that the word "price" is misleading if that is intended to mean that the Bank is to take its payment in Bonds.

Mr. HOGAN: I do not think it is. The Judicial Commissioner shall, if he is satisfied that prior to the date of the passing of this Act the Society or body of Trustees had a good title to the lands so purchased, free from incumbrances, save the charge securing the repayment of the advance due to the Bank, and any superior interests or land purchase annuities, ascertain the superior interests issuing out of the lands, and shall fix the redemption price of all such superior interests and annuities, and shall also ascertain the amount due for principal (without giving credit for the deposit, if any, lodged with the Bank by the Society or body of Trustees) and interest on foot of the charge securing the repayment of the advance due to the Bank, and shall fix the price of the lands at such sum as shall be sufficient to redeem and pay off all such superior interests and annuities, and the charge securing the repayment of the advance due to the Bank, together with such costs as may be allowed by him. Does not that make it clear?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I do not think it makes it clear that the Bank must take payment in Bonds.

Mr. HOGAN: "Shall fix the price of the lands at such sum as shall be sufficient to redeem and pay off all such superior interests and annuities." The superior interests referred to are all possible superior interests and annuities, including the annuity due to the Bank on foot of the mortgage. The price shall be such "as shall be sufficient to redeem and pay off all such superior interests and annuities, and the charge securing the repayment of the advance due to the Bank, together with such costs as may be allowed by him. When the Bank shall have satisfied the Land Commission that they have repaid to the Society or body of Trustees such deposit as aforesaid, the price so ascertained, of which one-eleventh shall be contributed by the State, shall be paid in $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds on the appointed day." The price will include not only the debt to the Bank, but the debt of perhaps the owner of some other superior interest. This land is like any other fee-simple land we are buying. There are superior interests on it. It is in exactly the same case as land owned by an ordinary owner in fee-simple who has his superior interests, and who has his mortgage. The Society own the land. They have a mortgage to the Land Bank; they may have to pay head rent to somebody else. The price includes the value of all the mortgages and head rents, and the price so ascertained, of which one-eleventh shall be contributed by the State, shall be paid in $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Land Bonds.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Perhaps I am unduly stupid, but I confess I see a difficulty. To say that the price shall be paid in Bonds is not the same as to say that the mortgage is to be paid in Bonds. Even after the Minister has read the provision of the Section in which the word "price" occurs twice I remain of the same opinion, that it is not made clear that the Bank is to be paid in Bonds.

Mr. BLYTHE: The Bank will be very glad to be paid in Bonds.

Mr. HOGAN: It is perfectly clear: Amendment 74, which we have passed, says:—

All land purchased by a society or body of trustees, by means of an advance made by the Bank, shall, if any part of the advance is unpaid, vest in the Land Commission on the appointed day, in like manner and with the like consequences as if Vesting Orders under the Land Purchase Acts had been made on the appointed day in respect thereof, in pursuance of subsequent purchase agreements entered into by the Land Commission with the society or body of trustees, at the price fixed under the provisions contained in this part of this Act.

That makes these sections read with the rest of the Bill for the purpose of paying off mortgages.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: It really depends on the reference back.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: Am I right in saying that the Bank, which has advanced £1,900 on this land, will now be paid £2,800 in stock— $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Stock instead of 7 per cent.—is that the meaning of it?

Mr. HOGAN: If I were quite clear as to what the Deputy wanted to know I would answer him, but I am not.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. McGOLDRICK: It has been stated that the Bank is to take stock instead of their advance. Is that right?

Mr. HOGAN: The Bank is in exactly the same position as the owner of any other superior interest. They will get the full amount of their advance like any other mortgagee, but they will be paid in stock.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: They have already advanced money at 7 per cent. to these societies.

Mr. BLYTHE: It is not at 7 per cent., but with Sinking amounts to 7 per cent.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: That makes a slight difference— $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., I suppose.

Mr. BLYTHE: A great deal more than that.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: The 7 per cent. in any case, with the money now at $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., works out at the figures I stated.

Mr. HOGAN: What is the Deputy's point?

Mr. McGOLDRICK: If the Bank has advanced £1,900 to these societies, and holds them responsible for 7 per cent. to cover Sinking Fund and interest on that money, and it is now proposed to give the Bank stock in lieu of that 7 per cent. interest to bring them the same return at $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., that would amount to the figures I have stated.

Mr. HOGAN: They will not be paying back the interest, but the principal, the same as to any other mortgagee.

Mr. WILSON: How much are those tenants getting as a reduction in rent by this?

Mr. HOGAN: A little more than the difference between the 7 per cent. and the $4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., in view of the fact that we are paying off one-eleventh of the purchase money.

Mr. ROONEY: I am not opposed to this. I am very glad, for the sake of the tenants and for the National Land Bank, that this amendment has been introduced, but there are other tenants in the country similarly situated to the tenants affected here. What I want to know is, will these tenants be in the same position to get relief from their heavy financial responsibilities as the tenants under this Clause?

Mr. HOGAN: These Sections only deal with societies, and I am sure the Deputy has in mind a case where a number of landless men bought untenanted land one or two years ago and divided it up. They are now the owners in fee simple, each of a little bit, but owing a lot of money to the Bank.

Mr. ROONEY: They are collectively and individually responsible the same as the societies.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Is there not a difference between the case the Deputy has in mind and the National Land Bank namely, that the other banks did not advance the whole of the money, or anything like it?

Mr. ROONEY: They advanced on the same terms.

Mr. JOHNSON: Another point suggests itself. I do not know what the terms of the deposits may have been, but it occurs to me that some difficulty may arise between the societies and the banks. When this Bill is passed all the societies will be looking for immediate attention. The last clause says that when the Bank shall have satisfied the Land Commission that they have repaid to the society or body of trustees such deposit of £100,000, whether the deposit receipts are redeemable, and whether the money can be demanded at any time, or about the same time, may cause difficulty. I wonder has that point been considered.

Mr. HOGAN: That is a thing we could not inquire into really. The money is there on deposit receipt, and the tenants are entitled to it, and it is provided here that they shall get back that deposit if they so demand it. These sections were prepared in consultation with the National Land Bank.

Question put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE:—I beg to move:—
To insert before Section 40 a new Section as follows:—

Subject to the provisions hereinafter contained, each Society or body of Trustees, which on the appointed day was in occupation of lands so purchased and vested in the Land Commission under the provisions of this part of this Act, shall be deemed, on the appointed day, to have entered into a subsequent purchase agreement with the Land Commission for the purchase of the lands from them, at a price equivalent to ten-elevenths of the price fixed under the provisions of the foregoing section.

There shall be payable by the Society or body of Trustees to the Land Commission an annual sum, calculated at the rate of 4½ per cent. upon the sum for which the Society or body of Trustees is deemed to have agreed to purchase the lands, from the appointed day until the gale day next after the vesting of the lands in the Society or body of Trustees, or until the ceaser and determination of the interest of the Society or body of Trustees in the lands.

The Land Commission shall have for the recovery of such annual sum the same remedies as they have for the recovery of unpaid instalments of Purchase Annuity.

There shall be payable by the Society or body of Trustees to the Land Commission, on the gale day on which the first instalment of the said annual sum shall become payable by them, an additional sum, equivalent to a proportion of the said annual sum, in respect of the period between the said gale day and the day on which the next dividends are payable on Land Bonds issued under this Act. The Land Commission shall have for the recovery of such additional sum the same remedies as they have for the recovery of unpaid instalments of purchase annuity.

All payments made by a Society or body of Trustees after the appointed day on foot of the annual sum payable to the Land Commission under this Section shall, from and after the vesting of the parcel in them be treated for all purposes as if they had been payments in respect of Purchase Annuity.

Mr. ROONEY: I think some provision should be made for the tenants affected by other Banks. Would it not be essential to these tenants, while this Bill is going through the Dáil, that they should be put in an equivalent position to those who are responsible to the Land Bank? I would like to have some provision made in the Bill, as I think otherwise it would be a great injustice on men who purchased on the same terms, simply because they had not purchased through the Land Bank.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

You can ask a question of the Minister but you cannot make a speech. There is no amendment on the paper dealing with these tenants.

Mr. ROONEY: I am asking the Minister to put in an amendment later on to meet the point I have raised.

Mr. HOGAN: They are actually provided for already in the Bill. Most of these cases will vest as untenanted land in the Land Commission in the congested districts. The land will be re-sold to the owners. At present we are dealing with special sections referring to the Land Bank.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Is it not in the competence of any Deputy dealing with an amendment to complain that the amendment has a less extended range than he considers it justifiably should have?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The Deputy can ask a question but he cannot raise a discussion.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE:—I beg to move:—
To insert before Section 40 a new Section as follows:—

(1) After the appointed day, where the Land Commission are satisfied that lands so purchased and vested in the Land Commission have been properly managed, after the methods of good husbandry, and that the Society or body of Trustees is properly constituted under the rules governing such Societies, or the Deed of Trust appointing such Trustees and approved by the Land Commission, and has conducted its affairs according to such rules or such deed, and has not done or suffered any act, by reason of which the Society is liable to be wound up or dissolved or the body of Trustees is liable to be declared bankrupt or insolvent, the lands shall be vested in the Society or body of Trustees by means of a Vesting Order or otherwise.

(2) Where the Land Commission are not satisfied that the foregoing conditions have been fulfilled, and so declare in the prescribed manner, then the interest of the Society or body of Trustees in the land shall absolutely cease and determine, and the lands shall be retained by the Land Commission, as if they had been untenanted lands vested in the Land Commission under the provisions of Part II. of this Act.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE:—I beg to move:—
To insert before Section 40 a new Section as follows:—

The provisions contained in Part I. of this Act as to the costs fund shall not apply to proceedings under this Part of this Act.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move "that the new Sections stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Section 40 put, and agreed to.

Section 41:—

(1) Where the registration of the ownership of land, the registration of which is compulsory under the Act of 1891, has not been effected, the Land Commission or the Commissioners of Public Works in Ireland may furnish to the Registrar of Titles the prescribed particulars respecting that land and the name of the person appearing to them to be in possession thereof, and the registering authority shall thereupon register that person as the owner of that land with a possessory or qualified title.

(2) The first registration of any person as full or limited owner with a possessory title shall have the same effect as the first registration of a person as full or limited owner under the Act of 1891, save that registration with a possessory title shall not affect or prejudice the enforcement of any estate, right or interest adverse to or in derogation of the title of the first registered owner or subsisting or capable of arising at the time of such first registration.

(3) The first registration of any person as full or limited owner with a qualified title shall have the same effect as the first registration of a person as full or limited owner under the Act of 1891, save that registration with a qualified title shall not affect or prejudice the enforcement of any estate, right, or title appearing by the register to be exempted from the effect of registration.

(4) A person registered as owner with a possessory or qualified title as aforesaid may at any time, in the prescribed manner, apply for registration with an absolute title, and all such steps may be taken in regard to such application as may be taken in proceedings for the discharge of equities under the Act of 1891. If it is found on the examination of any such application that the applicant can be registered with a qualified title only, registration may be so effected.

The registration of an absolute title shall have the same effect as the registration of a person as full or limited owner under the Act of 1891.

(5) Rules under the Act of 1891 may be made for carrying into effect the object of this section and the expression "prescribed" in this section means prescribed by such rules. Office fees shall not be payable for the first registration of any title under this section.

(6) The power of the Court or the Land Commission under Sub-section (2) of Section 34 of the Act of 1891, and Sub-section (3) of Section two of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, to correct errors in the registration of land, and to rectify the register and vesting order or fiat if in their opinion the error can be corrected without injury to any person, shall include power to make such correction and rectification notwithstanding that some person is thereby injured, upon such terms and conditions as appear to the Court or the Land Commission to be equitable, including, if necessary, compensation for such injury.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move:—To delete Sub-section (4) and to substitute in lieu thereof the following Sub-section:—

"The registered owner and such other persons as may be prescribed, may at any time apply to the registering authority to ascertain the full title to the lands, and to enter on the register the burdens thereon and the rights and interest therein, which have not been affected or prejudiced by the registration of the ownership, with a possessory or qualified title, and the registering authority shall thereupon ascertain and enter on the register such burdens, rights and interests, and shall cancel on the register the registration, with qualified or possessory title, and thereupon the registration shall have the same effect as registration of a full or limited owner under the Act of 1891.

"If it is found on the examination of any application that registration with a qualified title only can be effected, registration with such title may be made."

It is really a matter of altering the wording. The Sub-section provides for the discharge of equities in cases where the holding is vested and registered subject to equities, which is the ordinary procedure applied to purchased land. I am sure a great many Deputies know what the discharge of equities means and that it is unnecessary to explain it.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Motion made and question put "That Section 41, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Sections 42, 43 and 44 put, and agreed to.

SECTION 45.

Notwithstanding any provisions to the contrary in the Land Purchase Acts, the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Acts, or the Act of 1891, contained, the Land Commission may resell any lands vested in them under the Land Purchase Acts, or as successor to the Congested Districts Board for Ireland, before they have been registered as owners thereof under the Act of 1891.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move:—To delete the words "before they have been," lines 28 and 29, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "without being." This is merely a verbal alteration.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Motion made and question put, "That Section 45, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 46.

(1) A Vesting Order or Fiat shall not be void by reason of the death, before the execution thereof, of the person in whom the lands comprised therein are purported to be vested, but shall be effectual to vest, and shall be deemed always to have vested, the said lands in the personal representative (when raised) of the said person, to such uses and upon such trusts as the lands would have stood limited to had they been vested in the said person immediately prior to his death.

(2) Where the applicant for first registration of lands, the registration of which is compulsory under the Act of 1891, dies before the completion of such registration, and the said lands are subsequently registered in the name of such deceased applicant, the registration shall not be void by reason of the death of the applicant, but shall be and shall be deemed always to have been a valid registration of the lands in the personal representative (when raised) of the deceased applicant subject to such uses and trusts as affect the estate and interest of a personal representative.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move:—To delete the words "the said," lines 34 and 36, and to substitute therefor the word "such," and to delete the word "to," line 36.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move:—After the word "applicant," line 45, to delete all the words to the end of the Sub-section, and to substitute therefor the words "to such uses and upon such trusts as the lands would have stood limited had such person been registered as owner immediately prior to his death.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Motion made and question put, "That Section 46, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Section 47 put, and agreed to.

SECTION 48.

(1) Where the Land Commission have after the date of the passing of this Act made any advance for the purchase of a holding or parcel, the proprietor thereof shall not sub-divide or let the holding or parcel without the consent of the Land Commission, and every attempted sub-division or letting in contravention of this provision shall be void as against all persons, and on any such contravention the holding or parcel shall at the option of the Land Commission vest in them.

(2) In the case of any holding which is subject to any charges in respect of an annuity in favour of the Board of Works created in pursuance of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1870, so much of the 44th and 45th Sections of the said Act as prohibits, without the consent of the Board, the alienation, assignment, sub-division or sub-letting of a holding charged as in the said sections mentioned and declares that, in the event of such prohibition being contravened, the holdings shall be forfeited to the Board, and also as much of Section 2 of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act, 1872, as relates to the sale of holdings in lieu of forfeiture, shall be repealed and the prohibitions contained in Sub-section (1) of this section against sub-division and letting shall henceforth apply to all such holdings as if they had been contained in the said Acts of 1870 and 1872, but only during such time as any part of the annuity charged on such holding remains unpaid.

Mr. NAGLE: I move:—In Sub-Section (1), lines 9 and 10, to delete all from the word “and” to the word “contravention” inclusive, and to substitute therefor the words “and the proprietor shall be bound to cultivate the holding or parcel in accordance with proper methods of husbandry, to the satisfaction of the Land Commission; and on any failure to comply with the requirements of this Sub-section.”

Mr. JOHNSON: The object of this amendment is to have inserted these provisions which we brought on before, giving the Land Commission certain supervision over the conduct of the holding. There is certain supervision provided for in the Section, which states that there shall be no sub-division or letting. The amendment tries to secure also that there shall be not merely negative action but positive action, and that there shall be proper cultivation. I hope the Minister will see his way to accept the amendment.

Mr. HOGAN: This is practically the same as we had in amendment 62. We have agreed to a substituted amendment, and I need not now go into the question that was then raised. The Deputy, I think, knows that I have gone as far as I possibly could.

Amendment put, and declared lost.

Motion made and question put: “That Section 48 stand part of the Bill.”

Agreed.

Sections 49, 50 and 51 put, and agreed to.

SECTION 52.

(1) The provisions of Sections 4 and 20 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, and of Section 18 of the Irish Land Act, 1909, shall be extended so as to include tillage as one of the purposes for which advances may be made under those sections and it shall be lawful for the Minister for Agriculture to amend and frame schemes so as to include this purpose.

(2) So much of Section 20 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, as requires provisions for appeals to the Lord Lieutenant to be inserted in any such scheme and so much of any scheme as provided for such appeals shall cease to have effect, and the other powers declared in the said sections to be exercisable by the Lord Lieutenant and the Department of Agriculture shall be exercised by the Minister for Agriculture in the case of all existing schemes as well as in the case of future advances and schemes.

(3) Any person aggrieved by any act or omission of any trustees in carrying into effect a scheme for the user of land framed or approved under Section 20 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, may take proceedings in the County Court by way of equity civil bill for the execution of the trusts of the scheme, and the jurisdiction of the County Court shall extend to any such proceedings notwithstanding that the land subject to the trusts exceeds thirty pounds in annual value.

(4) It shall be lawful for an Urban District Council to purchase any parcel of land under Section 4 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, for any of the purposes mentioned in that section as extended by Sub-section (1) of this section, save for the purposes of the Labourers (Ireland) Acts, 1883 to 1896, and any such Council may act as trustees for those purposes and may obtain advances for the purchase and the provisions of Section 18 of the Irish Land Act, 1909, shall apply to any such purchase as if Urban Councils were mentioned in that section.

The amounts required for payment of the instalments of the purchase annuity for lands purchased by an Urban Council under this section shall be defrayed out of the poor-rate.

Amendment by Mr. Burke:—

“To add after the word ‘Council,’ Sub-section (4), page 20, lines 17 and 21, the words ‘or Town Commissioners,’ and to add after the word ‘Councils,’ line 25, the words ‘and Town Commissioners,’ and to add after the words ‘Poor Rate,’ line 28, the words ‘and for lands purchased by Town Commissioners under this Section out of the Town Rate.’”

Mr. DUGGAN: In the absence of Deputy Burke I beg to move this amendment.

An Ceann Comhairle resumed the chair at this stage.

Amendment 87 by Messrs. R. CORISH, R. DAY, and W. DAVIN:—

“In Sub-section (4), page 20, line 17, to delete the words ‘Urban District Council,’ and to substitute therefor the words ‘County Borough Council, Urban District Council, or Town Commissioners,’ and in line 21, after the word ‘Council,’ to insert the words ‘Town Commissioners.’”

Mr. HOGAN: These two amendments are practically the same. My suggestion is that “Town Commissioners” be added to the first.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment which it is proposed to add to 86 is “In Sub-section (4) of Section 52, after the word ‘for’ to insert ‘A County Borough Council or’ and in line 27, after the word ‘purchased by,’ to insert the words ‘a County Borough Council or.’”

Mr. JOHNSON: Might I suggest that there should be included in line 17 the words, “Town Commissioners”

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is in 86 already. This is to add to 86.

Mr. JOHNSON: I suggest that the shortest way out of this would be that Amendment 86 should be accepted and that in leaving 87 the Minister will agree to include the purpose of this in the next reading.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think that would be simpler. The Minister accepts the substance of that?

Mr. HOGAN: Yes.

Amendment 86 agreed to.

Amendment 87, by leave, withdrawn

Motion made and question put: “That Section 52, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

Agreed.

SECTION 53.

For the purposes of this Act the appointed day shall be such day or days as may be fixed by the Land Commission and different days may be fixed for different provisions and different purposes of this Act and for different holdings or groups of holdings and different parcels or groups of parcels of untenanted land.

Amendment by Mr. GOREY:—“To add after the word ‘Commission,’ the words: ‘not more than one year from the date of the passing of this Act.’”

Mr. GOREY: This amendment is put up to make more definite the date of the appointed day. Its object is to make it as soon as possible.

Mr. HOGAN: We cannot fix the appointed day. There are many reasons why the appointed day should be fixed from the point of view of giving people an idea of when they can be sure they own their land. If we were to put down a date at all we should have to say about five years, and put in a provision leaving some authority to the Minister for Agriculture, or somebody, to extend the appointed day, because, as long as the operations of this Act continue—and I daresay they will continue for a great many years—it will be necessary to name an appointed day. We have deliberately left that vague. We hope to have an appointed day, as I explained, for some estates, immediately, and for other estates later, and to have an appointed day in fact as soon as we can get a few simple particulars that we require. We want to know the name and address of the tenant and the name and address of the landlord, and to know whether they are judicial tenants or non-judicial tenants, or first, second, or third term, and whether there is a sub-tenancy on the holding, and so on. I should say there would be an appointed day for some tenants in about a year, and the appointed day for all of the tenants would not come, I should say, before two years from the passing of the Act, and for some tenants perhaps longer. For the great majority of them, the appointed day will be about a year and a half. As to untenanted land, we might be able to buy some within two years. We certainly will not have all the untenanted land we require by within five or six or seven years hence. The Land Commission would have to be in a position to fix an appointed day whenever it suits them. If we are able to put all the tenants in the same position as if their holdings were vested within two years, our procedure will be at least five times as expeditious as the procedure under previous Acts. As a rule it took about ten years from the time negotiations started until the holding was actually vested in the tenants—hardly ten years, seven or eight years.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. GOREY: Under what Act?

Mr. HOGAN: Under the 1903 Act. Here we propose within two years to put the tenant in the same position as if the holding was vested in him. In regard to untenanted land I should say the appointed day will be in about two years time. It is clear enough that we cannot name an appointed day for a definite period for all the tenants.

Motion made to report progress.

THE DAIL RESUMES.

Progress reported. The Committee ordered to sit again on Monday, July 9th.

THE ADJOURNMENT—BALLYHAISE STRIKE.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move that the Dáil do now adjourn.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Mar a thug me fógra air roimh-ra is mian liom iarraidh ar an Dáil aire a thabhairt ar an stad oibre san colaisde talamhuíochta i gCoir Chabháin. Tá dha cheart ann.

An chead cheist oca: laghdú ar thuarasdail na bhfear oibre san colaisde agus an dora cheist nach bhfuair Cumann na bhfear san aon fhógra ar an laghdú paighe sin ón Aireacht.

There are two questions involved in this strike of the agricultural labourers employed by the Minister for Agriculture in the Agricultural Station at Ballyhaise. First, there is the question of the reduction of wages on these men, and, second, there is the relationship between the Department and the Union to which these men belong. I am informed that under the direction of the Ministry of Finance it was decided about the 17th June that a reduction should be made in the case of these workmen. As regards some of the men, this reduction is as high as 10s. a week. No doubt it is divided into two cuts, one of 5s. last month and one of 5s. to come into operation a little later. That is a very heavy reduction indeed. The other question, and I think it is as important in a way as the question of the actual wages reduction, is the relationship between the Department and the Union to which the men belong.

No intimation was given to the Union by the Department concerned as to the coming reduction. Even when the Union got into touch with the Department as a result of the reduction, and a strike had taken place, the Union suggested that there should be a conference, but no acceptance of the offer to hold a conference has been given by the Department. The wages of most of the men are being reduced to 30s. per week, plus time and a half for overtime. They work a 54-hour week. In some cases the reductions are more. There is the rather significant point that notice was actually given in Ballyhaise by, I think, the Department that in the event of a strike taking place notification was to be given by the College immediately to the nearest Civic Guard Station. Now, it happens, I think, that the relations between the men and the authorities there have been ordinarily good. I do not think that any one who knows the County Cavan people will think there was a real likelihood of trouble. This was an ordinary industrial dispute, but the Department wanted apparently to be very much upon the safe side, and therefore they were looking out for the Civic Guard.

The ordinary course, even under the British regime, has been that when an increase is demanded, or a reduction threatened, the Department concerned has no hesitation at all in getting into touch with the Union to which the workers belonged, and making an attempt at first to arrive at something like an amicable settlement. No such attempt was made in this case. The cut was enforced, and on the 21st June the Union wrote to the Department, and in the course of their letter protested against the cut, and suggested a conference. The letter was replied to, but there was no reason given why there had been no negotiations with the men or the Union prior to the cut, and there was no acceptance of the suggestion for a conference. Later on the suggestion of a conference was renewed on the part of the Union, but no response has been made to that letter. I do not say that the Minister for Agriculture is altogether to blame, though he is responsible for the Department. It appears that between the Ministry of Finance and the Ministry of Agriculture there is an Inter-Departmental Committee, whose activities, I think, the Dáil would do well to be watchful of. This Committee, I understand, ordered this reduction, and it looks as if the Executive Council is setting up, without informing us here much about it, what we might call "a docking committee." No doubt economy is very necessary, but if it is necessary it should be done in a way that would produce the least friction. Certainly the activity of this Committee, in this particular instance, has produced friction, which has resulted in a strike. I may add that there is some sign that the Workers-Farmers Alliance is going nearly as strong up there as it is here, but that is by the way. The Department claims that there had been reductions in the price of labour in the district. My information is that there has not been such a reduction. As a matter of fact, there is not a great deal of employment locally, and the only place that would compare in numbers in the locality with this station is the creamery there. Now the wages in the creamery are 40s., I think, for a much shorter week and less number of hours—52 hours as a matter of fact, against 54 hours. The position, I think, wants some further explanation by the Ministry than that vouchsafed by the Department to the Union, and I ask the Minister to give us that explanation. I would press him to give an explanation as to why there was no attempt at negotiation between these men or their Union before the reduction took place; why was there no conference, and no acceptance of the offer of a conference since; and I should like to ask him whether it is the determined policy of the Department, that in a case like this action should be taken without any attempt being made to fix up the matter peaceably and quietly before any such action is taken.

Mr. HOGAN: I must confess, at the outset, that I do not know as much about this as perhaps I ought to know. I do know this, that these matters are fixed in this country as in other countries, by the Treasury, with the assistance of an Inter-Departmental Committee. That is not peculiar to this country, that wages and conditions applying to men of this sort should be regulated by the Ministry of Finance with the advice and assistance of an Inter-Departmental Committee. That is what is done here and in every other country. There is nothing hastily done. All the circumstances of the case were inquired into. The maximum wages for similar work in the neighbourhood were ascertained, and the wages offered by the Treasury, on the advice of that Committee, are the maximum wages for that class of work in the district. There was one case quoted by the Deputy, that of Ballyhaise creamery. The work in a creamery is totally different from agricultural work on a farm. My information is that the wages offered here are equal to the maximum wages accepted by other men in the Union in the same neighbourhood for the same class of work; and I think I am standing on a very sound principle when I say that a Government Department like this, employing labour, is doing as much as it would be entitled to do when it pays the maximum wages for the same class of work in that district.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: And the same hours?

Mr. HOGAN: That is my information.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Are they fixed hours?

Mr. HOGAN: My information is that these employees are being paid the maximum rate of wages paid to men doing a similar class of work in the neighbourhood. If that is so, we are on firm ground. I understand that the Deputy's real complaint is that the Union was not consulted beforehand. I am ready to listen to any representations that may be made to me, and I would like to hear their case. It is hardly fair to expect me to express an opinion on a question like this offhand across the Dáil. If the Union puts the case in writing, I will bring it before the Departmental Committee, and will undertake to discuss it with the Committee and go into the question fully. At present I cannot say any more on that particular question.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. JOHNSON: That matter has not been dealt with very satisfactorily: the matter which the Minister says is the chief point in the complaint of Deputy O'Shannon, which is that the Ministry simply takes up the position that after a certain date the men get notice that their wages shall be so-and-so, and accompanying that notice is the intimation that the Civic Guard must be on the look out. That surely is not the kind of relationship there should be between an employer and employee, especially when the employer is a Government Department. After all, the men have the right to be able to confer; it is a reasonable request at least that there should be some conference to discuss the matter of a contract. The method that has been adopted towards the men is that, on and after a certain date, "you shall be paid so-and-so," as if there was no other party to this agreement, and as if the expected response is to be a strike, because there is a notification immediately after the men have been told that their wages are to be so-and-so, that the Civic Guard are to be in attendance. That is not calculated to produce harmony or good service in the future. It is rather shallow and shortsighted, and I hope the Minister will take notice of that part of the complaint as well as the other, and attempt to change the attitude of mind, shall I say, between the Ministry, as an employer, and the workers as servants. Surely nobody is going to plead that in this day an employer has nothing to say to an employee except "your wages henceforth are reduced by 10s.," and leave it at that.

Mr. HOGAN: That is what I was referring to when I said that I understood

Deputy O'Shannon's chief complaint was that the Union had not been consulted beforehand. As I have already stated, if the Union puts the case in writing before me, I will undertake to discuss it with the Inter-Departmental Committee, and I will give the Union at least a considered view on that point at the first opportunity.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I am sure the Minister has the file of correspondence that passed between the Department and the Union in reference to this case, and if he has that correspondence he knows that a suggestion was made by the Union on two separate occasions, on the 21st June and on the 3rd July, for a conference between the Department and the Union. There was no response to that particular suggestion, and there was no consultation either with the men concerned or with the Union before the cut took place.

Mr. HOGAN: I do not think I have anything more to say on that point. What was done by this Committee is the normal procedure. It was not until after the notice had been served that I had any reason to think that the men or the Union thought the procedure rather summary. As I say, the Department is open to receive any representations that the Union wishes to make in writing, and I am prepared to discuss the question with the Inter-Departmental Committee and let the Union know what our definite policy is on this matter. I could not state our definite policy at the moment.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: You say written representations?

Mr. HOGAN: Yes.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: What about verbal representations in the shape of a conference in the ordinary way?

Mr. HOGAN: We would consider that question on getting the written representations first.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: And let the strike go on?

Mr. HOGAN: The sooner the written representations are made the sooner it will be brought to a head.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is rather a pity to hear the Minister say that this is the normal procedure.

The Dáil adjourned at 4.20 p.m. until 3 o'clock on Monday, 9th July.

DÁIL EIREANN.

DE LUAIN, 9ADH IUIL, 1923.

(Monday, 9th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar a 3.10 p.m. Bhí an Ceann Comhairle, Micheál O hAodha, 'sa Chathaoir.

PUBLIC SAFETY (EMERGENCY POWERS) BILL, 1923.

THIRD STAGE—POSTPONED.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before the Dáil goes into Committee, may I raise a question at this stage with regard to the Orders of the Day, which have been put into our hands. I think that now is the right time to raise a matter that I have in mind with regard to item 2 on the Orders of the Day. On last Saturday afternoon in common with other members I received these Orders of the Day. No. 2 on these Orders is entitled "The Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Bill, 1923—Committee." The actual amendments have only been received by me just now. I understand the difficulties that there are in this matter, but it does seem to me not in the public interest, and not proper to efficiency, that we should be asked to consider these amendments within a matter of ten minutes or half an hour of receiving them.

You will recall that when this question of amendments was under discussion at the Dáil before, it was desired that amendments should be in our hands well in advance of the time when they were to be considered. It was agreed that amendments should be handed in to you, at a certain time before consideration by the Dáil, in order that Deputies should have them in their hands for consideration. Obviously, the slightest glance at these amendments shows that they require a very great deal of careful consideration, to reveal exactly their bearing on the Bill of which they purport to be improvements and amendments. I suggest that it is not right that we should be asked to consider amendments to a Bill of such importance without consent, until they have at least been in our hands one or two days in advance of their being heard and considered in this Dáil. I urge, seeing that these amendments have only just come into our hands within the last ten minutes, in my own case at least, that the Bill to which they are amendments should not be considered to-day, but that it should be postponed in order that we should have time to give that efficient attention to these amendments that obviously they require.

We are dealing with legislation here in very great haste. It might even be said that we have legislation churned through this Dáil. Let us at least give no further or greater colour to that allegation than is necessary, and also let us see that Bills of this major importance should have the fullest consideration, and that all amendments should be fully considered. Because if we take them up in a half an hour from now they cannot receive that previous attention that the amendments should receive:

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: What question is the Deputy putting to me?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I am suggesting that inasmuch as these amendments have only come into our hands the Committee Stage of the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Bill should not be considered until Wednesday in order that we may have an opportunity of more fully considering the amendments.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I desire to draw your attention to No. 13 of the Standing Orders, which provides in terms that the Agenda shall be posted to the Dublin address of each Deputy so as to arrive not later than the first post on the morning of the day for which the Agenda is issued, and that it shall contain the text of all questions to be asked of Ministers and all motions to be proposed in the Dáil, or in the Dáil sitting in Committee.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This Bill, The Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Bill, 1923, was read a second time on Monday last. When the Second Reading had been passed, an order was made that the Bill should be considered in Committee of the whole Dáil on the first day of this week upon which the Dáil would be sitting. In pursuance of that Order made by the Dáil the Bill is now up for consideration.

With regard to the disadvantages

[AN CEANN COMHAIRLE.]

under which Deputies labour from not having had the amendments put into their hands less than an hour before the Sitting of the Dáil, the facts are these:—I received amendments until Friday, and I received a very large number of amendments. I had them printed as quickly as possible. Deputies now have the amendments in their hands at the earliest moment at which we could give them to them. It is a great disadvantage to make an Order which necessitates taking a Bill without having proper time to consider the amendments. I, personally, do not approve of that practice, because, speaking for myself, I have not had time to give the consideration to these amendments which, if I may say so, I suspect some of them merit. From that point of view I deprecate the taking of the Bill at such a short notice. The Deputies have received the amendments as fast as they could possibly have been got out. The original mistake was the fixing of the Committee Stage for such an early date as to-day. In the circumstances there is nothing which I could say or do, or which I could instruct my staff to do which would give a better result than has been obtained.

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS: In raising this matter it was not my intention to imply any criticism whatever of you or your staff.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I quite agree.

MR. DARRELL FIGGIS: That would have been, and was, very far from my intention. My intention was directed rather to a practical point. While recognising that you and your staff have done all that could have been reasonably expected in the service of this Dáil, I say that, nevertheless, this situation having arisen on these amendments of such grave importance to the Bill, which is of itself of such grave importance, we ought not proceed with the Committee Stage to-day, and that we should not proceed with these amendments until we have had them in our hands for at least forty-eight hours, for careful consideration and comparison with the Bill.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think the position is we cannot consider the amendments in Committee to-day unless we can get general agreement to take them, in the circumstances. That is my view.

MR. JOHNSON: May I suggest that the explanation is quite simple. There was no date specified when the Dáil decided to take the Committee Stage on the first day of the sitting this week. It was not known then what day that first day would be. Some weeks we start on Wednesday, and in other weeks we commence business on Tuesday. This week and last week we started on Monday. We had no reason to think that we would start this week on Monday; it might have been either Tuesday or Wednesday for all we knew. The fact that it happened to be Monday, at the desire of the Leader of the Dáil, makes the difficulty of considering amendments so great that the suggestion for postponing consideration at least for a day seems to be a reasonable one.

MR. FITZGIBBON: I do not think the Minister who arranged the Committee Stage of this Bill for to-day is to blame any more than the officers of the Dáil who were unable to get the amendments out in time. It seems to me if there is fault at all it is in the Standing Orders, which enables amendments to be handed in up to an hour at which it makes it impossible for them to be printed, and in the hands of Deputies by the time the Bill comes under consideration. It is open to anybody to hand in a sheaf of amendments up to 11 o'clock on Friday morning, and I think you, a Chinn Chomhairle, out of courtesy to Deputies, did accept some after that hour. At any rate, it is open to Deputies to hand in amendments up to 11 o'clock on Friday morning for a Bill to be considered in Committee on Monday. It is physically impossible to get those amendments set up and printed, have proofs corrected, and have the amendments sent out to Deputies so that they shall have them in their hands on Monday morning. There is no post on Sunday, and it would be absolutely impossible to get amendments properly drafted and handed in due course to Deputies within the time prescribed by the Standing Orders. If there is anybody at fault it seems to me to be the whole body of the Dáil, which when it fixed Standing Orders did not contemplate the possibility of amendments being handed in so late.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. E. Blythe): It seems to me it would be better if there were general consent to consider these amendments, because I take it if the amendments are ruled out, and if we go on to the Committee Stage without considering the amendments, it would not serve any useful purpose. It also seems to me that most of the amendments are absolutely clear in their purpose and intent, and could all be well considered without further notice. If we are to convenience the Dáil it would be better have the amendments considered now than have them considered on the Report Stage, or on the Second Committee Stage.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The Minister speaks obviously and clearly as one who has read the amendments and knows what they contain. That is a great deal more fortunate for him than for the other members of the Dáil who have not considered them, or have not even read them. With regard to your ruling in the matter, I understand consent is required before these amendments can be considered to-day. If consent is to be unanimous, with the greatest reluctance in the world it will not be obtained, because I will object. I believe that we ought not to proceed with the Committee Stage of a Bill of such prime importance as this, until the amendments to it have been in the hands of Deputies, and under consideration for at least two days in advance.

Mr. HUGHES: Has the Deputy who lives in Dublin any consideration for the people who have been brought up long journeys from different parts of the country? I am sure he is just as capable as any Deputy of taking up those amendments and digesting them. I do not think it is treating the country Deputies fairly to be taking them up here and sending them away after half an hour or so. We would be losing a whole day if we do not take those amendments into consideration to-day. It is all very well for the Deputy who has only to cross the road, but country Deputies should be considered.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Deputy Hughes may be able to digest the amendments, and grasp what they mean within ten minutes or so, but there are many of us who cannot do that. It is not, perhaps, fair to ask Deputies from the country to attend here and do nothing, but there is other business on the Orders of the Day. Many of us who came from the country did not get those papers, although waiting purposely with a view to getting them. We did not get the amendments until we came into the Dáil. It is hardly possible in such a short time for one to digest the amendments and be able to arrive at a conclusion as to their meaning.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: In order to come to a decision I may point out that the position is that exception is taken by Deputies to having the Committee Stage of this Bill taken to-day, in view of the fact that Deputies have not had the amendments which it is proposed to move in Committee in their hands in time. Consent has not been obtained to take the Committee Stage to-day, and it seems to me, therefore, that it would be better if we agreed now to postpone the Committee Stage to a later date. The question is, what date?

Mr. BLYTHE: On a point of order, is not the position simply that the amendments are late but that the Committee Stage is in order?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: On the contrary, the position is that the amendments are in time, but that the Committee Stage is not in order as Deputies complain that they have not received the amendments. The amendments were received in time under Standing Orders, but the complaint is that it was not possible in the circumstances to circulate the amendments in time to the Deputies. That is the position. I think that is exactly what the Deputies complain of.

Mr. HUGHES: Do I understand that it is quite in order for Deputies to get any amendment, no matter how contentious it is, by the first post on the particular day on which that amendment is coming forward? Is not that according to Standing Orders?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Standing Order is:

"The Agenda for each day shall be posted to the Dublin address of each Teachta so as to arrive not later than the first post on the morning of that day. It shall contain the text of all Questions to be asked of Ministers and of all motions to be proposed (save such as these Standing Orders elsewhere allow to be proposed without notice). It shall also contain the text of all amendments, whether to motions or Bills, intended to be proposed in the Dáil or in the Dáil sitting in Committee."

[An Ceann Comhairle.]

Mr. HUGHES: I take it that this Agenda is four hours late and that that is the whole complaint?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Precisely.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The gist of the complaint is that we received these amendments as we walked into the Dáil and that there was no time to consider them. I do not know whether Deputy Hughes believes that a measure of this importance should be dealt with in that cursory and summary fashion. I do not.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That means that we shall take the Land Bill now and not take No. 2 on the Order Paper until to-morrow. Is that agreed?

Agreed.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: Would it not be necessary to move formally to discharge the Order for the Committee Stage of this Bill to-day? If the motion was moved and carried by agreement some days ago I think that to keep the Journal in order there ought to be a formal motion to discharge the Order for the Committee Stage to-day and to substitute to-morrow.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We can do that when we come to it.

ARREST OF FIREMEN AND GREASERS.

Mr. JOHNSON: I wish to give notice of raising a question on the adjournment, in case the Minister for Defence is not here in the meantime, touching the treatment of certain firemen and greasers on the Patrol Ship T.R. 27, at Killybegs, who have been arrested and who are alleged to have been treated inhumanly. If I saw the Minister for Defence beforehand it might not be necessary to raise the question on the adjournment, but in case he is not here I propose to deal with the matter on the adjournment.

[DAIL IN COMMITTEE.]

LAND BILL, 1923.

(THIRD STAGE RESUMED.)

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 88 to Section 53 had been moved by Deputy Gorey when the Committee reported progress. It is still under discussion.

MINISTER FOR AGRICULTURE, (Mr. Hogan): My recollection is that the discussion on that was completed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It was not.

Mr. HOGAN: It was not formally completed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It was not formally completed. Is Deputy Gorey withdrawing the amendment?

Mr. GOREY: I think the Minister replied to that.

Mr. HOGAN: I think the position is, as I said, that the discussion was not formally completed, but we had discussed the matter from every point of view.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: In order formally to complete it, shall I put the amendment, or is it being withdrawn?

Mr. GOREY: I think the amendment was withdrawn.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No, it was not. Is it being withdrawn now?

Mr. GOREY: What was the assurance that the Minister gave?

Mr. HOGAN: This was the position: We had discussed the amendment fully. The discussion lapsed, and I moved to report progress. I had taken it for granted that the amendment would be withdrawn. We had fully discussed it. Discussion lapsed, and I moved to report progress.

Mr. GOREY: I think that was the position.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is the amendment being withdrawn now?

Mr. GOREY: I really forget the assurance I got from the Minister; that is the trouble.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then you can have it again.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to withdraw the amendment. I think the explanation was satisfactory.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question: "That Section 53 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 54.

(1) In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the expression "subsequent purchase agreements" means agreements entered into or deemed to have been entered into by or with the Land Commission on or after the date of the passing of this Act

Provided that purchase agreements entered into at any time on the re-sale by the Land Commission of land purchased or agreed to be purchased, by the Irish Land Commission or the Congested Districts Board for Ireland, before the date of the passing of this Act, shall be treated as purchase agreements entered into before the date of the passing of this Act and not as subsequent purchase agreements.

(2) The expression "tenanted land" means land held under any contract of tenancy other than a fee farm grant, or lease for lives or years renewable for ever or lease for a term of years of which sixty or more are unexpired, and the expression "untenanted land" shall be construed accordingly

Provided that where land has become tenanted land as above defined by reason of a contract of tenancy entered into on or after the first day of September nineteen hundred and twenty-two, then

(a) if the holding is in a congested districts county, the tenancy shall, if the Land Commission before the appointed day so declare, be deemed void as against the Land Commission and the holding shall vest in the Land Commission as untenanted land; and

(b) if the holding is situate elsewhere, the land shall be treated as tenanted land for the purpose of the provisions of this Act vesting tenanted land in the Land Commission, save as to the price thereof, but shall not be sold under this Act to the tenant unless the Land Commission certify that the creation of the tenancy was in the interests of the country. If the Land Commission so certify the price shall be ascertained as the land was tenanted land, but if the Land Commission do not so certify the price shall be ascertained as if the land was untenanted land.

(3) The expression "the Land Purchase Acts" shall have the same meaning as in the Irish Land Act, 1909, save that it shall, where the context so admits, include this Act, and the expression "the Land Law Acts" and "the Congested Districts Board (Ireland) Acts" shall have the same meaning as in the Irish Land Act, 1909.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move:—

To insert before Section 54 a new Section as follows:—

"After the passing of this Act, Sub-section (3) of Section 72 of the Irish Land Act, 1903, Sub-Section (1) of Section 29, and Sub-Section (3) of Section 30 of the Irish Land Act, 1909, in respect of improvements effected by the Congested Districts Board or the Land Commission, shall cease to have effect."

This amendment provides that certain Sub-Sections of the Land Acts of 1903 and 1909 shall cease to have effect. The Sub-Sections refer to certain applications to be made to the English National Debt Office. Of course these provisions are now obsolete.

Mr. HOGAN: I am accepting this amendment.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to move:—

In Sub-section (2) to delete all from the word "other," line 47, to the word "unexpired," line 49, inclusive.

The object of this amendment is to extend the benefits of the Bill to a class of tenancy not mentioned in it at all. Sub-section (2) reads: "The expression 'tenanted land' means land held under any contract of tenancy other than a fee-farm grant, or lease for lives or years renewable for ever or lease for a term of years of which sixty or more are unex-

[Mr. Gorey.]
 pired, and the expression ' untenanted land ' shall be construed accordingly."

The amendment brings in leascholders, those who hold under fee-farm grants, and those who hold for a long term of years. To my mind they should be brought in. They are a very important section of tenantry. They were never able to avail of the Land Acts, and had to bear a much higher rent than was current during the sittings of the Land Courts.

Mr. HOGAN: The purpose the Deputy has in mind is really to redeem fee-farm rents, and rents payable under long leases. Now, we do not want to alter the definition in that Sub-section. It is the definition in all the Land Acts in respect to this question. At the same time we are prepared to effect the purpose the Deputy has in mind in another way. I want to point out that as far as fee-farm rents, leases for lives, or long leases are concerned they are covered by Section 29 of the Bill, so far as these leases are in Congested Districts counties. That section says that where the owner of a parcel of untenanted land which is vested in the Land Commission by virtue of this Act uses and cultivates the same as an ordinary farm in accordance with proper methods of husbandry, then if the price of the land does not exceed £3,000 the land shall be re-sold to the owner. That is what it comes to. Remember this is untenanted land, fee simple, and will vest automatically in the Land Commission under the provisions of the Bill, provided that it is situate in a congested districts county. We are really dealing with landlords, and under the provisions of the Bill for automatic vesting which applies to the Congested Districts counties these lands will vest. If a man has 200 acres of land held under a fee-farm grant in Co. Galway, and is an ordinary farmer, the holding will vest automatically in the Land Commission as untenanted land. It is not a home farm. He farms it as an ordinary farm. It is not a demesne, and it does not come in under any of the exceptions. Hence it will vest automatically. We are providing that if the value of the holding does not exceed £3,000 it shall be re-sold so that his case is really covered. When the land vests the price is paid, the price remember, not of the fee farm interest, but of the fee simple. The head rent is redeemed, and when re-vested in him it is re-vested absolutely in fee-simple, subject to an annuity. The definition is important. The advance is to him for the purchase of this parcel of land and vests in him in fee simple. So far as fee farm rents and leases for lives are concerned in the congested districts counties we have such cases covered already. I am prepared in regard to fee farm grants in non-congested counties to put in an amendment something like the following, on the Report Stage.

" Where a parcel of untenanted land situate in a non-congested districts county is held under a fee farm grant, lease for lives or years, renewable for ever, or lease for a term of years of which 60 or more are unexpired at the date of the passing of this Act, and the proprietor of the parcel applies in the prescribed manner to the Land Commission for an advance for the purpose of redeeming the rent created or reserved by the fee farm grant or lease, the Judicial Commissioner shall, after hearing all persons concerned, order the redemption of the rent and all interests superior thereto, and fix the redemption price thereof. The redemption price so fixed, together with such costs as may be allowed by the Judicial Commissioner shall be advanced and paid by means of 4½ per cent. Land Bonds, and distributed by the Judicial Commissioner as if the redemption price of the rent were purchase money of land vested in the Land Commission under this Act, and the amount advanced shall be repayable by the proprietor of the parcel by means of an annuity calculated at the rate of 4½ per cent. on the amount of the advance and the parcel shall (if not already so vested), be vested in the proprietor in fee-simple."

In effect we, at the option of the occupier, redeem the rent. I propose to put in an amendment to that effect on the Report Stage, by recommitting the Bill when the Dáil will have an ample opportunity of discussing the whole question. The amendment will be before Deputies for the requisite time and they will be in a position to raise any points they wish. I should say that we will have to leave the Section as it stands. We are not treating these as tenancies, as it would be incorrect to do so. They have not been treated as tenancies under any other Land Act. We are meeting the purpose and achieving the same end by this amendment.

Mr. WILSON: Will the effect of this amendment be that a leaseholder who owes one or two years' rent will get a reduction on his rent although he is a landlord?

Mr. HOGAN: Certainly not.

Mr. DAVIN: In a case where a fee farm grant is payable jointly by a number, will the amendment now suggested by the Minister mean that one can buy, whereas the others need not? I mean to say, does it mean that all those involved in the joint payment must agree to buy under the terms of the amendment, or can one buy and the others remain out?

Mr. HOGAN: The fact that a fee farm grant is held jointly makes no difference. The only condition we make is that we shall not sell more than £3,000 worth. I brought this in relief of the land owning class. If we did not put in a limitation we would be dealing with half the landlords in Ireland, and they could get this relief. This is the same kind of land as we are purchasing for the relief of congestion. A very large percentage of the landlords hold their lands under fee farm grants. We are only dealing, perhaps, with a percentage of them who are really in the same condition as tenants; that is to say, they have small parcels of land, and they farm them as ordinary farmers. But the principle is the same. A very large percentage of the very much bigger landlords hold their lands under fee farm grants of this sort. We are redeeming the rent in every case, except where the value of the land is over £3,000. That is the only condition. With regard to Deputy Wilson's point, the answer is—"no." Of course, the provisions in the Bill dealing with a reduction in rent between this and the appointed day does not apply to such persons. None of the provisions of the Bill apply to such persons except insofar as they are land-owners. None of the provisions of the Bill as it stands at present apply to them except insofar as we are purchasing land from them for the purpose of distribution. We are merely inserting this amendment, and it is the first amendment which applies to them from any other point of view. We merely did so in order to put the small land-owners in the same position as if they were tenants of the same area of land. We are conferring a very big benefit on them by allowing them to retain their lands. Under the Act of 1903, and the Act of 1909, this land might be taken to be distributed. We are conferring a very big benefit on them by allowing them to redeem their rents. As a rule these rents are very much smaller than judicial rents. A small percentage may be bigger, but in the vast majority these are much smaller than the judicial rents.

Mr. GOREY: It is only in the case of a genuine tenant who is holding under a long lease that the Minister may have introduced this. I know that they are pretty extensively held by tenants all over the country as genuine tenancies, and the cases I know of are dearer than the judicial rents. Our object is to have these holdings treated as tenancies under this Bill. They are not getting the full benefits of the Bill. There were provisions in previous Land Acts excluding them. They were expressly put in for the purpose of excluding them, but that is no reason why we should do so. The Minister has told us that they will not benefit by a reduction on the current rents due. Am I to take it also that they will not benefit by the State contribution?

Mr. HOGAN: Certainly, they will not.

Mr. GOREY: That will bear very hardly in cases where there are genuine tenancies, leases for lives and for 999 years, and all that kind of thing. I think the Minister ought to reconsider this matter, because they are the cases of genuine hardship, cases of genuine agricultural tenancies which have come in under this form of lease, the same as other tenants came in under other forms of lease. They are genuine agricultural tenancies, and they are denied the benefits of previous Acts.

Mr. HOGAN: Let us see where we stand exactly. The Deputy's amendment is:—"In Sub-section (2) to delete all from the word 'other' to the word 'unexpired' inclusive." Sub-section (2) reads as follows:—"The expression tenanted land means land held under any contracts of tenancy other than a fee farm grant, or lease for lives or years renewable for ever or lease for a term of years of which 60 or more are unexpired, and the expression untenanted land shall be construed accordingly." Deputy Gorey's suggestion is to have the subsection to read as follows:—"The expression 'untenanted land' means land held under any contract of tenancy, and the expression 'untenanted land' shall be construed accordingly." I take it from his amendment that he means to deal with fee farm grants.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Mr. GOREY: Yes.

Mr. HOGAN: And he means to deal with leases for lives renewable for ever, and he means to deal with leases for the terms of which 60 or more years are unexpired. Well, fee farm grants are fee simple lands. Some of the biggest landowners in Ireland hold their lands under fee farm grants. There is no question about that.

A number of very large land owners hold their lands under leases of lives renewable for ever. Deputy Gorey is dealing exactly with the tenures of the land owners whom we are purchasing land from. I agree there is a big distinction; the distinction, however, is in the size of the land, and the manner in which it is worked, but remember he is dealing with exactly the same tenures as the land owners with whom we are dealing in the rest of the Bill, from whom we are taking land. That is the position. No other Bill did deal with them. We cannot regard them as agricultural tenants or tenants in the same sense as judicial tenants. If we regarded them as tenants we would have the extraordinary anomaly that a man would be at the same time both landlord and tenant, or rather he would be getting the provisions of the Bill as a landlord, and for the same land and the same tenure, he would be getting the provisions of the Bill as tenant. That is impossible, and it cannot be done. There is no way out of that. As the Bill stands at the moment, this land vests in the Congested Districts Counties. It vests in the Land Commission for the relief of congestion automatically as untenanted land. There is no question about that. This land under the provision of the Bill as it stands will vest in the Land Commission automatically as untenanted land for the relief of congestion. We are conferring a benefit on the class of cases we are considering here which they did not get under any other Act, and there is a considerable difference of opinion about allowing them to redeem their rents. It is quite common to have a fee farm rent of £20 on farms of four or five hundred acres. It is quite common to have 2s. an acre on leases for lives renewable for ever. The Deputy sees the thing only from his own point of view. He knows a few small lease holders, and he knows probably a few small fee farms grantees. He is looking at it from that point of view, and he wants to put in provisions in the Bill which would deal not only with these few small lease holders and these few small fee farm grantees, but with practically all the landlords in the country, making them landlords in one section and tenants in another. I do not say for a moment, even in the case of small lease holders, or small fee farm grantees, that there are not rents which are high. There may be a small percentage where the rents are high, but in the majority of cases they are much lower than judicial rents. The reason I inserted this provision, apart altogether from the necessity of making a clear distinction between the land owner and the owner of a fee simple farm, was that if we treated them in any other way it is probable that in fifty or sixty per cent. of cases the annuity they would be paying would be higher than the original rent. That would happen. If the Land Commission is to go down on the holding of a man of thirty or forty acres held under a fee farm rent the Land Commission would have to value it as a non-judicial tenancy if we accepted Deputy Gorey's suggestion, and they would have to value it on the lines of what is its fair value as a non-judicial tenancy, and the procedure possibly would be that they would fix a third term rent which would in many cases be much higher than the fee farm rent. Capitalise that, and the result would be that in the greater number of these cases the annuity would be actually higher than the fee farm rent if the Deputy only saw it. However, we can argue this on the re-committal of the Bill. This would achieve its purpose and do justice more effectively than his own suggestion. What he wants is to redeem the rent at a redemption price. We are not going to treat them as tenants because they are not tenants, and because we do not want to have the Bill ridiculously drafted. I will put in an amendment like that on re-committal. The Deputy has a copy of it, and we can argue it at length, and have the benefit of a couple of days to consider the whole question.

Mr. GOREY: I agree to that.

Mr. WILSON: In the redemption of these rentals will the Land Commission have regard only to the rent or to the fee farm itself?

Mr. HOGAN: They will only have regard to the rent.

Mr. GOREY: It is quite true there is only one class of people I am interested in, and not the general body at all.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. SEARS: I beg to move Amendment 91:—"In Sub-section (2) to insert after the word 'unexpired' the words 'or a letting for the purpose of temporary depasturage, agistment, or conacre, or for temporary convenience, or to meet a temporary necessity.'" The sub-section mentions two classes of holdings which are not to be classed as untenanted lands, and this amendment mentions another class that I suggest should be excepted. It is easy to imagine that arrangements might be made for family reasons, and under such an arrangement land might become for a short time liable to be termed untenanted land. These holdings are specified in this amendment, and I beg to move it.

Mr. HOGAN: We argued this question on Section 20, Sub-section (3). The amendment of Deputy Sears is necessary in order to make the Bill consistent. I am accepting it. I think the case for the amendment is quite clear.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GOREY: I move Amendment 92: "To add after the word 'two,' Sub-section (2), line 54, the words '(such contract not being a renewal of a previous tenancy).'"

Portion of Sub-section (2) reads: "provided that the land has become tenanted land as above defined by reason of a contract or tenancy entered into on or after the first day of September, nineteen hundred and twenty-two." We propose to add: "such contract not being a renewal of a previous tenancy."

Mr. HOGAN: I accept that amendment.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I suggest that when you accept that amendment you should put it in after the words "contract of tenancy." It would read better so.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Gorey, I take it, agrees with that.

Mr. GOREY: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The sub-section would then read: "Provided that where land had become tenanted land as above defined by reason of a contract of tenancy (not being a renewal of a previous tenancy) entered into on or after the 1st day of September, 1922."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GOREY: I beg to move to add at the end of paragraph (a) the words "and if the person in possession be dispossessed under this sub-section he shall be paid adequate compensation, having regard to the value of any improvements made by him."

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Before the Minister replies, may I ask whether he has considered the advisability of the deletion of the entire body of words in paragraph (a), and whether it would not really effect his purpose better if it were omitted unless he considers it really essential to the main meaning of the Bill?

Mr. HOGAN: If paragraph (a) were deleted, what would follow after the proviso?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Paragraph (b) would then take the place of paragraph (a).

Mr. HOGAN: That is, to have the same provision for a congested districts county? That would hardly be fair. There are more reasons against the recent creation of a tenancy in a congested districts county than outside. It might even be perfectly legitimate in a congested district, but there are more reasons for not allowing it in a district where congestion is acute than, for instance, in a county in the Midlands. My own view is that Clause (a) should be left in. I take it what Deputy Gorey has in mind is that in the event of any improvement or anything like that being made, the tenant shall be paid the actual value of his improvements. I will undertake to bring in an amendment to that effect on Report Stage.

[Mr. Hogan.]

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: Ba mhaith liom an leas rún so do thairisgint:—In Sub-section (3), to insert after the word "include" the words "any subsequent Act now in force which is by its terms to be construed as one with the Land Purchase Acts and."

Mr. HOGAN: I will accept this amendment; it is necessary.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made: "That Section 54, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Mr. JOHNSON: Perhaps upon this motion the question that I want to raise will most conveniently come up. I would like the Minister in charge of the Bill to give me some assurances upon this matter. The question I want to raise is in regard to land in the vicinity of towns. It was pointed out that the 1903 Act provided that where an estate was in the main agricultural and pastoral, towns situated thereon might be included in the sale of such estates. It is said that the proposal in this Bill is retrospective, because there is practically a repeal of the 1903 Act as far as these estates are concerned by the provision that even a holding of itself must be in greater part or substantially agricultural. That may or may not be a correct reading, and I would like the Minister to reassure us upon the matter, and say whether, in the case of tenants who have already purchased under the 1903 Act, their interests have been acquired, or may be acquired under that Act from the Commissioners, and whether the Commissioners are likely to adjudge their present rights and accruing benefits under that Act rather by the new powers they are getting under this Act than by the powers they have under the old Act. That is the case put to me, and perhaps the Minister, who understands it a good deal better than I do, will explain.

Mr. HOGAN: The principle we accepted in connection with this Act was the principle of dealing with all tenancies both agricultural and pastoral, or which are either partly agricultural or partly pastoral. If they are purely agricultural and purely pastoral, it does not matter whether they were judicial or non-judicial, present or future. We deal with them all. That is the principle we went on, and if we are to call this a Land Purchase Bill, or a Land Bill at all, you could not make the definition any wider. If you wish to widen it, we would have to bring in houses pure and simple. That is the only possible extension. Any further extension would bring in houses pure and simple, apart from land. We are dealing with the holdings agricultural or pastoral, and we deal with them whether judicial or non-judicial. That was the principle we accepted. We could go no further without actually dealing with houses as such. I think that is a sound principle. In any case we would have to re-christen the Act if it dealt with anything else. It is very true that small towns under the Land Purchase Act of 1903, by reason of the fact that they were on estates—towns like Athenry, which was regarded as a village on a big estate—were sold. We are not dealing with a man with a house in a town and no land. The 1903-1909 Acts did not deal with such people to any appreciable extent.

Some people had the good luck to come within the terms of the 1903 Act by reason of the fact that they lived in very small towns which were on very large estates. The Commissioners decided that the fact that the town was on a large estate really made no difference, and held that it was mainly agricultural. We are going a long way further than the 1903 Act. We are selling town parks to the owners. That is at least ten times as great a concession as the advantages which a few small towns got under the 1903 Act. Whether the town is big or small, if a man is the owner of a genuine town park, and has a future tenancy, we are selling to him. That applies to every town, big and small, and considerably outweighs anything that may be urged against the Act by reason of the fact that we do not deal with the owner of a shop in some country town to which there is no land attached. That is my answer to the first part of the question. With regard to the second part, we do not touch in any way the rights of people who have purchased, whether they be residents in a town or agricultural tenants in the country. We do not interfere with the rights of anyone who has purchased under the previous Acts, with the exception, of course, that under this Bill we propose to have the power to take up even a purchased holding for the relief of congestion, but that does not affect the point which the Deputy raised.

Question put: "That Section 54, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Sections 55 and 56 put and agreed to.

SECTION 57.

The Land Commission may make rules for carrying into effect the provisions of this Act, and the term "prescribed" in this Act means, unless the context otherwise requires, prescribed by rules made under this section.

Motion made: "That Section 57 stand part of the Bill."

Mr. WILSON: I desire to ask who will make the rules in regard to the Guarantee Fund?

Mr. HOGAN: The Minister for Finance.

Mr. WILSON: Will an opportunity be given Deputies to discuss these rules in the Dáil before they are made? Will the rules be made by the Minister for Finance?

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy is already in a position to examine the rules, which are in existence. This section merely means that the Minister for Finance will in future exercise the powers formerly exercised by the Lord Lieutenant or other functionary of that sort.

Mr. WILSON: What we want to avoid is that the Minister for Finance shall make the ratepayers pay for the carrying out of these rules.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: As far as I understand the Deputy, what he wants to know is if these rules will be laid on the Table of the Dáil before they come into effect.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy, I think, is under a misapprehension. The Guarantee Fund, as such, is not altered. The machinery is not altered; it is there. The rules are there, and the procedure is there, cut and dry. We are merely providing that the Minister for Finance shall make the requisitions and do other necessary things of that sort which formerly were done by the Lord Lieutenant of the day. The Guarantee Fund is there—it is the law of the land; and the regulations are there. They have not been altered, and they will not be altered, as far as I am aware. We are accepting the Guarantee Fund as it stands, but are merely providing that in the "regrettable" absence of the Lord Lieutenant the Minister for Finance will do his work.

Question put and agreed to.

SECTION 58.

All moneys required by the Land Commission for exercising its powers under this Act or otherwise for carrying this Act into effect shall (save in so far as such moneys are otherwise specifically provided for by this Act) be paid out of moneys provided by the Oireachtas.

PADRAIC O MAILLE: Ba mhaith liom an rún so do thairisgint:—To insert after the word "Act," line 39, the words "to such extent as may be approved by the Minister for Finance."

Is doigh liom gur tabhactac an leas-run é.

Mr. HOGAN: This amendment, of course, is absolutely necessary. It is only right that the Treasury should have control over those moneys, as they have over other moneys.

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 58 as amended stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Sections 59 and 60 put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The First Schedule has already been added to the Bill.

Mr. GOREY: Is all the subject matter of Schedule 1 ruled out?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Mr. GOREY: I thought it was only the first part that was discussed. We did not go on to (a), (b) and (c).

[Mr. Gorey.]

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: All of Schedule 1 was passed. I found Amendment 96 being discussed when I resumed the Chair. I put Amendment 96, and on a division it was defeated.

Mr. GOREY: I thought you were only putting the first portion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 96, "to delete Part 1 of the First Schedule," was moved, discussed at some length, put, and on a division defeated. Amendment 97 was not moved, as it was lost consequentially on the defeat of Amendment 96.

Mr. GOREY: I did not know that. I wish to draw the Minister's attention to the subject matter of (a), (b) and (c), because if I am in order—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is not in order. The Schedule has been passed.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy will be in order on the next stage. It was plain enough in the discussion that he did not refer to the second and third paragraphs.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If the Deputy proposes to amend Part 2 that will bring it under discussion on the next stage.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: As certain portions of this Bill are to be re-committed, will he not have an opportunity to re-commit this Schedule?

Mr. HOGAN: It is open to Deputies to put in an amendment on re-committal, and no one is going to raise any point about it. I am aware that the Deputy did not refer to the other two paragraphs.

Mr. GOREY: I accept that. These matters have nothing to do with the question of price.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If anybody suggested to me, or to my deputy, who was in the Chair, to take the Schedule in parts it would have been done. That suggestion was not made.

Mr. GOREY: We were taking from the middle to the end of the Bill.

Mr. JOHNSON: Are we to understand that unless there are some amendments put to Part 2 it will not be brought into discussion?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I was thinking of the procedure which was already outlined, and of a promise already given by the Minister. We shall have a second Committee Stage, and if amendments are tabled to Part 2 that would enable them to be discussed on the Second Committee Stage. If no amendment is tabled Part 2 cannot be discussed, but on the Report Part 2 can be discussed.

Mr. HOGAN: It is only right to say that the Amendment to Part 1 was discussed for about two or three hours, and it was not the Deputy Chairman's fault or anybody else's fault if Deputies during that long spell did not revert to any other clause.

Mr. GOREY: I must admire the Minister's tactics in taking us from the middle to the end of the Bill.

Mr. HOGAN: That is a most unkind remark.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This will not solve the question. In Committee, if the suggestion is made to me or to the Leas-Cheann Comhairle, and if sufficient reasons are put up to take the Schedule in part or by sub-sections, that will be done. If Deputies do not do that, then they have no cause for complaint. Anyway, there are two further opportunities for discussion.

SECOND SCHEDULE.

Session and Chapter.	Short Title.	Extent of Repeal.
54 & 55 Vic. Cap. 48.	The Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891.	Section 37, sub-section (3).
3 Ed. VII. Cap. 37.	The Irish Land Act, 1903.	Section 53. Section 54, sub-section (1) (c) the words "or vested in more than one person," and sub-sections 2, 3 and 4.
6 Ed. VII. Cap. 37.	Labourers (Ireland) Act, 1906.	Section 19. From the words "Provided that" to end of Section.
7 Ed. VII. Cap. 38.	The Irish Land Act, 1907.	Section 2.
7 Ed. VII. Cap. 56.	The Evicted Tenants (Ireland) Act, 1907.	Section 3.
9 Ed. VII. Cap. 42.	The Irish Land Act, 1909.	Section 16, sub-section (1).

Mr. DUGGAN: I move Amendment 98: "To insert in Extent of Repeal column, opposite the Short Title, 'The Irish Land Act, 1903,' Section 49, the words 'or any purchaser from them.' " The section of the Act refers to the registration fee payable under the Local Registration of Title Act. Under this Act every person will be a purchaser either from the Land Commission or from the Congested Districts Board. It means it would be an addition to the sections that are referred to ; it means they relate to that particular Act.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Motion made and question put: "That the Second Schedule, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Motion made and question put: "That the Title stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

[DAIL RESUMES.]

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Bill as amended is reported to the Dáil. When will the next stage be taken?

Mr. HOGAN: I suggest Tuesday, 17th July.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We have been endeavouring to get this Bill printed as amended. The printers have already had in hand the matter concluded on Friday evening. I think it would be impossible to have the Bill as amended in Committee in the hands of Deputies until Thursday evening, or possibly Friday morning. It has to be read very carefully, as the Bill has been considerably amended.

Mr. ROONEY: When would the amendments have to be in?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is the position we were in at the opening of the proceedings to-day. If I accept amendments on Monday for the convenience of Deputies, I cannot guarantee that they will have them in their hands until Wednesday, the day on which the Bill is to be considered. The thing cuts both ways. If I accept amendments for the convenience, say, of Deputy Rooney, on Monday, on Wednesday we may not have all the other amendments put in by other Deputies. We may be in the position on Wednesday which we were in to-day in regard to the other Bill.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: There is no use in giving a long day for the next stage of the Bill, if Deputies insist on their right to wait until the last minute before handing in their amendments.

Mr. HOGAN: Surely every Deputy knows practically every amendment he wants to put in. We have gone through the Committee Stage, the Bill has been discussed, and I take it that only essential amendments will be put in.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If Deputies require to wait for copies of the amended Bill before putting in new amendments, we shall be in a difficulty. If they put them in before they get a copy of the Bill, we might take the next stage on Wednesday week. If the order is made we will carry it out, but Deputies must be clear about their amendments.

Mr. HOGAN: If amendments are in by Saturday, I suppose it will be all right?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Mr. DAVIN: The Minister has read out amendments to-day which are not in the hands of Deputies.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We can circulate them.

Mr. HOGAN: I will undertake to have my amendments in by Friday, with the possible exception of one or two that will have to go in by Saturday.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The necessary alterations for the amendments will make heavy charges on the staff.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: My staff are getting inured to what you might call heavy charges.

Report Stage ordered for Wednesday, 18th July.

Mr. WILSON: I would like to ask the Minister for Agriculture if he is going to put in the Bill costs from the date?

Mr. HOGAN: I propose to put in as an amendment the amendment I offered when discussing this question last week.

Mr. GOREY: Is Section 16 to be re-committed?

Mr. HOGAN: Of course it must be re-committed if I put in an amendment.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Would it be possible to circulate the Minister's amendments in typewritten form?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If we get the Minister's amendments on Friday we will circulate them as they are received.

Mr. HOGAN: I take it, it is perfectly clear that no amendments bearing any similarity to those which have already been disposed of can be handed in?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Minister for Agriculture can place perfect faith in me.

Mr. HOGAN: I am extremely glad to hear that.

Mr. GOREY: I did not quite catch the Minister's remarks in regard to Section 16.

Mr. HOGAN: That Section is being recommitted.

Mr. GOREY: Will it be possible for us to put in amendments to that?

Mr. HOGAN: Not exactly the same amendments.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Perhaps I had better explain this matter. If an amendment is defeated in Committee, that amendment cannot be again put on the Paper for another stage or a further Committee Stage, nor can any amendment which is substantially the same. That is only in accordance with common-sense, I think. When an amendment has been defeated in Committee, the same amendment cannot be tabled for another stage of the Bill, nor can an amendment which is substantially the same as the amendment defeated in Committee be put down for another stage of the Bill or a further Committee Stage. In other words, we can only discuss a particular thing once by way of amendment.

Mr. GOREY: Am I to understand that the 40 per cent. that we put forward in connection with claims for arrears cannot be discussed again, even in a modified form, such as, for instance, 35 per cent.?

Mr. HOGAN: Of course that would be reducing the thing to a farce.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If the Deputy will first put up the amendments, I will rule on them.

Mr. GOREY: I would like some assurance beforehand. The matter was dealt with the last day without very much discussion, and it will not be so the next time.

Mr. WILSON: On the question of the costs dating, as was suggested, from the last day, what would be the procedure suppose we were to suggest the date as from the introduction of the Bill?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If the amendment would have the same effect as an amendment already defeated, it would not be in order.

Mr. HOGAN: The fact is that the Deputies want to have it both ways. Having accepted my amendment in Committee, they want to go back on it on Report.

Mr. DAVIN: Deputy Gorey and other Deputies moved amendments and supported them for a considerable time. The Minister for Agriculture read out certain amendments the exact particulars of which we have not yet got. I am anxious that as soon as possible the amendments which the Minister suggested, and which in some cases were acceptable to the Dáil, should be circulated.

Mr. HOGAN: An undertaking to that effect has been given already.

Mr. GOREY: Am I to understand that this recommittal stage will be taken on the same date as the Report, or what is the procedure?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The procedure is simply that amendments will be received and put down, and I understand from the Minister that he intends to move that all the sections which it is proposed to amend be recommitted. That will mean a discussion in Committee on such of the sections as it is proposed to amend. Instead of taking the matter on report in the Dáil, we go into Committee on Wednesday, the 18th.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Is it necessary that we should take any resolution to recommit now, or wait until then?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We cannot take the resolution to recommit until we see the amendments.

PUBLIC SAFETY (EMERGENCY POWERS) BILL, 1923.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I take it that it has been decided already to postpone the consideration of this Bill until to-morrow?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The Orders of the Day for to-morrow have probably been printed by now, and will shortly be in circulation. Would it not be convenient if we took the Committee Stage of this on Wednesday in order not to upset to-morrow's Orders of the Day?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We have adopted the procedure of printing all the amendments in a separate sheet, so that we can follow the Committee Stage of the Bill throughout. These amendments are now in the hands of the Deputies. To-morrow's Order Paper simply contains "Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Bill, Committee Stage Resumed," so there is no difficulty whatever in taking that to-morrow.

[THE ADJOURNMENT.]

Mr. KEVIN O'HIGGINS: I move the adjournment until 8 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON: In view of the fact that the Minister is not able to be present, I will not now raise the matter I proposed to raise on the adjournment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Minister for Defence is present. We will hear him on the question. Does the Minister for Defence wish to deal with this matter now?

General MULCAHY: I have simply a small bit of information.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think, in that case, I will leave it over until to-morrow. If it is necessary to raise it to-morrow, I will do so.

The Dáil adjourned at 4.30.

DÁIL EIREANN.

DE MAIRT, 10ADH IÚIL, 1923.

(Tuesday, 10th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar a 3.10 p.m.
Bhí an Ceann Comhairle, Micheál
O hAodha, 'sa Chathaoir.

GEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

[ORAL ANSWERS.]

SPIRITS BONDED IN SAORSTAT.

SEAMUS O DOLAIN asked the Minister for Finance whether he will direct the Revenue Commissioners to prepare and lay on the Table of the Dáil a return showing the quantity in proof gallons of spirits remaining in Bond in Saorstát Eireann on the last working day of each month, and that such return be laid not later than the seventh day of the following month, and that it distinguish between home-made and foreign spirits, particulars for the latter being given according to the main revenue headings.

The PRESIDENT (Minister for Finance): The information requested has now been prepared in respect of the months of April, May, and June by the Revenue Commissioners, and will be circulated as a White Paper. Similar information will be circulated monthly in future.

ATHLONE BREAD CONTRACT.

PADRAIG Mac ARTAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is yet in a position to state the price per lb. paid for bread in the Athlone area; whether Mr. T. English, of Tullamore, was informed on February 28th, 1923, by the Secretary of the Government Contracts Committee that his tender had been successful; whether following this Mr. T. English did not receive any orders; and, if so, whether Mr. English will receive compensation for breach of contract.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): In Athlone the Army bakes its own bread, and the cost is about 3½d. per 2 lb. loaf. Mr. English was informed that a tender submitted by him was successful, but orders for the particular period covered by the tender were not given to him. He has since received orders. On investigation, it does not appear that any contract was entered into with him out of which a legal claim would arise.

LATE DR. FERRAN'S ILLNESS.

PADRAIG Mac ARTAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Mrs. Frank Ferran was not officially informed of the illness of her husband, Dr. Frank Ferran; and, if so, can he state why official intimation of her husband's serious condition was not sent to Mrs. Ferran; whether a consultant was called to see him; and further, whether an eminent physician, desired by Dr. Ferran's friends, was refused permission to see Dr. Ferran.

General MULCAHY: Dr. Ferran's illness dated from the 4th June. Dr. O'Kelly, brother-in-law of the late Dr. Ferran, was officially informed by telephone on the 8th June that the latter was seriously, but not dangerously, ill. This was considered the most expeditious way of notifying Mrs. Ferran. It was not considered necessary to summon an outside consultant. Dr. Ferran was in the hands of the senior medical officer at the Curragh, a surgical specialist, and one other medical officer. I am not aware that permission was refused for an eminent physician to see Dr. Ferran. Dr. O'Carroll, of Fitzwilliam Square, was, in fact, present for a few hours before Dr. Ferran died at 1.30 a.m. on the 10th June, and he expressed the opinion to Mrs. Ferran, in the presence of the medical officer of the Curragh Military Hospital that absolutely nothing had been left undone to save Dr. Ferran's life.

MEATH SOLDIER'S DEPENDANTS' ALLOWANCE.

CATHAL O SEANAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether repeated applications have been made for dependants' allowance on behalf of Q.M.S. B. McCabe, Elmgrove, Ballivor, Co. Meath, now stationed at Kilcoyne Barracks, Co. Cork; why this allowance has not been paid; and whether the Minister will now expedite payment.

General MULCAHY: I appear to have received only two applications from the mother of Sergeant-Major McCabe, one of which was an appeal against the rejection of her claim. Her application for an allowance was disallowed after due investigation on the grounds that the extent of dependence which in the case of an unmarried soldier is taken to be the amount normally contributed by him to his home over and above the cost of his own maintenance therein for a reasonable period prior to enlistment was less than the minimum required by regulations—namely, 12s. per week—before an allowance may be issued. It should be stated, however, that those regulations are based on the recognition of an obligation on the part of an unmarried soldier to contribute to the support of his dependants a reasonable portion of his Army pay, this portion being calculated at 8s. per week in the case of a soldier receiving ordinary rate of pay.

HILL OF DOWN ARRESTS.

CATHAL O SEANAIN asked the Minister for Defence to state the reasons for the arrest of Christopher Kavanagh, Killucan, on June 12th; whether any charge has been preferred against this prisoner; whether, failing a trial, he will now be released; and whether he can now give a final reply to the question put to him on June 26th with reference to James Keegan and certain other Co. Meath prisoners now in Mountjoy Jail.

General MULCAHY: James Keegan, Christopher Kavanagh, and other men were arrested on the 7th June on suspicion of malicious injury to lands at Hill of Down, and have since been detained. They have not been formally charged. Since the date mentioned the various farms in the neighbourhood have been undisturbed, and this fact tends to confirm the suspicion that they were responsible for the illegalities formerly prevalent there. All except one of the men, James Carbery, have signed an undertaking not to interfere with the property of others, and arrangements are being made for their release, but not for the release of Carbery.

DEPENDANT'S ALLOWANCE FOR CO. MEATH VOLUNTEER.

CATHAL O SEANAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that no dependant's allowance has yet been paid on behalf of Volunteer Christopher Reilly, Ballivor, Co. Meath, at present stationed at Amiens Street, Dublin, and to ask that payment be now made.

General MULCAHY: A claim for an allowance was received from the mother of Volunteer Reilly, but on investigation it was ascertained that she had not, in fact, been dependent on him for a considerable period prior to his enlistment. The claim was, therefore, disallowed.

LISTOWEL DISTRICT HOSPITAL.

SEAMUS O CRUADHLAIOICH asked the Minister for Local Government if he will state the proposed arrangements as regards the Listowel District Hospital.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. E. Blythe): The existing County Scheme for Kerry, as it appears in the Schedule to the Local Government (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1923, provides for the establishment of a County Home at Killarney, a County Hospital at Tralee, and small local branch hospitals, for urgent cases only, in other parts of Kerry, to be set up as might be decided upon. After the passing of the Act referred to, the Ministry proceeded to revise the County Schemes on a general plan throughout the country, with a view to putting them on a legally workable basis and introducing uniformity. The Act provided that a month's notice of an intended revision should be given to the County Councils concerned. At the time the notice was served on the Kerry County Council it was not definitely known what branch hospitals it would be best to establish, and the notice made provision for a County Home and County Hospital at the places mentioned in the old scheme, and for such other institutions as the County Board of Health might deem desirable. Under this provision branch hospitals could be established as desired, subject to sanction. The County Board of Health, therefore, made application to have branch hospitals established at Cahirciveen, Kenmare, Dingle, and Listowel. They were notified that these proposals would be considered, and two inspectors have been sent down to report on the local requirements and the accommodation available. The Deputy may be assured that the whole matter will receive the fullest consideration, and I shall inform him as soon as a decision is arrived at.

[Minister for Local Government.]

HOUSING OF THE OIREACHTAS.

The PRESIDENT: There is a matter not on the Agenda which I ask you to allow me to mention. It is in connection with a letter I have received from the Ceann Comhairle in respect of accommodation for the Oireachtas. We have had some officials from the Board of Works looking at the Royal Hospital at Kilmainham and submitting plans. These plans are now available for examination, and I do not know whether the Deputies have read this letter or not. The last paragraph in the letter deals with the method of bringing this matter definitely and immediately before the Dáil and Seanad. I would agree to the suggestion of the Ceann Comhairle that a number of Deputies might be appointed to a Committee to which the Seanad would also be invited, to appoint members, and, if the Dáil is agreeable, I would be inclined to think that the number of members on that Committee might be a little more than six. I would suggest eight or ten. I would ask the Seanad also to appoint a number of members to examine the plans and to view the site of the Royal Hospital, and report back to the Oireachtas as to the views of the members after they have examined the question as to the suitability of the premises. I think in a condensed form the Ceann Comhairle has put before us very plainly the main difficulties of the housing of the Oireachtas. That, however, is a matter which might be examined by this Committee. We have got to consider it from the point of view of getting available suitable accommodation at the shortest possible loss of time and at the least possible expense. These are the only reasons why the Executive Council has been considering the Royal Hospital. The selection of this is not a matter to which a future Dáil would be committed, if they can find more suitable accommodation, and if they are prepared and have available a sufficient sum of money to spend in order to provide that accommodation. There is nothing to prevent them exploring other fields or getting better housing accommodation for the Dáil and Seanad.

My suggestion would be that on to-morrow we would elect a certain number of Deputies to this Committee, and that we might send a request to the Seanad asking them to do the same thing. We would then be in a position to place all the plans we have got and all the information at our disposal before this Committee.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The suggestion, if I understand the President aright, is to proceed to-morrow to nominate and elect a Committee for the purpose of going into the question of a site and buildings for the Oireachtas?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: And to send to-day a message to the Seanad acquainting them of our intention, and asking them to appoint a like number on the Committee?

The PRESIDENT: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Well, strictly in order, to send them a message we would want to know the Terms of Reference of the Committee, and decide how many we will appoint to the Committee.

The PRESIDENT: That is a matter for the consideration of the Dáil. I suggest ten members on the Committee from the Dáil, or if we compromise on your own suggestion and make it eight I would be agreeable. My suggestion is that the election of the Dáil members on this Committee should not take place to-morrow, as some of them did not have notice of this. I know some members of the Dáil have very strong views on the matter. I do not think we should select any particular site until we have the report from this Committee before us. The motion now is, that a number of Deputies be appointed to this Committee from the Dáil.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: To go into the question of a suitable site and building for the Oireachtas, and to report to the Dáil?

The PRESIDENT: Yes; and to ask the Seanad to appoint a number of its members on this Committee. The whole Committee would be a Committee of the Oireachtas, and their report would be considered by both the Dáil and the Seanad.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the suggestion is a good one. I have your definition of the Terms of Reference as you related them a moment ago. They need a Committee to examine any proposals which may, perchance, come before them, not confining the selection to one or other of the present suggestions in case an alternative might be put forward.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is not that the President's idea?

The PRESIDENT: Yes. I will submit a motion before the adjournment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, so that we can send a message to the Seanad informing them of the numbers we will appoint on the Committee and the Terms of Reference.

The PRESIDENT: We will do that to-day.

Mr. O'CONNELL: In the meantime we could arrange about the numbers.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes; and report progress from Committee, so as to leave some time for discussion.

CENSORSHIP OF FILMS BILL, 1923 FROM THE SEANAD.

Message from the Seanad:—

Seanad Eireann agree to the amendment made by the Dáil, viz.:—

"At the end of Section 3 to add a new sub-section as follows:—'A person shall be disqualified for being a member of the Appeal Board if he has, directly or indirectly, any share or interest in any company or undertaking having as its object or one of its objects the exhibition of pictures by means of a cinematograph or similar apparatus, or the production of pictures capable of being so exhibited.'

with the following consequential amendment:—

'In Section 3 (4), after the word 'death,' occurring at page 3, line 43, and page 4, line 3, the words 'becoming disqualified' have been inserted.'

And as a further amendment insert the words 'for profit' after the word 'exhibition.' "

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): I move: "That the Dáil agree with the Seanad in the said amendment."

Question put and agreed to.

PUBLIC SAFETY (EMERGENCY POWERS) BILL, 1923.

IN COMMITTEE.

SECTION 1.

It shall be lawful for an Executive Minister to cause the arrest and, subject to the provisions of this Act, to order the detention in custody in any place in Saorstát Éireann of any person

- (a) in respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report from a responsible officer that there is reasonable ground for suspecting such person of being or having been engaged or concerned in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule to this Act, or
- (b) in respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report from the responsible officer or from the military authorities that the detention of such person is a matter of military necessity in the present emergency, or
- (c) in respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report from the military authorities that the public safety is endangered by such person being allowed to remain at liberty.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: There is an amendment before Section 1.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The first amendment on the Paper in the name of Deputy Gavan Duffy is out of order. The statement that anything contained in an Act of the Oireachtas which may be found to contravene the terms of certain Articles of the Constitution shall be void and of no effect is simply a statement of fact. If the words on the Paper were accepted by the Committee, and if a new section were accordingly added to the Bill, the new section would not, in my judgment, effect any alteration in the Bill. The words suggested to be added to the Bill are not, therefore, an amendment.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: With reference to that matter, may I put before you the reasons why I respectfully submit to the Chair this amendment is in order. These reasons depend upon the peculiar wording of our Constitution. I entirely accept the proposition that such an amendment would be out of order in a case where the Constitution would require specific legislation to alter it. On this point which you raise, incidentally there is raised a constitutional question of the first importance under Article 50 of our Constitution. That Article provides three things—first, that amendments of the Constitution within the terms of the Treaty may be made by the Oireachtas; secondly, that any such amendments, if passed after eight years from the date when the Constitution came into force, must be submitted to a Referendum; and thirdly, the immediately important thing which it provides is that any such amendments may be made within the said period of eight years—that is, the period we are now in—by way of ordinary legislation. I quite accept the proposition that when the Dáil passed Article 50 it had not the remotest intention of suggesting that the Legislature might amend the Constitution without legislation ad hoc; that it might amend the Constitution by passing an ordinary law. The effect of the words which we use when we speak of amending the Constitution by ordinary legislation may be to enable a Government or its Law Adviser to argue, and enable a Court to hold, that in any case where a Statute of this Oireachtas offends the Constitution as originally passed, so much of the Statute as offends that original Constitution must be interpreted as an amendment of the Constitution under Article 50. That would be a flimsy kind of way of getting over a difficulty, but one knows not what will be the Government or who its Law Adviser, or who the Judges, when this Act comes to be interpreted, and it is certainly open to argument by a slim lawyer that an Act which appears to offend against our Constitution must have been intended by the Oireachtas to amend the Constitution, in view of the fact that Article 50 says we may amend the Constitution within eight years by way of ordinary legislation. If that be so, and if it be possible for a Judge to decide that any Act which we pass, not intending to amend the Constitution, does in fact amend it, because it happens to contravene it, and because the Oireachtas cannot be supposed to wish to contravene the Constitution, then I submit it is necessary in a Statute of this kind to state beforehand that we do not intend to amend the Constitution by this Statute. There has been no hint of any official intention to amend the Constitution in introducing this measure. I submit, in these circumstances, in the face of the words “ordinary legislation,” whereby we are entitled to amend the Constitution under Article 50, if we intend to maintain that Constitution it is necessary to make our intention clear in a Bill of this kind. For those reasons I ask you to rule that the first amendment is in order.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I have already given consideration to the question which Deputy Gavan Duffy raises. I told the Deputy yesterday that I intended to rule this particular amendment out of order, and he made that point. I have given the point some consideration, and I am not prepared to alter my ruling that the amendment is out of order. We must assume that the Constitution is a fundamental matter in connection with which all legislation passed in this Dáil must be construed. If we departed from that in our rulings here, it would be difficult to know where we would be going. The amendment is, therefore, out of order.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I do not intend to suggest that your ruling is not quite correct. Supposing it would happen that any of the provisions of this or any other Act are not in conformity with the provisions of the Constitution, mentioned by Deputy Gavan Duffy, what, then, is the position? Are we to take it that these provisions of the Statute which are not in conformity are legally void, and have no effect?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, if it is so decided. Article 65 of the Constitution says:—

“The Judicial Power of the High Court shall extend to the question of the validity of any Law having regard to the provisions of the Constitution. In all cases, in which such matters shall come into question, the High Court alone shall exercise original jurisdiction.”

Therefore, if, as a matter of law, it is decided that any of the Sections of this Bill contravene the Constitution these Sections will become null and void.

Amendment 2.—With regard to this amendment I have pointed out to Deputy Gavan Duffy that before he proceeds to set up a Parliamentary Committee of certain named persons, we are entitled to know whether any of these persons is, in fact, willing to serve upon the proposed Parliamentary Committee, and if so, which of them? I understand Deputy Gavan Duffy is not in a position to give us that information, and the amendment is, therefore, not being moved. It would, of course, be in place in another part of the Bill if the information is forthcoming.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I am in the position to say that some of the gentlemen have consented, and I am in a position to move the amendment with some of the names. Deputies Sir James Craig, Richard Hayes, Patrick MacCartan and Senator Henry L. Barniville have consented to act upon the Committee. I have been unable to see the other medical gentleman named, so that I shall omit their names for the present.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Would the Deputy read the amendment as he now proposes to move it.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I propose to insert before Section 1 a new Sub-Section as follows:—

“Deputies Sir James Craig, Richard Hayes, and Patrick MacCartan, and Senator Henry L. Barniville, being the members of the medical and surgical professions in the Oireachtas, or such of them as shall be willing to act, are hereby constituted a Parliamentary Committee of inspection,” etc.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The names read: Deputies Sir James Craig, Richard Hayes, and Patrick MacCartan, and Senator Henry L. Barniville, being the members of the medical and surgical profession, or such of them as shall be willing to act, are hereby constituted a Parliamentary Committee of Inspection, with such powers and duties, etc.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I do not think it needs very much argument to commend this proposal to the Dáil. For a very long time, Doctors and others, have been saying, and saying loudly, that there ought to be some method whereby medical men can have access to detention camps, both for the purposes of sanitary control, and for the purposes of matters affecting the health of prisoners. The Dáil is aware that at present no one, except the official doctors, have a right to visit a prison. If this Dáil determines that it must perpetuate a system of internment without trial, I think it is reasonable that the Dáil should, at the same time, make provision that persons whom we all hold in respect, and who are Deputies and representative public men, and who are members of the medical and surgical profession, should have the right as a Committee from this Dáil, to go to any place of detention, and inspect such place of detention and visit the prisoners. This amendment proposes that they should have the right, at any time, of free entry into such places and of visiting any persons detained therein. I should like to tell the Dáil there is nothing new in that. Under the Statutes appointing visiting justices to prisons, the justices are given precisely that power of visiting any prison within their jurisdiction, and of seeing any prisoners detained therein. It is not an unreasonable thing by any means. On the other hand it is a very necessary thing to secure, if you are to avoid the kind of complaint which inevitably comes out of prisons, that persons in the position of Doctors are not excluded from visiting them unless they be professional servants of the Government. I do not think there can be any objection to the names here proposed. I cannot conceive that there will be any objection to the principle that Deputies who are medical men should be allowed to see the prisoners in the prisons. Undoubtedly, it is a provision which the Dáil ought, in its own interest, if it proposes to proceed with the Bill introduced by the Government, to make sure to have inserted in this Bill. I do not mind much as to the wording. If the Minister accepts the amendment and wants a change of wording it is a simple matter, but I do ask that the principle should be accepted upon all sides of the House.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. K. O'Higgins): I do not propose to accept this amendment. Exception is not taken to the names, though I shall be glad to hear whether it is qua medical men and Deputies that people are to become members of this Committee, and if so, whether any medical man who becomes a Deputy would automatically become a member of the Committee. It is the principle that is objectionable. The Dáil set up an Executive Government, and imposed upon it certain responsibilities, and the net effect of this amendment is to vote no confidence in the Executive, and to take from the Executive the powers and the responsibilities which were, I hope after due consideration, entrusted to it. The Department of Government have at their disposal medical men in whom they have confidence. They report to their Departmental Heads upon all matters affecting the health of prisoners and the sanitation of the places of detention, whether prisons or camps. I submit that it is not right, and it is not wise, to ask this Vote of no confidence in these paid officers of the Government, and in the Minister or Ministers to whom they are responsible, and to place their official reports in the position of being criticised or countered by a Committee of this kind. It would be better to say broadly that Deputies do not believe that the Reports of the medical men in the service of the Government are reliable, and that they do not believe that they send, in fact, correct and truthful reports to their Ministers, than to say it in so many words by a resolution of this kind.

[Minister for Home Affairs.]

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I desire to support Deputy Gavan Duffy's amendment which I do not think the Minister has treated as it ought to be treated. The Minister asks whether it is as Deputies, and as Medical Deputies, that the gentlemen mentioned are named in the amendment, and whether it is to be supposed that in future medical men, who happen to become members of the Oireachtas, would automatically become members of this committee. There is nothing in the amendment to suggest anything of the kind, and there is nothing to suggest an enlargement of the Committee at all. We know, even if we had not the assurance of the Minister, that there could be no reasonable objection to the personnel of the Committee nominated, and that the Minister's objection, as he says, is rather on principle. He says that the effect of carrying this amendment would be a vote of no confidence in the Ministry. That is nonsense, and nothing but nonsense, because it would mean, if that line is to be pursued, that when the Ministry is pushed by the pretty strong opinion of the Dáil, or of the Oireachtas, it could hold up the whole business by saying, this is a vote of no-confidence. Surely, that is not the way that an Executive ought to treat its Parliament. I cannot see that there is any vote of no-confidence in this amendment at all. In ordinary times, for ordinary prisoners, and by the ordinary procedure, there were Visiting Justices whose duty it was to visit the prison, and to see how things were conducted and to take complaints, if complaints were made by the prisoners. Does anyone suggest for a moment that the fact that these bodies of Visiting Justices were in existence in the past, was an expression of no-confidence in the Government or the Executive or whatever you may call it that was in existence at the time. Of course, not. I suggest that the same applies in this case. If the Oireachtas has got any functions, one of these functions after setting up the Executive Council, is to keep control of that Executive Council, and to keep a check on that Executive Council. That is a thing that no Minister will deny, because it is the strictest Constitutional principle and practice. I can see nothing in Deputy Gavan Duffy's amendment except an effort to better things within the next few months, and to bring about an improvement on what has been going on in the last few months. We know perfectly well that the situation in the country is not all that it might have been. An effort is being made now to come back to normal. Even the Minister's own speeches in favour of this whole Bill had the tendency that it was exceptional legislation to tide over what might be called the transition period. I am of opinion that the tiding over, the going through, of that transition period, from a bad state into a better state when we may expect a resumption of normal activities, a resumption of normal legality and the normal workings of Government and law, should be made as easy as possible, and I submit to the Dáil that one of the things that would help to get through that period of transition easier, would be the adoption of some such proposal as that contained in this particular amendment because it would help considerably to bridge the gulf between the bullet period, so to speak, and the peaceful period that we at least hope for if we do not exactly anticipate.

MINISTER for EDUCATION (Professor Eoin MacNeill): I just wish to emphasise one point that has been made by the Deputy who has just spoken, and that is that the object in appointing the persons named for the purpose named is to keep control on the Executive Council. It is unnecessary for me to enlarge upon that. A Committee, of, I think, four persons is named, and the Dáil is asked to appoint a Committee of that kind to keep control on the Executive Council.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The argument of the Minister for Education—

Professor Mac NEILL: I have not argued at all.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: What I say is—that the argument of the Minister for Education is too subtle. He will not get anyone in the Dáil to believe that the purpose of appointing these gentlemen is that they should control the Executive Council, or check the Executive Council. The amendment proposes to set up a Parliamentary Committee, and that Parliamentary Committee like any other Parliamentary Committee has certain powers and duties. It is not right to say, or to suggest, that every time the Dáil sets up a Parliamentary Committee of inspection, that that Committee is going to have control, or to be a check on the Executive Council. It is as a matter of fact, a reporting body to the Oireachtas, and the Minister has not suggested that that is unnecessary. It is not to be entrusted with control of the Executive Council, and of itself it has not the power to check the Executive Council, but the results of its inspection and enquiry may or may not be such as to show to the Oireachtas that some check or some control in these things may be necessary to be exercised by the Oireachtas.

Professor Mac NEILL: May I just say that I used no argument at all, nor did I make any suggestion, but as the Deputy has again spoken, I desire to again draw the attention of the Dáil to the Deputy's own words. His own words, as I noted them immediately after he had spoken them, were to keep a control on the Executive Council, and he added a word which he now feels to have been inconvenient, and that was to keep a check on the Executive Council. I do not know whether the Deputy was speaking his mind more clearly on the first occasion or on the second occasion. I leave it to the Dáil to decide, but the purpose for which he advocated this amendment was the purpose stated, to keep control on the Executive Council, and to keep a check on the Executive Council.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I said, and the Minister does not deny it, and no Minister can deny it, that if the Oireachtas has any functions at all, one of its functions is to keep a check and a control on the Executive Council.

Professor MacNEILL: And this is the means suggested for it.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: And that, I repeat, is the strictest constitutional practice, and no Minister will get up and deny that that is so. But Ministers will get up and try to get out of the whole thing by another door altogether. One of the weaknesses, I think, of this particular Oireachtas is a weakness, perhaps inevitable in view of the situation through which we have been passing, and through the wrong line which certain people took, is that this Dáil, or the whole Oireachtas, has not been careful enough in carrying out its constitutional function of keeping a check on the Executive Council.

Sir JAMES CRAIG: I have to admit that I did not read this amendment until I came into the Dáil. As a matter of fact, Deputy Gavan Duffy spoke to me when I came in and I did not know at the moment to what he was referring. I have no desire in the wide world that my name should be associated with any amendment which could be construed as a want of confidence in the Government or in the Executive Council. Deputy Gavan Duffy did ask me a few days ago if I would have any objection to visit the prisons or internment camps if I were asked and I said I should not. That means that I would have no objection whatsoever if the Executive Council asked me to visit them to report upon them. I look on the matter in this way: the Executive Council have a decided duty towards the prisoners. These prisoners may be unwilling guests, but they are guests all the same, and the Executive Council have a duty to see that their health is not impaired or their lives jeopardised by any insanitary conditions. If these insanitary conditions were known to exist then I think Deputy Gavan Duffy would be quite right in pressing the amendment he has down here; if, on the other hand, we are told by the Executive that insanitary conditions do not exist, and that there is no jeopardising of the health or life of the prisoners or of the people in the neighbourhood, supposing an epidemic of some infectious disease were to start, then I do not think we have any right to press on the Government the necessity for any further inquiry into the matter. Let me say again that, so far as I am personally concerned, if the Executive Council had asked me, with others, to inspect the prisons or the internment camps I should have been very glad to do so, but I have no desire in any way to be associated with an amendment that would seem to indicate a want of confidence in the Executive Council.

[Sir James Craig.]

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Before the amendment goes any further I should say that I understood from Deputy Gavan Duffy that he had the consent of Deputy Sir James Craig to use his name in connection with this Committee, and, of course, in connection with the amendment. Is that so?

Sir JAMES CRAIG: I suppose it was my fault that I did not inquire what the meaning was, but Deputy Gavan Duffy certainly asked me would I have any objection to serve on a Committee to inspect the prisons and I said no, but I did not inquire sufficiently into the matter at the time to make it clear.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: But you are asked to serve on this Committee?

Sir JAMES CRAIG: I would not serve if the Government assumed that this is a want of confidence in them.

Mr. DAVIN: You should leave it to the Dáil to decide.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: When it is proposed to appoint a Committee we cannot have persons names proposed unless it can be ascertained that these persons are willing to act. The question for Deputy Sir James Craig is whether or not his name remains in this amendment. He may rule that himself.

Sir JAMES CRAIG: May I ask to have my name removed, then?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Certainly. Is the Deputy's name to be removed, then?

Sir JAMES CRAIG: I am asking permission to do that.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Very good. Now, perhaps Deputy Gavan Duffy will inform us whether or not the other persons named, Deputy Richard Hayes, Deputy MacCartan and Senator Barniville have seen this amendment and consented to act on the Committee which the amendment proposed to set up.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I cannot say that they have all seen the actual words of the amendment but Deputy Doctor MacCartan certainly has. I asked Dr. Barniville and Deputy Hayes, and although I do not think he has seen the actual words, he agreed with the proposal.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I told Deputy Gavan Duffy yesterday that unless we got an assurance that the persons named in the amendment were willing to act it would be better to leave over the amendment. The amendment is one which could be moved in a different place in the Bill. It could be moved at a later stage in Committee even, and I suggested to Deputy Gavan Duffy that he should ascertain whether or not these people are willing to act and then arrange with me to move his amendment at a later point in the Bill, inserting the names of persons who have been acquainted and for whom he could speak. It appears to me that that has not been done, and I think we are not in a position to continue the discussion of the amendment now.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: May I point out with reference to what Deputy Sir James Craig has said, that the only reason why he wishes to withdraw his name is because this is being taken as a reflection upon the Executive Council, not because he did not approve of the principle originally. It is on account of something which has arisen in the course of the debate. I was very careful not to say anything which would introduce prejudice into this matter, and it is on account of something that has happened subsequently that the Deputy has asked to have his name removed.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Have the other gentlemen whose names have been mentioned yet been informed that the Executive Council would take the setting up of this Committee as a vote of no confidence in them?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question of order is quite simple. When a Committee of the whole Dáil, or when the Dáil itself, is asked to appoint certain persons on a Committee the Deputy who moves for such an appointment should be able to assure the Dáil that the persons whose names appear on the motion are willing to act, unless in certain cases where our own Standing Orders prescribe that a Deputy may be discharged from attendance and another Deputy substituted. That is not the case here, and it would have been much better had my original suggestion been adopted by Deputy Gavan Duffy, that the whole matter be postponed until full information was available. It cannot be gone on with now.

Mr. DAVIN: I suggest that the amendment itself says "or such of them as shall be willing to act."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Davin did not note the change. These words have been struck out by Deputy Gavan Duffy.

Mr. DAVIN: One of the Deputies whose name has been mentioned, has not been in this House for a considerable time.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I fail to understand why this matter is not simple. The words of which Deputy Davin speaks have been struck out by Deputy Duffy himself.

Mr. DAVIN: I did not know that.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment is out of order, and cannot be further considered.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Can the matter be brought up at another stage of this question so as to clear it up, as it has not been voted on yet.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If Deputy Gavan Duffy brings up the matter to me again I will consider that.

Amendment by Mr. GAVAN DUFFY:
"To delete paragraphs (a), (b), and (c), and to substitute therefor the following words:—'who is suspected of acting, or of having acted, or of being about to act, or of being capable of acting, or of cherishing a secret desire to act in any manner prejudicial to the public interest, as understood by such Minister.'"

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This amendment seems to me to be offered in a spirit of derision. It does not aim at amending the Bill, and the amendment is out of order.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I quite admit that the amendment is not wholly free from a spirit of derision, but at the same time—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Very good. That ends it.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Am I not entitled—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No, the Deputy cannot continue.

Mr. HOGAN: On a point of order—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I shall not hear any points of order on the amendment. Deputy Gavan Duffy must sit down. I have ruled this amendment is out of order, because it is offered in a spirit of derision. The Deputy admitted that he has put the amendment on the Paper as such. I shall hear no further discussion in the matter.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I desire to say—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No; I shall not hear Deputy Gavan Duffy. This amendment is out of order on Deputy Gavan Duffy's own showing and I shall not hear him. I have been told by Deputy Johnson that amendment No. 4 is not to be moved.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I move: "To delete paragraph (b)." The Section gives power to the Executive Minister to cause the arrest or detention of people in respect of certain reports from responsible officers. In paragraph (a) the report has to deal with persons who are suspected of being or having been engaged in the commission of offences specified in Part 1 of the Schedule. Paragraph (b), the deletion of which I am moving, deals with the detention of such persons as a matter demanded by military necessity. I submit military necessity can only refer to armed revolt, or to things that would partake of the nature of armed revolt. These things, I think, are fairly covered in Part 1 of the Schedule, which says "an armed revolt against the Government of Saorstát Eireann; threatening, coercing, assaulting or attempting to threaten, coerce or assault any person in furtherance of any such revolt; destroying, damaging or removing, or attempting to destroy, damage or remove any property in furtherance of any such revolt." I claim that paragraph (a) sufficiently covers the powers sought for by the Minister. Under paragraph (a) what is defined as a responsible officer can report that he has reasonable ground for suspecting certain people of being engaged in or concerned in the commission of some of the things which I have just read out. How does that differ from the matters referred to in paragraph (b), where the detention of such persons is demanded on the ground of military necessity? I think (b) is wider in certain respects than (a). I think it is so wide and so undefined that it is not a safe proposition at all. No one will deny the Executive Council or an Executive Minister such powers as are necessary in cases of military necessity. Military necessity is defined in the Schedule, and it is provided for in paragraph (a), but over and above that the Minister wants power for an Executive Minister or for a responsible officer, or the military authorities simply to say that even if citizens are not caught within the trap of paragraph (a) they can still be caught within the trap of paragraph (b), on the mere argument of military necessity.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Section (a) defines that a person may be arrested and detained in custody "in respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report from a responsible officer that there is reasonable ground for suspecting such person of being, or having been, engaged or concerned in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in Part I.

of the Schedule." The offences mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule are: "An armed revolt against the Government of Saorstát Eireann; threatening, coercing, assaulting or attempting to threaten, coerce or assault any person in furtherance of such revolt; destroying, damaging or removing or attempting to destroy, damage or remove any property in furtherance of any such revolt." Section (b) asks power also to detain people in respect of whom a report has been received that their detention is a matter of military necessity in the present emergency. There are people, and possibly they are amongst the most dangerous, who do not place themselves open to the suspicion of having been engaged or concerned in the commission of definite acts, and yet it can well be conceived that the detention of such persons may be considered a matter of military necessity. It might be invidious to give examples, but the people who have done the most harm for the past twelve months are not the people who themselves were concerned or engaged in the commission of acts of destruction. People who have gone around the country inciting young boys and young girls to the most wanton and the most criminal acts did not themselves take part in these acts. It is to be presumed that they considered their lives had a special value for this country; that they must in no circumstances be put to the hazard, but that the cannon fodder whom they used as material were of a different kind from them. Section (a) as I read it covers only people who are active, or reasonably suspected of being active. Section (b) covers a very different class of person, but whose detention might well be conceived to be at least as necessary as those covered by Section (a).

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I think the Minister if he reads the three paragraphs will find that the people he wants to get at will be brought within a fairly wide net in paragraph (c). It reads: "In respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report from the responsible officer or from the military authorities that the public safety is endangered by such person being allowed to remain at liberty." I think that fairly covers the class of people that he wants to get at on the lines he has just been mentioning. It seems to me that to maintain paragraph (b) in the Section is going a little beyond the intention of the Bill, to put it at its best. In (a) and (c) the Minister has got plenty of power to do what he says he wants to do. In addition to all those powers he wants—and I hope he does not want it merely because it will enable Courts to say that the matter is now in a statute—further power on the ground of military necessity. I would urge upon him to accept the amendment and to confine his powers to the powers given in paragraphs (a) and (c).

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am not convinced by the Deputy's argument. Paragraph (b) of that Section has a definite value. The situation in the country may improve progressively. On the other hand it may improve progressively, say over large areas, and remain bad in other areas. We must have that power if the situation in a particular county or a particular area demands it—the power of arrest without cause stated or even without cause shown. The Deputy will understand me when I say he might have normal or even sub-normal conditions through large tracts of the country and have a very lively situation amounting to a state of war in a particular area. In such an event we would claim the power and the right, and we ask the Dáil to endorse it, of arrest and detention of certain persons without cause shown to a Court or to the Advisory Committee mentioned in the Bill. In the case of the arrest of such persons it would be definitely stated that their arrest was made on military grounds and as a matter of military necessity.

In Section (a) the matter would be on a different footing; we would have to show that there was reasonable grounds or suspicion to justify arrest or detention of such persons. Section (c) is also a matter showing justification. Section (b) is meant to deal solely with the military position in the fullest sense. The Deputy will tell me that such powers exist ipso facto where there is a state of war. But you are dealing with what may prove to be a patchwork position. You cannot legislate for the kind of patchwork situation that may develop in the country. A clause saying that arrest and detention may be justified on grounds of military necessity is asked for in the Bill and I think it ought to be given.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided Tá, 12; Níl, 45.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabhán Uí Dhubhlú.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúilacháin.

Seamus Eabhuigil.
Liam Ó Dainbín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghreasa.
Risteárd Mac Fheoráin.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. MacCosgair.
Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Uáitéar Mac Cumhuill.
Seán Ó Maolruaigh.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Deasmhumbaín Mac Gearaith.
Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Sr Seamus Craig, Ridire, M.D.
Gearoid Mac Giobáin, K.C.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin MacNeill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.

Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Caoimhghlin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bullin.
Seumas Ó Dólaín.
Aindriú Ó Lannáin.
Liam Ó hAodha.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgain.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seumas Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhride.
Liam Mac Sioghaire.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Domhnall Ó Broin.
Seamus de Burea.

Amendment declared lost

Mr. MORRISSEY: I beg to move Amendment 6:—

In paragraph (b), line 51, after the word "emergency" to insert the words "for reasons stated in the report."

The object of the amendment is to compel the person authorising the arrest to certify exactly why he is doing so. As the paragraph stands, it is much too wide. It is much too easy to say that a person is dangerous without saying why he is dangerous.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I cannot accept this amendment, but I trust I will be able to satisfy the Deputy as to the reasons for the refusal. I would accept, for instance, Amendment No. 8, because that deals with paragraph (c). The amendment which the Deputy now moves deals with (b) and paragraph (b) is intended to cover military necessity—a state of war or armed revolt, whether strictly local or general—and military necessity—a state of war or armed revolt—absolutely excludes inquiry. It vests in the military authorities the power of and discretion as to arrest and detention, and rules out the possibility of inquiry by the Court. Military necessity is a temporary matter. There can be inquiry when it ends, but while it lasts there can be no inquiry. It would be worse than futile to insert in connection with paragraph (b) that the reasons for the arrest and detention must be stated in the report, seeing that the whole tenour and intent of that Sub-Section is bearing on a military situation, which the Courts have always held themselves debarred from inquiring into. I will accept Amendment 8.

Mr. JOHNSON: The statement that has been made by the Minister rather shows that this Sub-Section (b), or at least paragraph (b), is unnecessary. He has contended that this deals only with the case of military necessity. I think, elsewhere, he has stated in the same Bill that the Executive Minister is not to withdraw from the military authorities the power which they already have in excess of military necessity. He is asking us in this Section to duplicate the power which the military authorities already have and to hand similar powers over to an Executive Minister without defining which Executive Minister. He asked also that that Minister may have power to place in custody any person in respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report from the military authorities that his detention is a matter of military necessity. Surely, the whole case for the power that has already been exercised by the military authorities is that they did not require the sanction or approval of the Minister. Military necessity justified it all. The argument of the Minister would quite well justify a motion to delete this paragraph (b) entirely. But the Amendment that is moved simply asks that that Minister, if he is going to have these powers, should not have them unless the military authorities who ought to make representations to the Minister, can state the reasons. That is at least as important in paragraph (b) as in paragraph (c). The Minister has to decide. He may be a Minister under this Section who knows nothing at all about military affairs. Any Executive Minister receiving representation from a military officer that any person should be detained as a matter of military necessity may order it. The powers sought for in this are entirely too great to be handed over to any Executive Minister. It is surely bad enough when we have to admit in times of military necessity, and in a case of military necessity the military have been given these powers. To come again and to ask that the Executive Minister may cause the arrest and detention of a person because the Military officer or the Military Authority, who already had the power to arrest and to detain and do what they will, should send representations to an Executive Minister to have the same power to detain without giving any reason, is asking the Dáil to do more, I think, than the Dáil should do. It seems to be a very simple request that if the military did not feel justified in arresting and detaining under the powers which they already have, and which you do not intend to remove from them, that if they do not feel justified in acting on those powers, and they want to cover their responsibilities by asking the Minister to order their arrest, that they ought, at least, to state the grounds why they desire such arrest and detention. One has the right to assume that the military authorities refrain from exercising their powers in such cases of military necessity. They hesitate in that way and desire rather the cover of the civil administrator that they should satisfy that administrator with reasons stated. The Minister did admit that such a Minister may arrest persons who are at present at liberty, and that he shall require that the reasons shall be stated is also, to my mind, an admission that such reason ought to be given in respect of those whom they desire to detain as a matter of military necessity. There is obviously here a way of allowing the military to relieve themselves of certain responsibility and to hand over that responsibility to the Minister, and such a Minister may accede to the request of the military authorities without any reason being stated but simply that it is military necessity. To me it is quite an obvious deduction that if it is a matter of military necessity there is no need for them to go to an Executive Minister for the powers to do that which they claim and have been acting upon—the claim which they already have. The least that we ought ask for is that the reasons should be stated when any representations of that kind are made to the Minister.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: We could talk abstractions and split hairs on this matter indefinitely. But Deputies should realise that we are endeavouring to deal with an agreed situation, and that there are at the moment all the elements in the country which could create at any time a strictly military situation in, say Ballymacslattery, while the rest of the country slumbers in peace. We are endeavouring to pass out of a military situation, and it is not a duplicating of powers but the explicit preservation of the powers of the military in the event of a military situation arising that is sought. What we want is the explicit reservation of the powers of the military. I am advised that such an explicit preservation is necessary, lest the Courts should think that in legislating along the lines of this Bill that we are thereby depriving or seeking to deprive the military of the fullest powers in order to deal with situations that may arise. You may have in the country a patchwork situation. There are arms and explosives stored in various parts of the country and a purely localised military situation may arise. The military in that area must have power to make arrests, and not only to make arrests but to have the power of detention, into the legality of which the Courts may not inquire while that situation continues. It might well be that the persons arrested within the zone of a military situation might be sent elsewhere for detention, and what we are asking is that it should be made clear within this Bill that once an arrest is based upon military necessity the Courts should not hold themselves entitled to inquire into the legality of these arrests. This is important by reason of military necessity. The person arrested may be sent into a more peaceable area for detention. The arrest was made because a military situation existed within a certain area.

If Deputies will come down to bed-rock and take cognisance of the facts throughout the country—the facts within their own knowledge—they will realise that we ought not to legislate in any way that might be interpreted hereafter as depriving the military of all or any of the powers they ought to have in dealing with the state of war or armed revolt, remembering that a state of war or armed revolt may be confined to a very small area indeed, and it might take place at a time when it would be difficult to convince any Court that the country generally was in a condition of war or armed revolt. You may have purely localised difficulties and situations. In such a situation the military ought not to feel themselves fettered or hampered in the making of arrests, and the Courts ought not to hold themselves free to inquire into the legality of acts committed by the military in such a situation. That is all that particular Sub-section is intended to provide for.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 5, which was to delete paragraph (b), was lost. The last two speeches have been directed towards the question of the deletion of the paragraph. Amendment 6 deals with a more restricted matter, and I would like arguments to be directed towards that amendment specifically.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: It is to be presumed that the powers to be exercised by the Minister arising out of this military necessity would bring with them, I think, a new definition of military necessity if the Minister's arguments are correct. Now, the amendment would help the military to make that new definition of military necessity. I can conceive in a certain area a number of military officers receiving reports that a particularly emotional person at one or two meetings made some thrilling speeches threatening all sorts of things in the district or parish if certain things were or were not done, if the amendment were accepted declaring those statements to constitute military necessity. Everybody in the Dáil knows that there is at certain times a certain value to be put on certain statements; at other times a different value would be put upon similar statements. I can see that such statements would not in any ordinary reasonable person's mind constitute a real threat against the peace and would not, except by a very long stretch of a local officer's imagination, constitute a military necessity. If the amendment were agreed to and made part of the paragraph, such a claim as I have outlined when military necessity exists, would have to be stated by the military authorities to the Minister, and the Minister would be able to judge from other sources whether there was validity in the claim of the military that necessity existed. I could conceive other cases where it sometimes happens, even in the best regulated and most courageous and coolest commands, that people occasionally get the wind up. A case of ordinary shooting, not normally to be considered anything like a revolt against the State, could take place, and it could be claimed by the local military that it constituted a threat and such a breach of the peace as to bring about a military necessity. We could instance numerous cases like that; but in any of those cases, if the amendment were accepted, those reasons would require to be stated. A district might be quite peaceable with no particular incident happening in it, and there might be nothing except the bare statement of the military that a military necessity existed in the district, parish or county. On that bare statement any Executive Minister would be entitled to take action for detention. The Minister says he is advised that he requires explicit preservation of the powers of the military in the Bill; but has he not got the powers? The amendment is quite a reasonable one in my opinion, because it merely asks from the military some justification for their asking the civil authorities to exercise this power. It should not be in the power of any Executive Minister to accept the bare statement of the military authorities that in their opinion a military necessity exists in the district.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

General MULCAHY: The desire of the Executive is to retain the fullest possible power to make use of its military weapon to deal with the present situation. We do not want a new definition of military necessity. The Dáil is quite aware as to what military necessity is when we come up against it. We quite accept the definition of military necessity that the last speaker quoted for us—that is, armed revolt and things that would partake of the nature of armed revolt. Where you have a situation in the country that you have here when you are passing definitely from a position of very serious armed revolt, when you have a considerable number of arms scattered throughout the country, when you have a considerable amount of information as to what is passing underground amongst those people who have dumped their arms, the Executive cannot tie its hands in any way from utilising at least the full prerogative that has already been authorised to the military force. We are, as we have said, desirous of passing from a situation in which you will have to make use of military force to a situation that will be completely in the hands of the civil authorities. But we would prejudice the passing from one position to another if we allowed ourselves to be obstructed in any way, or if we gave any loophole at any critical time that would prevent the military force from being used. The situation has been such that the fullest possible use of the military force has unrestrictedly been made available as far as the power to use it goes, and it would be a serious disadvantage in a particular case if, in making use of the powers that derive to the Executive in the case of military necessity, you had to explain or make a statement as to why you considered that this was a special case of military necessity. It is the desire of the Executive, dealing in the most satisfactory way with the situation, not to prejudice itself when it realises that a military situation exists and to be in a position of doing anything it sets itself to do in a matter of military necessity, and that the military authorities have full power to act in their own particular way.

Mr. DAVIN: The Minister for Home Affairs, in submitting arguments for his opposition to this amendment, said that they were endeavouring to pass out of the military situation. Now the Minister for Defence comes along and states that the Executive are anxious to retain the fullest possible power to use the military weapon to deal with the situation. The two statements appear to be conflicting to an extent, at any rate. If they are not, there is certainly a very patent desire on the part of the Executive Council not to divorce itself from the power of military domination in dealing with the position that is now normal at any rate. The Minister for Home Affairs also said it would be well that Deputies, in speaking to this amendment, should confine themselves to facts within their own knowledge. Now, about six weeks ago I had occasion in my own area to enquire into the reasons for a number of arrests. I saw the local officers when I was down there, and may I say there was a change of officers about the time these arrests took place. I was personally acquainted with one individual who rendered very useful service, and held a very prominent position in the I.R.A. during the Anglo-Irish War. I had full knowledge of his movements, and had good reason to know that he had nothing whatsoever to do with any kind of opposition to the present Government. He was approached, at the beginning of the outbreak in June last year, to fight on the Irregular side, and he said quite frankly to the alleged leader of the Irregulars that at the time he took an oath to the Republic he never took an oath to shoot his neighbours. Now, this particular alleged leader was arrested about six weeks ago, and when arrested he was got in possession of notices ordering his neighbours not to pay their dog licences, whereas he himself had a receipt in his pocket for the payment of his own dog licence. When brought to the military barrack he made a number of statements against other people who did not follow his own lead, and upon the statement of that individual a number of law-abiding people, including the individual I refer to, was arrested. I went into the matter very closely, both locally with the military officers and in Portobello, and one of the reasons given for this other man's arrest was that he was six months on the run. Now, everybody in the area knew quite well that the man was living in his own house for six months, and was quite accessible to the military, who were as well aware of his movements as anybody else. I think an amendment of the kind proposed here would provide against a repetition of such arrests by the military authorities, and if individuals are arrested upon silly pretexts of that kind, they will at least be in a position to see who is the person who gave the information for their arrest and in support of their detention. After all, one has got to consider that there are a large number of men in prison at present on suspicion; it is admitted on all sides by members of the Executive Council; and when you consider that there are such men in prison, you have to consider the effect of their arrest and detention upon their relatives, and in some cases there is no genuine reason for their arrest. It is not only upon the individual himself that the effect will be caused; it will go right down through the family, and will bring in a number of people in opposition to the activities of the Government who otherwise would not be influenced in that direction. If reports, therefore, are available from the military authorities giving the reasons and the grounds for the arrest of the people, then it will be seen by the military headquarters that a case such as I refer to should not be relied upon, and should not be a reason for detention any longer than necessary of individuals such as I refer to. That is a case I know of my own personal knowledge, in which a number of wrongful arrests have taken place simply because of the spite of a local Irregular against a man because he would not follow his particular views. There may be many such cases, and I think it is desirable, in the interests of good government, that individuals of that kind should not be detained upon the questionable information of people who might be rightly arrested themselves.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: The Minister for Defence objects to the proposed amendment on the ground that it would obstruct the military. One should not be surprised to hear that objection, because it is the same objection that is made by the military chiefs in every part of the world where there is trouble.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

What, after all, is he asked to do? He is asked to consent to put into a private report the reasons justifying the detention of A.B. as a military necessity; that is all he is asked to do. The matter has a bearing upon another section which the Minister may have overlooked. It has a bearing upon the question of appeal. I consider the Appeal Committee here proposed to be nugatory, but I am in hopes that it will be changed before this Bill is finished, and that is why I allude to the matter. If the amendment proposed is accepted the Appeal Committee before whom men detained on military advice may come will have some little thing to go on; it will have the reasons alleged by the military authorities for the arrests to go upon. If the amendment is not accepted what will the Appeal Committee have? As far as I can see, the Appeal Committee will have absolutely nothing except the statement that Mr. A.B.'s detention was a matter of military necessity. Sub-section (2) of Section 4 makes provision for an appeal by a person detained by order of an Executive Minister or by the military authorities. So it is intended that persons detained by the military authorities shall have this right of appeal. But, suppose anyone takes the trouble to go before the Appeal Council after having been detained by the military authorities, what happens then? It is true the Minister has to make regulations, but there is nothing to indicate that he will make regulations compelling the military authorities to disclose their minds to the Appeal Council. That point was made perfectly clear by the Minister for Defence. What will happen, then, before the Appeal Council? The Minister for Defence or his representative will hand in his certificate saying A.B. is detained as a matter of military necessity in the present emergency, and that will close the matter. If the case of A.B. were to go before a Law Court, and if the Minister were entitled to intern on a vague reason of that kind, the Court would say, "We cannot go behind the Minister's certificate." The Court would decide that the case of A.B.'s detention was a matter of military necessity, and that they could go no further. But how much more will the Appeal Council, which is not a judicial body, be bound by the Minister's certificate to that effect? If the Appeal Council is nugatory now it will be much more nugatory if the cases of persons detained by the military as a matter of military necessity are not safeguarded in such a way that the detained person can find out what he is detained for, and that the Appeal Council can find out what he is detained for. It is not clear under this Bill whether a detained person is expected to prove his case before a case is proved against him before the Appeal Council, but if he has to prove nothing, if he only knows that he is detained in general terms on the grounds of military necessity, some such words as are proposed by the Deputy who moved this amendment are obviously essential. The words are essential if you are going to give the Appeal Council any power to make a real inquiry as to the detention of a person who, the military authorities say, has been interned on the grounds of military necessity. If you are going to set up an Appeal Council you must give that Council the right to inquire whether or not there is any military necessity for the detention of such a person. Otherwise, why appoint an Appeal Council? Is it unreasonable to ask that the Appeal Council should have the right to know exactly why so and so has been detained? If it is, they cannot decide his case, because with the Bill as drafted, and without this amendment, they will have nothing to go on except the mere statement that the military authorities consider that the man should be detained as a matter of military necessity, and the military refuse to say anything more. The result of that will be that the Appeal Council, in effect, will find themselves debarred from giving any judgment upon the case except that the man is properly detained because the military authorities say so. Surely that is not the intention of the Government, and surely they intend the Appeal Council to be able to make a real investigation in the case. If they do they must put something in the Bill to show that they intend to do that; they must put some words in the Bill giving the Appeal Council the power and the possibility of investigation which it does not get under the Bill as drawn.

General MULCAHY: I am happy to think that I am strengthened in my opinion with regard to the attitude we should take up by the opinion expressed by Deputy Gavan Duffy, that the same provisions as we propose were made by military authorities in all parts of the world. Many aspects of the present situation, however, were rushed upon us, so that we could not consider the experience in other parts of the world, and we had simply to deal with circumstances as they arose according to our own judgment of them and our own common sense. With regard to the Appeal Council, it is not a Council to which the Government will appeal to allow them to retain this, that or the other prisoner. This Appeal Council is the Council to which a prisoner, held for any reason, may make an appeal as to why he should or should not be detained. It seems to be in Deputy Gavan Duffy's mind that the Appeal Council, in this particular case, would be provided with such material as would enable it to try the Government in the matter, and not the prisoner. The Appeal Council, if presented with a case that a prisoner is interned because of military necessity, will approach that particular case from that particular point of view, and will take any statement the prisoner has to make in regard to his own connections or take his appeal and consider it as a whole. If there is an appeal then to the Minister for Home Affairs, and if there are any representations made to him, you will have his opinion as well as the opinion of the Minister for Defence in deciding whether the appeal is such as would warrant release or further detention.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: What material will the Minister for Defence present after that?

General MULCAHY: The Minister for Defence will present them with the fact that here is a prisoner that the military authorities have recommended to be interned as a matter of military necessity.

Mr. JOHNSON: I hope the Minister for Defence will pardon me if I remind him that he is speaking here as the Minister for Defence, and not as the head of the Army.

General MULCAHY: I never lose sight of that fact, and I hope the Dáil generally understands it.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am quite sure of that; but when the Minister defended the action of the military chiefs in Ireland by a reference to the military chiefs in all parts of the world he spoke of "we." I think we of the Dáil ought to remember that the very existence of an Assembly of this kind owes its origin and continuation to the necessity for defending the citizen against the Executive and against the military chiefs. That is the very reason for the existence of Parliament. The case made in favour of the amendment seems to me to be supported by every speech that has been made in defence of the Bill as it stands. The amendment asks that any report which the military authorities may submit to the Minister regarding the detention of a person, whose detention in the minds of the military authorities is a matter of military necessity, shall contain reasons why such a person should be arrested. That is a very mild and simple request. It is not asking that you should be able to produce proof that would satisfy a Judge and a Court as to the guilt of such person. That is not the claim made in the amendment at all. It is that when a report is made some reasons shall be given. There may be reasons, very blunt and very crude. They may be very unsatisfactory reasons to everybody else but the Minister who is appealed to, but at least they will be reasons that will, at some future time, be capable of being referred to, and that is an important matter. There should be at least some statement in support of the detention of the prisoner as to why representations have been made that he should be arrested. What is meant by a report? It is simply a formal demand that such a prisoner shall be arrested. It cannot be that, because the military, presumably, will be the persons arresting. Surely the very sense of the paragraph itself, which speaks of a report from the military authorities would be presumed to state some reasons? Otherwise it would be better to say a demand or a request. I think my memory serves me well when I recall that the President for one, and other Ministers also, I think, have made it clear—have assured the Dáil time after time—that amongst those who have been arrested and detained in the past months there is scarcely one against whom there is not good and sufficient reasons for his detention, though not, perhaps, evidence which would justify a conviction in a court. In several cases we have been assured that there are good and sufficient reasons which justify detention. All we desire, in this amendment, at any rate, is that some reasons should be stated for the arrest and continued detention. No, that is not even what we are asking. We are asking that when, at the instigation of the military authorities, an Executive Minister shall order an arrest and detention, the Minister shall have some reasons stated to him. One would think that the Minister would require to have some reasons stated before he would accede to such a demand. Surely we are not to accept the view that Ministers are to refuse to order the detention of a person when such a detention is demanded by the military authorities without having some grounds for refusing to detain, and in such a case will they not look for reasons? Similarly, when a Minister is asked to consent to the arrest and detention he will, I have no doubt, if he intends to maintain his position as a Minister, require that some reasons shall be stated. The Minister for Defence, if he is the Minister indicated, will require to have some reasons stated by the subordinate military officer. I shall be surprised to learn that he intends to require the arrest and detention of a man without having some reason. Are we justified in saying that no military officer is capable of allowing other reasons than military necessity to influence him? Even if there were one per cent. of possibilities of that, it would justify a requirement that a reason should be stated before such military officer would demand of a Minister that a particular citizen should be arrested and detained. Deputy Gavan Duffy had called attention to the fact that a later section provides for the establishment of an Appeal Council, and this Appeal Council is to be set up to inquire into the case of any detained person who applies, and report the result of their inquiries. The first thing the Appeal Council would ask, I would imagine, would be, "Why has this man been detained?" and would naturally look for the report for the grounds of his detention. It may be that such a person was known to associate with some other person. It may be that the military authorities had grounds for suspecting that such a person might be dangerous. Even those would be reasons stated as required by the amendment. But at least there could surely be no objection to asking that a Minister, before consenting to the arrest of a citizen of this State and the detention of such a citizen at the request or the demand of the military authorities, should require from those military authorities some semblance of a reason. The Bill, if allowed to pass in its present form, will mean that all that is required is for a military officer to demand that such a person shall be arrested, and that the Minister then may refuse without justification, or may consent without justification. He may refuse without a reason having been given him as to why the arrest should have been demanded, or may consent to the arrest without a reason having been given him by the military authorities. I would ask the Minister to reconsider his attitude on this. There is nothing that I can see which would justify the acceptance of this provision under paragraph (c), which does not apply in equal strength to the claim for a report to be presented in paragraph (b). I think, as a matter of fact, that it is in the interests of the Ministers—it is at least some protection for the Ministers—that they should be satisfied that the military authorities have some grounds, however slight, for calling for the arrest and detention of any person; and, as I have already said, in so far as those who have been arrested in the past have been detained, every statement made by Ministers has assured us that there have been good reasons for their detention—not evidence of guilt which could be proved in court, but at least grounds for detention. All that is asked in this amendment is that these grounds shall be stated. I do not think that there is any reasonable objection to the inclusion of that amendment in the Bill.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I might simplify this matter by taking a concrete case. Let us assume that within the six months which constitute the lifetime of this Bill the country generally has passed into a situation in which the Courts are prepared to say definitely that a state of war or armed revolt does not exist, and let us assume that after that time a military situation does arise in some Command—Athlone, let us say—localised to that Command area or even to a small portion of it, and the military authorities in that area take action in the course of which arrests are made. Prisoners, possibly, are sent up from that small area to Dublin or elsewhere. We are not prepared to give any Court or any Committee any higher ground for the detention of those prisoners than that their arrest and detention was deemed to be "a matter of military necessity arising out of the state of war or armed rebellion existing in the area bounded as follows." It does not follow that there will be no report. It is most likely that there will be a report. In point of fact, within the past ten or twelve months a report accompanied every person to the base to which he was sent, a report much on the lines of the report that the Deputy himself has suggested. But we are not willing, by setting it out here in this Bill, to base the legality of the arrest and detention of the prisoners on any statements that might be contained in that report.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is not required by the amendment at all.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: We are not prepared even to lend colour to the implication that the arrest is based on anything than on the statement of the military authorities of that area that they deem the arrest a matter of military necessity. You cannot place the military in a particular area in a situation when they may feel that the arrests they make or the things they do are going to be reviewed by a Court while that situation lasts, and any verdict or any pronouncement made upon them. It is universally recognised that you cannot do that, and that you ought not to do it, and we will not write into this section of the Bill words which might convey to anyone the idea that the contrary is the case. What is the reason for the arrest and detention? The reason is that the responsible military authorities in an area in which, mind you, a state of war or armed revolt exists consider that that person ought to be arrested and detained. That ought to be a sufficient reason while that situation exists. When it ends the question of the legality of the person's detention can be raised and inquired into, and appropriate action taken. But for the duration of that war situation there must and can be no such inquiry, and we will not lend semblance to the view that there can and ought to be such an inquiry by writing these words asked for into this particular sub-section. We are quite clear in our own minds as to that. I think Deputies ought to understand that we are dealing with a transition period; that we are trying to pass into a civil from a military situation. But, at the same time, all the elements and circumstances exist which make it necessary for us to preserve explicitly the powers that the military might well need to deal with the military situation that might crop up anywhere throughout the country. We are advised that such an explicit preservation of powers is necessary lest the Courts might think that in legislating along the lines of a Bill such as this the intention was in any way to limit or remove these powers.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The conclusions of the Minister might be valid if the statements he has made just now, and also earlier in the evening, were embodied in the paragraph, but they were not.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: We will not write in these words. We are quite clear as to the inadvisability of writing in in that sub-section (b) a reference to reasons stated in the report, because it might lend semblance to the view that the issue of arrest and release should turn and be weighed on some reasons set out in some report to the Ministry by a military officer. The detention will not be based on any other reason than that the responsible military authorities dealing with the military situation consider that that man ought to be arrested and detained. No Court, Committee or Tribunal will get, or ought to get, any other reason than that this is a military situation, this a military necessity, and is paramount and all sufficient while the military situation exists. If we were to write in these words into the sub-section it would read as follows:—"It shall be lawful for an Executive Minister to cause the arrest and, subject to the provisions of this Act, to order the detention in custody in any place in Saorstát Éireann of any person," and then, coming to Sub-section (b), "in respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report from the military authorities is a matter of military necessity in the present emergency, or (c) in respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report from the responsible officer or from the military authorities that for reasons stated in the report the public safety is endangered by such person being allowed to remain at liberty." We are not going to bring reasons stated in a report before any Court or Committee.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

and the answer to any Court or Committee that would attempt to inquire into the legality of the detention of A.B. would be that Major-General so and so, who is commanding in that area, in which a state of war or armed revolt exists, considers that that person ought to be detained.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: That reduces the whole thing. It was the point I was about to raise when I gave way to the Minister, because I understood him to say that it is no use flogging a dead horse, and that it is better to let the thing go to a vote. The conclusions which the Minister has come to would be valid if the statements he has been making were in this paragraph, but they are not. The Minister says they will not put any reasons before any Court. We quite understand that from the whole attitude of the Ministry on the Bill, that one of the purposes of the Bill is to enable the military and the Ministry to put up a case in the Courts when action is taken for habeas corpus that there is a statement by the military that a military situation exists. But the paragraph does not deal with the military situation at all. The paragraph deals with the military necessity for the detention of a person. The two things are quite different. Even in times of normal peace there is power in the paragraph given to the military, and in co-operation with the military to an Executive Council Minister to detain any person whom the military certified or whose detention they state is a matter of military necessity. It would be quite another and a different thing if it were a statement from the military that in an area in which this person resided or was carrying out activities there was a state of war or a military situation. But that is not the position of the paragraph at all. The paragraph only deals with the case of military necessity for the detention of a person, and that is mainly why reasons are wanted, and reasons ought to be stated, by the military why the detention of that person is a military necessity. We could all understand the position if the military in an area declared that in that area the normal law must be suspended because there was a military situation, a threat to the general peace, or a state of war or something approaching a state of war, such as ordinarily would be sufficient to satisfy the Judges in the courts. But that is not the case here at all. It is not the case, as the Minister suggests, that Major-General So-and-So states that a military situation exists——

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It might shorten matters if I intervened for a moment. I am quite prepared to add to that sub-section some words such as "whenever a state of war or armed revolt, local or general exists." As I see it, a military necessity can only arise out of a military situation. A military necessity cannot simply come as a bolt from the blue. It would always, in point of fact, be interpreted as capable of arising only from a military situation. What I am endeavouring to visualise here is that even after the Courts would have considered that a state of war and armed revolt no longer existed in the country, there might be a local eruption in which arrests would have to be made, and there could be no question of circumstantial statements of reasons for those arrests. Those arrests must be based sheer on military necessity. I am prepared to add to that Sub-section (b) words making it quite clear that that sub-section is only intended to cover a state of war or armed rebellion, be it local or general.

Mr. JOHNSON: The offer of the Minister certainly removes some of the objections, because I think he now sees that the Bill as framed merely would require an understanding between an Executive Minister and the military authority as to what was a military necessity to authorise them to arrest and detain any citizen. The military necessity might well be a matter concerning discipline in a regiment or the offence of any rather flush individual who wanted to treat the soldiers. It might be a military necessity to keep discipline to a satisfactory state, and all that would be required would be for the Minister who happens at the present time to be also the head of the Army to agree with himself that such a person should be arrested. The Minister in charge of the Bill will please bear in mind that while he has in mind, no doubt, six months, and a continuation of the outlook, shall I say, of the present Ministers, when you put a Bill upon the Statute Book anything may arise in regard to a change of Executive authority.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: That, of course, is a platitude.

Mr. JOHNSON: Anything may arise and new persons might wield the new power with an entirely different spirit. We are legislating for whoever may be in power within the next six months, and it is well that we should safeguard the citizens from whoever may be in power. Certainly the offer of the Minister will remove some of the evil. It will not remove the desirability of having the reasons stated in any such report. But with the insertion of those words some of the dangers of the clause, as it at present stands, will undoubtedly be removed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: What is the position? Is the Minister going to move this amendment now or later?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I will move it on Report.

Mr. DAVIN: In dealing with this Bill or this amendment you have to keep in mind the situation created by the arrest of men previous to the adoption of this amendment, and I would like to know whether the Minister for Defence is prepared to produce the report from the local officer in the case of those who have been arrested since the state of war could be said to have passed away.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Neither the paragraph nor the amendment refers to persons already in custody.

Mr. DAVIN: I said we would have to bear that in mind.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, but we must keep to the amendment. Neither the paragraph proposed to be amended nor the amendment goes into that question.

Mr. DAVIN: The Appeal Council might be used by—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Appeal Council comes on later. We can discuss it when we come to it.

Mr. DAVIN: I think the production of a report has a bearing on the prisoners before the Appeal Council.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question of prisoners already in custody does not arise at all. This is power to order the detention of a person in respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report.

Mr. DAVIN: Perhaps the Minister is already in a position to report in regard to a person who is now interned.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There are going to be any amount of opportunities of raising this point on this Bill. This is not the opportunity, and the Deputy cannot go on.

Mr. DAVIN: I want to ask the Minister in charge of the Bill what check there is on a report received from a local officer as to the correctness or otherwise of that report. What check is there at the headquarters of the Army upon the reports, or what opportunity is there of proving that the report is incorrect? If people are arrested as a result of wrong information supplied from the local military authorities, no provision is made for a remedy. I think this is an opportune moment to ask the Minister what provision he intends to make to deal with a case such as the one I cited, and which may not be an exceptional case.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy should put down a question for the Minister for Defence on that subject.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Deputy Morrissey, who moved this amendment, is not present at the moment, but I understood from him before he went out that if the Minister would add the words which he read out a short time ago he would be prepared to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Did I understand the Minister to say that he was accepting Amendment 8?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Has the acceptance of Amendment 8 any effect on Amendment 7?

Mr. O'CONNELL: No. I move Amendment 7. "To delete paragraph (c)." In paragraph (a) of this section the Minister has taken power to arrest and intern any person who is suspected of being engaged in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in the Schedule. In paragraph (b) further powers are taken in case of military necessity to detain any person—that is, when a military situation or a state of war exists in an area. In paragraph (c) the powers that are claimed seem to me to be altogether too vague and too wide. It provides that any person may be arrested and detained on the authority of a responsible officer. And we must remember what the definition of "responsible officer" is in the Bill. He is a military officer not below the rank of captain. If any such officer makes a statement to the effect that the public safety is endangered by reason of a certain person being allowed to remain at liberty that person can be arrested and detained. That, in my opinion, is a very serious inroad on the liberty of the subject. It does not require that the person to be imprisoned or detained shall have been engaged in war or in preparing for armed revolt. Then, different officers may have different views and ideas as to what constitutes a danger to the public safety. I could quite conceive a case in which a politician, advocating a special and possibly peculiar brand of politics, decided to descend on a district and put up posters calling on the people of the locality to attend a public meeting. It is conceivable that the local captain or superintendent of the Civic Guard might possibly think that this politician was a danger to the public safety, and ask that he should be interned. This paragraph, coming after the two paragraphs we have just dealt with, is altogether too vague, and gives altogether too great power to the Executive Council, and also places too much power in the hands of subordinate military officers. It is a dangerous infringement of the liberty of the subject, and I move for the deletion of the paragraph.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Bill admittedly constitutes an infringement of the liberty of the subject under certain circumstances. The case that is put forward for it is that a situation exists in the country which demands that such powers be conferred on the Executive, in the reasonable hope and pious expectation that they will be used with due discretion and discrimination. Now, as to A, B and C, A and C may be taken as being rather civil. B deals with a military situation and deals only with arrests made by the military as a matter of necessity arising out of such a situation. Therefore, let us compare A and C. A confers the power of arrest with regard to a person concerning whom the Minister shall have received a report from a responsible officer that there is reasonable grounds for suspecting such person of being or having been engaged or concerned in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in Part 1 of the Schedule, and Part 1 of the Schedule deals with armed revolt against the Government, threatening, coercing, assaulting, or attempting to threaten, coerce or assault any person in furtherance of any such revolt, and destroying, damaging or removing, or attempting to destroy, damage or remove any property in furtherance of any such revolt. C differs from that. It does not deal with armed revolt or with definite acts of violence against person or property, but conceives the possibility of a person embarking on a course which would constitute a danger to the State, which is in its infancy, and which is barely recovering from a criminal onslaught more bitter and more determined than any onslaught that took place against previous administrations.

An Leas-Cheann Comhairle at this stage took the Chair.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Deputy O'Connell put a hypothetical case of a man advocating a peculiar class of politics in a particular area. Let me put a hypothetical case. Suppose a combination of men were to arise in the country propagating the non-payment of anything—a most popular creed, because it is in accord with the natural leaning of human nature—for instance, the non-payment of rates or rents or taxes or shop debts. That does not constitute an armed revolt against the Government of Saorstát Éireann. It does not constitute any violent assault on the person or any destruction or removal of property, and yet it would constitute a problem that would threaten the very existence of the State and the very foundations of society and civilisation. In such circumstances I would deem it eminently justifiable, in all the existing conditions in the country, to arrest and detain, for a period persons preaching such a doctrine. I will accept Amendment 8, which provides that the reasons for the detention shall be set out in the report in regard to paragraph C. But beyond that I could not meet the Deputy. I consider that powers of this kind are necessary in the peculiar circumstances of the moment.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: This is one of the most pernicious clauses—I refer to Section 1 (c)—in a very mischievous Bill, and the Minister has not said much to defend it. I could have understood the Ministry, however much I might disagree with them, coming before the Dáil and saying, “There are certain people whom we ask power to intern for specific reasons.” That is not the position taken up by the Minister. The position is, he wants to be able to intern more people at present at liberty, without any reason given, unless you can call a reason a vague statement that a detective officer thinks a person is a danger to the public safety. This is not the kind of moderate Bill that one could have understood a Ministry, taking the views the present Ministry does take, introducing at this stage of the proceedings. If this particular section is examined, it will be found to be nothing more or less than a vote of confidence in the military authorities. The previous sub-section dealt with further arrests by the military authorities. Why should it be necessary for civil authorities to intervene in what is pre-eminently a military matter? After all, any reasons which would justify internment in time of civil war or in the subsequent period are reasons which partake of a military character. You cannot justify recourse to procedure of this kind for other than military reasons, and it seems to me an amazing thing, after the ten months’ fight that we have had, for the civil authorities to come before the Dáil and ask that they should have the power which the military authorities have been exercising as a matter of military necessity. It cannot be a matter of civil necessity that the civil authorities would exercise this power. It is essentially a military matter, and why do the civil authorities intervene?

I cannot regard this sub-section as otherwise than an attack upon, and as an expression of want of confidence in, the military authorities, unless it is that imitation is the sincerest form of flattery. The effect of this sub-section is to put into the hands of the C.I.D. officer the power to have any person interned. That is what the Dáil is being asked to agree to on the grounds that the liberty of such persons endangers the public safety; and observe that no court will be entitled to go behind the certificate of the detective officer. His statement will be enough, with such reasons as he may give. Whatever the reasons, be they good or bad, if this Bill passes no Court can go behind them, because the Dáil will have invested the C.I.D. officer with the powers now asked. This is a signal instance of the belief of the present Ministry that force is the cure for everything. “Force and more force.” Where is it going to lead them? They do not even suggest any particular specific reasons which might in a given case justify the civil authority in intervening. I do not imagine the existence of any such reason, but if there be any case in which the military could be told that this affair is no affair of theirs, and in which the Dáil could be told that the civil authority is to have unheard-of powers, that case should be specifically made clear. Why does the civil authority ask for those extraordinary powers? In an earlier stage of the debate An Ceann Comhairle ruled that we could not have an amendment making mockery of the Executive. That I quite understood, but happily we are allowed to criticise the Executive in debate. I put it to the Executive and to the Dáil that if a case can be made for such a provision as this Sub-section (c), Section 1, we ought to have something definite instead of this vague statement that any C.I.D. officer of certain rank may take action if he thinks that So-and-so remaining at liberty would be a danger to the public safety. In truth and in fact, is not the provision which we are asked to adopt equivalent to saying that any person may be arrested who is suspected of acting, having been or being about to act, or of being capable of acting or cherishing a secret desire to act in any way the Minister or his servants consider a danger to the public safety? What is the difference? Assume your C.I.D. man does his duty to the best of his ability; is he a proper judge of whether or not A B is to be deprived of trial before a Court? If A B is to be interned for military reasons, let the military deal with him. It is a highly dangerous precedent to allow the civil authority to intervene in a matter of this kind. It undermines the whole principle upon which civil liberty, which we ought to have in this case, is based in the Constitution. What business has the civil authority in intervening? It is not merely a question, you will observe, of people already in prison. It may be hundreds and thousands more. There is no limit. On what grounds are those powers to be given? Because certain officers think that certain people are a danger to the public safety? That is not good enough, strong enough, nor definite enough. If the Dáil passes a Bill of this kind, it is entitled to something more definite and concrete. The Minister asks us to look at the concrete facts. I ask him to make his Bill more concrete. If he desires to force this Bill through the Dáil, let him do himself the justice of putting concrete proposals in for an extraordinary and utterly abnormal Bill. We had lately a statement from the Publicity Department of the Government to the effect that some 300 persons per week had been released during the past four or five weeks, but we had no statement showing how many persons had been arrested during that time. Is it not a fact that a good many are being arrested, and is it not a fact that it is intended to arrest a good many more?

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

Mr. HOGAN: Certainly.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Then that is a fact? If you are going to arrest many more, you must justify yourselves in so doing. If it be necessary to arrest many more, it should not be impossible for the State to show cause. It is not showing cause. Simply because such-and-such a police officer thinks it is desirable to intern a person, that person is interned.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy complains that internment should be ordered on the report of the C.I.D. officer. What is wrong with the C.I.D. officers? Have they ever made a mistake?

Mr. DAVIN: Hundreds.

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy laughs and asks for a concrete instance. Let him give a concrete instance. When have the C.I.D. made mistakes?

Mr. JOHNSON: Look up your own returns.

Mr. HOGAN: It is an easy and a cheap thing to get up here as a super-idealist and make charges against the C.I.D. or the military; but I hope there is sufficient sense left in the Dáil and sufficient recollection and remembrance—I know there is sufficient sense and recollection in the country—to know the work the C.I.D. did for the last nine months. The C.I.D. was the force that prevented the cur from burning his neighbour's house. The C.I.D. here in Dublin, more than any other force of the same size, prevented the cur—and I use the word expressly—from burning his neighbour's house and calling himself a Republican, and from going into a shop and robbing an unfortunate girl who was behind the counter, and doing all this as a Republican and an idealist.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is this on the amendment?

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Gavan Duffy attacks this Clause because we are giving power to a C.I.D. officer.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: A "responsible officer."

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: And in time of peace.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I take it that the C.I.D. officer referred to is a "responsible officer."

Mr. HOGAN: This is not a tour de force of mine at all. I put it as hard facts.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: It is more like fireworks.

Mr. HOGAN: Fireworks is a good word to use in this connection. The C.I.D. did more to stop the fireworks than any other force in the country. Then we are told that force is no good in dealing with these matters. Is it or is it not a fact that we are dealing with a force of which we have had nine months' experience? They are men who have done their duty like men, men who have done a great deal for the things that are above any political ideals—decency, honesty and manliness between man and man. Now, you come to the end of it and you are told in a superior tone of voice that the C.I.D. are a sort of filibusters, whose word nobody should take, that they have not been in Oxford and Cambridge, that they have not University degrees—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Or a trousers press.

Mr. HOGAN: Yes, or trousers presses, and hence ought not to be trusted. The C.I.D. have shown themselves reliable men. They have shown that they are competent to do their duty, and they have done more for common honesty and decency than any other force.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: We are not discussing the C.I.D.

Mr. HOGAN: That is the very point that has been made—that the C.I.D. are not responsible officers, and that they are not men who should be allowed to give a report on which the Minister should act. If Deputy Gavan Duffy is allowed to make this point, surely, in common decency, someone should be allowed to answer him.

Mr. DAVIN: This is not the Second Dáil.

Mr. HOGAN: This is not the Second Dáil. I want to know did one of the Labour men stand up and protest when Deputy Gavan Duffy was attacking the C.I.D.?

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order. did he attack them?

Mr. HOGAN: Yes, by implication. Deputy Gavan Duffy does not usually attack people directly; he does it by implication.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I am so used to those reflections, that I do not comment upon them.

Mr. HOGAN: We are told force is no remedy. Why should we be asked to argue that at this hour of the day? Was force a remedy for what was going on for the last year? What remedied that? Did force stop the house burning? Will force stop the criminal who wants to get rich quick? I was attacked even in the Dáil for confounding Republicanism with ordinary criminality. I am trying not to do that. This Bill is dealing with ordinary criminals.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: It does not say so.

Mr. HOGAN: This aims at dealing with men who burn their neighbours' houses and who rob banks. We are told force is no remedy. Why we could be told that, after the things of the last six months, beats me.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I said force was no remedy in time of peace.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Gavan Duffy, of all the Deputies in the Dáil, cannot understand how it is that the civil authorities want legislative authority and legislative power to intern without trial. He cannot understand that. He says the military could do it. I remember Deputy Gavan Duffy getting up in the Dáil time and time again and pointing out that we should have passed legislation for the purpose of enabling the military to deal with these matters, that they had no power to intern the people last January and last October and December in the height of what we will call "the war." We were told that the military had not this power, that the Dáil should have passed legislation to give them the power. Now apparently that is all right. Times are changed. We want a different thing now, and hence admissions can be made in respect of what happened a couple of months ago. But we were told then that the military had no power to deal with these things without legislation. It is within the recollection of every Deputy here that the Deputy said these things. Now it is admitted that the military have that power in time of war. The Executive Council will be very glad to hear that. They will be very glad to hear that we were perfectly right, while the war was on, in interning prisoners, notwithstanding all that Deputy Duffy and others said to the contrary.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: If this is intended to be an interpretation of what I said, the Minister should state expressly what I did say. I need hardly point out it is no such thing.

Mr. HOGAN: I am stating expressly what was said, and let the Deputy contradict it if he can.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: It is not worth contradiction.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Gavan Duffy got up here in the Dáil while the war was on, in my recollection, and pointed out the necessity for legislation in order to enable the military to intern without trial. Everyone remembers that. Now he tells us it was all right. We are glad to have that cleared up. He says the military had the right. Now he cannot understand why we should not leave this thing to the military, why we would not leave internment to the military and not give power to the civil authorities to do it. He knows it already—because a state of war does not at the moment exist. Perhaps I am going a little too fast in saying that—but in a month's time a Judge may find as a fact that a state of war will not at that moment exist. Hence the military will have no power to intern. The Deputy is a lawyer, and knows as well as I do the meaning of [Mr. Hogan.] that. If a Judge should find in a month or two that at that moment a state of war does not exist, every lawyer knows what the result would be. What are we providing for? The Irregulars, through their leaders, have stated that the arms which were dumped all over the country are to be used at the first opportunity. We all know that it is quite possible, and even probable, that a momentary peace may be organised with a view to getting out the prisoners in order to begin again. They have stated they are going to begin again. They have examined the statutes very carefully, and, like Deputy Gavan Duffy, they know that if in a month's time the Judge decides that a state of war does not exist, then a habeas corpus application would have to be granted and the prisoners would have to be released. They would then be all out through the country, including the gentleman who wrote out asking his pal to get him a gun or two, that he wanted to interview a few bank managers and railway clerks. He, too, would be out, and would have his gun. It would be an infringement of the liberty of the subject to keep them in. We dare not advert to the fact that these men might get out in a month and might start again in two months and do what they are stating they are going to do. That is all too subtle for Deputy Gavan Duffy, and he cannot follow it. In fact, he is putting up the very case that was put up by themselves.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Perhaps it is hardly worth while my replying to the furrage we have listened to from the Minister, but in case anyone else is misled I should like to make it perfectly clear that what I said some months ago was that the military had no law for internment, and if they required to intern people they should have got legislative sanction for it. But the issue now is this. If it be a fact, which I do not admit, that thousands of people have got to be interned—more people besides those now in—it is for the military and not the civil authority to deal with that. If internment be a necessity at the present time I submit it should be internment by the military and not by the civil authority. That does not in the least mean, I think, that the military were right in omitting to get the sanction of the Oireachtas in any steps they considered necessary in the past. I think they behaved very wrongly in that matter, and see now what is to be done in the future:—Now that we have comparative peace we are putting up the civil authority to do the work which is essentially of a military character.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I think there is little to be gained by playing with words. The military had no law for internment in the past, and the Deputy knows, few better, that they required no law for internment in the past; and he knows, too, that there was sufficient calls upon the time of Parliament to make it a futile thing, and little short of a criminal thing, to take up the time of Parliament in asking for power that was inherent in the military by virtue of the situation that existed in the country. Now he asks why should the civil authority ask power for internment, knowing well that the military authorities have no power whatsoever to make an arrest save in time of war or armed rebellion.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Unless the Dáil gives it.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Save in time of war or armed rebellion. If within six months, when this Bill will be law, a situation arises in which the Courts hold that a state of war or armed rebellion does not exist, the military will have no inherent powers of arrest. We are attempting to pass from the military situation, and to pass from the use of the military to the more general use and functioning of the civil machine. Why should the civil authorities cease to intern? Why should there be civil internment at all, the Deputy asks. Well, the situation in the country is known to every Deputy. Deputy Gavan Duffy also knows it, and he knows that we have on hand twelve or thirteen thousand prisoners, and there is a clamour for their release. If we are denied the powers of internment, and very full powers of internment, we will be driven into a very much more conservative attitude in regard to releases than we would otherwise adopt. We cannot gamble with the public safety, and we are not entitled to do so; but in individual cases we can make experiments and we can watch results. But we can, given the powers of internment set out in this Bill, release people whom, if we had not these powers, we would deem it our duty to detain.

Of course, all that may seem very crude to a Liberal like Deputy Gavan Duffy. We have been met by the Deputy not with any helpful or constructive criticism of the Bill, but simply with amendments that can only be described as expressions of stupid malignity. I do not know what is our offence.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I ask that that expression be withdrawn. It is most offensive and wholly unwarranted.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I think these words should be withdrawn.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Not very clever malignity.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: That is just as bad. I object to being charged by the Minister with malignity, because I do my duty in this Dáil as I understand it. I think it ought to be withdrawn.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: We have been charged, and recriminations have been used——

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I ask the Minister to withdraw these words. It does not tend to harmonious proceedings if Deputies on the one side or the other cast personal aspersions.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Yes, I withdraw these words, pointing out that recriminations have been used against us for doing our duty in the Executive Council, as we saw it, and I never could understand what our offence was, unless it was that we managed to save the ship from foundering after the Deputy had slipped overboard with a lifebuoy.

Mr. JOHNSON: I wondered, when the Minister for Agriculture was speaking, whether I had been translated. I remember last week's debate, and I think of the sweet reasonableness of the Minister in his constructive moods. I will say this: I have no desire to follow him into a long discussion, for it might be a long discussion, if we were to try to examine the arguments that took place in earlier debates, as he did to justify the position that was taken by one Deputy or another, and compare it with the position taken by the Ministers at the time. If he desired to do that, we might continue this debate for a very long time. I would like to say that I much prefer the Minister for Agriculture dealing with agricultural problems than the Minister for Agriculture dealing with problems of rough and ready law.

Mr. HOGAN: Does the Deputy suggest that I have not been consistent at any time, and, if so, when?

Mr. JOHNSON: Consistent in abuse, and in advocacy of rough and ready methods of law.

Mr. HOGAN: Consistency is a virtue.

Mr. JOHNSON: No. Consistency in evil things is a vice and not a virtue.

Mr. HOGAN: I agree.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister for Home Affairs argued against the amendment by stating the case of the continued detention of internees. He showed there was danger in wholesale, indiscriminate releases.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I think the Deputy misunderstood me. I said minus these powers, which we are asking for in the Bill, we would be compelled to adopt a much more conservative attitude with regard to releases than we could otherwise adopt.

Mr. JOHNSON: His argument was based on those at present in custody, and on a much more conservative attitude than was outlined or foreshadowed in the Bill with respect to the internees. I would remind the Dáil that we are dealing with the proposal to make it lawful for an Executive Minister to cause the arrest and the detention of a person in respect of whom such Minister shall have received a report from a responsible officer, or from the military authorities that the public safety is endangered by such person being allowed to remain at liberty. These are persons that are at liberty that we are dealing with.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: They may be within six months.

Mr. JOHNSON: We are not dealing with internees or with people under arrest.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Surely we are dealing with people who may be at liberty within the six months during which the Bill runs.

Mr. JOHNSON: We are dealing with persons who may have been arrested once or twice in their lives. It may have been they were arrested two months ago, or it may be ten or fifteen years ago. They may be interned now, or they may have been in jail during some time of their life, or they may never have been in jail, but we are dealing with the arrest of persons who are at liberty. This section is not confined in any way to persons who have been adjudged guilty, or who have been suspected of being guilty, of an offence of any kind in the past. The proposition is that the Minister shall be entitled to arrest and detain in custody "any person in respect of whom the Minister shall have received a report from a responsible officer or from the military authorities that the public safety is endangered by such person being allowed to remain at liberty." The responsible officer has been defined in the Bill as "an officer of the military forces of Saorstát Éireann not below the rank of captain or an officer of the police forces established by or under the control of the Minister for Home Affairs not below the rank of superintendent." Now, an officer of the rank of captain may be responsible and quite capable of fulfilling his responsibilities in respect of his military duties, but we have not the right to expect that his experience as a military officer of the rank of captain will enable him to discriminate in the way that is necessary in respect of citizens in their public activities. We are asked to empower the Minister to arrest and intern any citizen who is reported by the responsible officer—that is, by a military captain—to be a danger to the public safety. That is serious enough, and I ask the Dáil to bear in mind that there is nothing in this clause respecting armed rebellion, a state of war, turmoil, insurrection, or any of these things that the mind has been accustomed to, but this is in addition to these things which are dealt with in the previous paragraph. Now we come to the question of the right of internment of any citizen if the Minister is told by a captain in the Army or a superintendent of police that the continued freedom of any citizen is a danger to the public safety. Then the Minister's orders, without any process of law, shall entitle that citizen to be arrested and interned. But bear in mind the kind of example the Minister for Home Affairs, in his first speech on this Bill, put forward to the Dáil as his justification for these powers being granted to him. Bear in mind that it deals with public safety, because public safety is the requirement in this section. The Minister gave as an example which would justify him, he said, in interning any citizen, that the citizen might be engaged in a no-rent campaign, or a campaign to pay no debts. I could not help thinking of the speech by Deputy Gorey a couple of weeks ago, almost a few days ago, when he said that he was going to advise his people not to pay these rents. Is that, I ask, against the public safety? The Minister says "Yes."

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I think it is scarcely fair of the Deputy to misrepresent what I said. I think that to some extent it is a conscious misrepresentation. I pointed out that, on the one hand, you are asked to grant powers of internment for positive acts against the State, such as armed revolt, threatening, coercing, assault, or the attempt at armed revolt; destroying, damaging or removing property, or the attempt to destroy, damage or remove property. I pointed out that conceivably a campaign as dangerous to the State as any that might take place along these lines could arise, and I pointed to such negative action, if you can speak of negative action, as a campaign against meeting liabilities, a campaign against the payment of rates, taxes, shop debts or rents. I merely mentioned rents as one amongst seven or eight such liabilities. That example was simply thrown out casually, but I do not depart from it. I do say that if a serious situation of that kind were to arise it would be the duty of the Executive to take action against it, dealing with it as a situation which menaced the stability and the very existence of this young State.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister has proved my words. There was no conscious or unconscious misrepresentation, because he has repeated what he had said earlier, and has repeated what I was explaining to the Dáil, namely, that he would consider the agitation against the payment of rents, the payment of rates or annuities or any lawful debt as a justification for arresting and interning a person advocating these measures. Following the advice of Ministers so often given to the Dáil, and particularly to Deputies on these benches, and coming down to bedrock, I immediately referred in my mind to Deputy Gorey's advice, which every member of this Dáil has given at one time or another under different circumstances; and I ask the Dáil to bear in mind how near ordinary political and economic and industrial agitations might be to the advice which Deputy Gorey has given—

Mr. GOREY: On a point of order—

Mr. JOHNSON: And the statement he made, which is within the regulations of the Dáil and on the records of the Dáil.

Mr. GOREY: I think, before the Deputy quotes me, he had better get the Official Report and quote me properly.

Mr. JOHNSON: If Deputy Gorey denies or withdraws anything he said I am quite prepared to accept it.

Mr. GOREY: I am not denying anything.

Mr. JOHNSON: What I am referring to is the statement Deputy Gorey made.

Mr. GOREY: Or twisted your way.

Mr. JOHNSON: The statement Deputy Gorey made is sufficient to illustrate my argument that there is a very thin line between the agitation which Deputy Gorey would support and which I would support him in, and the agitation of a kind which the Minister would consider to be detrimental to the public safety. The Minister considered any such political agitation as detrimental to the public safety, and it is a very easy thing for a Minister to think an agitation detrimental to the public safety. A police officer or a military captain advises that this man responsible is a nuisance, and ought to be interned, and the Minister is to be given power to arrest and intern that man or woman, who may be conducting a political agitation inconvenient to the Minister, to the police, to the military officers in the area. There is a very thin line indeed between the agitation which Deputy Gorey would advocate or that I would advocate or conduct, and what the Minister for the time being might consider to be detrimental to the public safety. A shipowner might take it into his head to stop the running of his ships, and to advocate that other shipowners would do likewise, and close down traffic in any part of the country. He might advocate that. A Minister, perhaps not the Minister, but a Minister who might be, within six months, on those Benches, might say that this action is detrimental to the public safety, and all that is required is that this owner should be interned. A Labour leader, head of a Trade Union, might advocate a strike in a particular industry which might cause dislocation, has very often indeed been denounced as being detrimental to the public safety. All that is required, if we give the powers in this Bill, is that a police officer or a military captain shall say, "Such and such a person is a nuisance; have him arrested; he is a danger to the public safety," and we are giving power for his internment. The Minister may say, of course, that there is no intention of doing any such thing, but that is not what is written down in the bill. In this clause as it stands all these powers are to be given to the Minister. "The public safety" is a term capable of the widest interpretation. We have already by inference excluded from this clause the question of turmoil of a physical kind, armed rebellion, revolt, insurrection, destruction of property. All these things are excluded from this. What is meant by "the public safety"? What is the definition? The Minister has to decide what is the public safety. There are innumerable instances that might be given as to dangers to public safety. I am sure if one could take the files of the Dublin and Belfast newspapers any time within the last ten years one could see in them interpretations of what "public safety" required, and if there is to be any public life, if there is to be any political agitation, if there is to be anything in the nature of living political life in the country, the powers that be at the moment at any time will declare that some of the people conducting those agitations are acting detrimentally to the public interest, that they are a danger to the public safety. We are asked to concede for six months, the Minister will say, power to the Minister to intern any person who may be represented to him as being a danger to the public safety. Bear in mind we are outside the realm of military activity; we are outside the limit of turmoil of a physical kind. Is there, then, no chance, even within six months, of dealing with such person under any of the existing Acts? Does the existing law not provide you with all the safeguards necessary for this kind of person? I have been looking through the Restoration of Order in Ireland Regulations and the Defence of the Realm Act. Well, they are mother's milk compared with this.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Hear, herr.

Mr. JOHNSON: They are the mildest of repressive measures that could be imagined after this. When Britain was expecting invasion and feared all kinds of sinister and disruptive activities within her own borders, all they deemed it to be reasonable to ask their own Parliament, when they could have got anything, was to order a person to be placed in a particular area, and, on disobedience, to intern him. But we are asked to give the Minister power to intern if it is thought by a military officer that a particular citizen may be a danger to the public safety if allowed to remain at liberty. In the Minister's view it would be eminently justifiable to arrest and detain any person as an enemy of the public safety who might be engaged in a campaign advising the people not to pay rents. I think that when the Minister interprets the power to be given him in this clause on the first discussion of the Bill as he has done, what is going to be thought of his interpretation of the powers if he happens to be up against difficulties when the Bill is an Act? The mind of the Minister is revealed in his defence of this provision. He desires power to arrest and intern inconvenient persons, and I say that the Dáil ought not to give such powers. The Minister for Defence dissented when I made the statement earlier that the very existence of Parliament was a proof of the necessity for defending people against the actions of an Executive. Executives seldom or never enter into their responsible duties with a determination to restrict liberties. It is when they come up against difficulties that they are impelled by the circumstances of the case to do so. They seek the line of least resistance; they are impelled to fall back, to see what powers they have to restrain, to coerce, to imprison, and it is the business of the Parliament to limit those powers as much as possible in the interests of the liberty of the citizen and the liberty and safety of the State. I submit that there are ample powers in the ordinary law, using the ordinary Courts, to protect the public safety against dangerous persons, and that the Dáil ought not, in justice to itself and for the public safety, give powers to a Minister to intern people merely upon the complaint of a policeman or a military officer.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Speaking earlier in the debate, the Minister for Home Affairs said that they wanted this particular paragraph in order to intern people who would constitute a danger to the State by their actions. I put up a hypothetical case, and the Minister did not attempt to say that that was a case in which these powers might be used. Now I will put up another—one which, perhaps, is more definite. There are many people, and possibly people in the Dáil, who do not believe that the country in its present form of government has reached its limit on the road to freedom. Many people still aspire to see Ireland a Republic, and the Minister for Agriculture was careful to draw a distinction between what he called criminality and Republicanism. We have listened to and read on many occasions declarations by Ministers to the effect that if these people who had been engaged in a certain campaign during the past twelve months had confined their activities to constitutional agitation all would have been well. There are very many who do not see eye to eye with the Government who are of the same opinion—who are inclined to try to convince others who were embarking on a more extreme measure, of the wisdom of adopting a policy of constitutional Republicanism. I put it to the Minister that if that was admissible, what confidence or trust would such people have in advising or promoting such an agitation if they were faced with this power which is proposed to be given in this paragraph?

What constitutes a danger to the State? If a man goes out avowedly with the prepared purpose of changing the present State, or form of Government, will that be deemed by a military captain or superintendent of the police to be a danger to the State? I take it for granted that it would be. I put it to the Government, by claiming the powers in this paragraph which, as Deputy Johnson has already pointed out, they do not require, that they are themselves constituting a danger to the State, inasmuch as they are taking from people who are anxious to embark on a constitutional agitation to change the form of Government of the State that power and that right. It may be said that they are not taking it from them, but that is what will be and must be read into this paragraph. Similarly the doctrine or policy of passive resistance to law may be preached by somebody.

It has been preached in other countries, and there is no reason why it should not be preached here. That, too, I presume, would be taken as a danger to the State. Three specific things are mentioned in Part 1 of the Schedule which do constitute a danger to the State. The things that are asked for here must be something outside of these. What are they? The only attempt at defining what these dangers are was made in that hypothetical case put up by the Minister. We are entitled, before we give these extraordinary and very wide powers to the Government, to know exactly what are the dangers which the Government apprehends, and for which they ask these extremely wide powers. We have not been told that up to the present. No argument has been put up and no statement has been made as to the dangers which are feared. Reference was made to what took place, and what is taking place through the country, but I contend that the two paragraphs, (a) and (b), are sufficiently wide, as wide even as the Minister could expect them to be, to deal with the cases mentioned. No explanation has been given as to the kind of persons it is intended to bring in under paragraph (c). I think, if the Minister expects the support of the Dáil for that paragraph, it is his duty to tell us definitely to what class of people it is intended to apply.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Judging from the trend of the Deputy's speech, he has a different idea of constitutional agitation from what I have.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Possibly.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: When I used the expression "constitutional agitation" I meant endeavouring to convince one's fellow-citizens that a particular course is desirable, and endeavouring to persuade them to give a mandate of that kind to their representatives in Parliament, or to return representatives with a mandate of that kind. Deputy Johnson, in taking an extravagant case, has a wide field to play about in. He is of a rather playful disposition. He should have got up when we were dealing with the Bill—when we were giving the Board of Works power for the compulsory acquisition of premises for the Civic Guard—to point out that we might covet Clery's as a depot, and that under the Bill there was nothing to stop us from taking it. That is the kind of playful phantasy Deputy Johnson indulges in occasionally in his more dreamy moods. There is no use in putting extravagant cases, and speaking as if this Bill were something containing cut-and-dried powers given to the Executive, and that after that the Dáil would not see the Executive for 750 years to hear an account of an exercise of these powers. Deputies know that day after day Ministers answer questions with regard to their exercise and the exercise by officials responsible to them of powers that are vested in the Executive. Deputies know that under the provisions of this Bill Ministers will be equally subject to interrogation with regard to particular cases and subject to criticism with regard to matters raised on the adjournment arising out of this Bill. If we do any of those terrible things that Deputy Johnson pictured under this Bill, I have no doubt we will hear about it, and our successors will hear about it, from the representatives of the people who sit here.

Deputy O'Connell asked for a very definite statement as to the class of people it is proposed to deal with under this section. I tell him that one could not give such a definite statement here and now. One would naturally have to consider each particular case on its merits. Paragraph (a) provides that power is given to intern people suspected of being or having been engaged or concerned in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in Part 1. of the Schedule to the Act. Unlike Deputy (Gavan) Duffy and some others, I have not been a practising lawyer, and I cannot say offhand whether that particular Sub-section (a) would cover the advocacy in public or in private of acts of that kind. Yet it is quite conceivable that a person advocating acts of that kind, and not himself engaged or concerned in the commission of them—as a great many of the advocates take care not to be—would be a danger to the public safety. Deputies know well that this Bill is not asked for with a view to taking any action calculated to irritate or intensify the possibility of trouble in the country. Deputies know, on the contrary, that the fuller the powers that are asked and the fuller the powers that are given, the greater will be the possibility of taking alleviating action. I have said before, and I stress it now, that these powers are asked for largely with a view to enabling us to take a more liberal attitude than we would take if the powers were denied.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

I cannot meet Deputies on this amendment. I have listened to extravagant cases being put. Deputy O'Connell wants to know the names and addresses practically of all whom it is proposed to intern under that sub-section. I cannot give them to him. I do not know whether it will be necessary to intern anyone under that sub-section. I would be very sincerely pleased if it were not necessary. But I do say that, having regard to the practical situation in the country, having regard to all the conditions that have led up to it, having regard to speeches of leaders of the armed opposition to the Government—I will not say responsible leaders—that it is necessary to take very full powers over this short period of six months, so that the Executive may be equipped to deal with any situation that may arise, as it ought to be dealt with in a proper performance of stewardship. I think we are not likely to arrive at any compromise with regard to this sub-section.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Before we pass from this sub-section I should like to draw attention to one matter which I think has not been specifically noticed—that is that there are three distinct types of police officer who may intern. Now, it is bad enough to have the C.I.D. Force doing work for which it was not trained, and for which it was not intended—I take it we are all agreed that a force of that kind is intended primarily to detect crime, and not to decide that the person who, they think, is guilty is to be put in prison—but surely it is very much worse, and surely everybody in the Dáil will realise that it is a serious thing, to involve the Civic Guard and the Dublin Metropolitan Police in political or semi-political work such as this would be in the case of suspects who are suspect for political reasons. Surely it cannot be the intention of the Minister that forces like those that have kept themselves clear of all that kind of thing, and forces upon whom the future security of the State very largely rest, should be brought into a matter of this kind and should be thrown into the vortex of political horrors in case they begin again. Obviously it would be much better that they should be completely divorced and dissociated from any business of this kind. If it be necessary to arrest people on the suspicion of policemen we should at least leave out of the range of those on whom that very invidious duty is to fall the Civic Guard and the Dublin Metropolitan Police.

Mr. JOHNSON: I was going to put to the Minister quite seriously a suggestion quite consistent with the plan of the Bill—that (c) ought to point specifically to defined offences. The Minister has, in Part 2 of the Schedule, defined a long series of offences. If, in place of the very loose phrase “public safety,” there were some references to these defined offences, one could understand the case that is pleaded for by the Minister. Our objection to this paragraph is that, notwithstanding the present wishes and the intentions of Ministers, power is given to the Minister—whoever he may be—to do things which he ought not to have the power to do. It is no defence to say that this is only going to last for six months, that the intention is to be in a position to deal more liberally with the persons concerned than would otherwise be the case, to say “Give us these powers—give any persons who may be in the position of Ministers these powers—and trust in us that we will not use them illiberally or unfairly.” That is not a position that Ministers should take up in coming to the Dáil for authority of this kind. We have to bear in mind—and I take the phrase of the Minister himself when he speaks of the foundations of the new State—that the Bills that are passed now, in their phraseology and in their intent, may well become the foundations of future legislation and may be pointed to as precedents for legislation of a similarly oppressive kind in other circumstances. That is a very strong reason, I submit, for requiring a very much more closely defined paragraph than this under which Ministers are to have power to arrest and intern. Paragraph (a) refers specifically to offences mentioned in Part 1 of the Schedule. Paragraph (b) refers, as has been stated, to matters arising in a state of war or armed rebellion. (c) should have some relation to something else in the Bill relating to the public safety and that might well refer to Part 2 of the Schedule. That I could understand, without saying that I would agree with it, or that it would meet the whole of the case; it would, at least, give us some clue as to what was in the mind of the Minister, at least some assurance that no future Minister, even within the period of six months, presuming it will not be one of the Bills continued, will be able to say this term "public safety" is wide enough to include the internment of political opponents.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I would ask the Minister to consider the suggestions that have been made by Deputy Johnson, because the scope of the paragraph is far too wide, and in the hands of what are defined as responsible officers might not carry out even the intentions of the Minister. The Minister knows perfectly well that, in the first case, a responsible officer would be the interpreter of the power given in the paragraph. The Minister would be the second interpreter, perhaps.

The Minister says there is a further course: "You can take the matter to the Court for habeas corpus." The Judge then interprets it, but he will not interpret it on the intentions expressed by the Minister here. He will not consider at all what was the intention of the Dáil in putting in those particular words. He will put his own interpretation on the words, as they stand and come to a decision accordingly. Hypothetical cases were given here. I have two or three concrete cases that occurred within the last two months, some of them perhaps a month or two earlier, cases in which, had responsible officers been invested with the authority of this particular paragraph, the men could have been interned for a long time. I have the case of a particular Trade Union Secretary who was practically accused by a responsible officer, of higher rank, I think, than is mentioned now in the Bill, of being in effect a danger to the safety of the public in a certain area. It was only after long and very vigorous agitation and demands—after months of it, I think—that a promise was made that he would be brought to trial. He was not brought to trial because, I think, it was found that there was not anything like a case against him. He was released. But given this power, that man might certainly have been detained, though he was perfectly innocent. I have another case. Two other Trade Union officials, one of whom, to my personal knowledge, could not have been reasonably suspected of things that were suggested against him—

An Ceann Comhairle at this stage resumed the Chair.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: He was arrested by a very responsible officer indeed, apart from the technical expression, and was not being released. Much the same thing happened as in the other case. The two of them happened to be released, not by their own particular will at all, but by the will of certain other people who happened to be in the jail. A habeas corpus motion was taken, but the men were released. We had several other such cases, including the case of a Deputy who was arrested down the country on the spur of the moment, because he was apparently inconvenient to certain people or inconvenient to military in the area. I do not know exactly what particular representations were made on the spot, but they were released. Had the officers there this very wide power it is quite likely they could have reported to the Minister or the Executive Minister that these people were dangerous to the public safety. The thing is too wide. The Minister has said there is a difference between his conception of constitutional agitation and other people's conception of constitutional agitation. That is exactly where the wideness of the paragraph is a danger because military officers and even police officers are not the best judges of what are legitimate political activities or industrial activities and political and industrial agitation. It is quite possible, under the paragraph as it stands, for a Minister to use his prejudice against a particular political or industrial section whose conception of their constitutionality may be ordinarily accepted, but he, for his own reasons, might not accept it, and might use this paragraph against them. He may describe the case as one of perverted idealism. He cannot always dispose of things by calling them "idealism run mad." There were very many people, including high officials of the State, who considered that Tolstoy was a public danger in Russia. It was a matter of the conception of what is or is not endangering the public safety.

The paragraph is bad I think, and I would ask the Minister seriously to consider Deputy Johnson's suggestion, and see if he could not narrow the scope of it. If the Minister reconsiders the paragraph he could narrow it in such a way that it would not be so wide and would not be so capable of being wrongfully used.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 11; Níl, 45.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse (Ghabhán) Dhubhthaigh.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Cathal Ó Seannain.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Donchumhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duam.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Earnán Altún.
Sir Séamus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Neill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hOgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.

Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Níocáil.
Piaras Béalai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruidhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Guoinhghín Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Búllín.
Séamus Ó Dálaí.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Liam Ó hAodha.
Próinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Famón Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaid.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blághd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Domhnall Ó Broin.
Séamus de Barra.

Amendment declared lost.

Amendment: "In paragraph (c), line 3, page 3, after the word 'that,' to insert the words 'for reasons stated in the report,' " (Liam Ó Daimhín; Séamus Éabhróid), agreed to.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: There are two matters that seem to me require to be altered, although I have not put in any amendment. I think the words "the responsible officer" ought to be "a responsible officer." In sub-section (a) of the same Section he is referred to as "a responsible officer." I think it is obviously intended that any responsible officer should be the proper person. Secondly, I think there ought to be some definition of military authorities. A responsible officer is defined but military authorities are not, so far as I know, defined. I think some definition ought to be introduced. A responsible officer is defined as anybody not below the rank of Captain. The term "military authorities" might be capable of being interpreted as being somebody below the rank of Captain, and that, I am sure, was not the intention of the promoters of the Bill.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: We accept the first suggestion. In respect of the other matter I will consider what can be done.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not think that should be accepted. "A responsible officer" points to an individual.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: That was my very point. There is no individual referred to in the Clause. I thought it was, obviously, a printer's error, and I think it must have been.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is with respect to a particular class of offence, but this is in respect of another kind of offence, and it obviously refers to "a person" who is more responsible than an ordinary, responsible officer. There is a distinct intention. This is a responsible officer who, presumably, is in a particular area, and I take it that the wording must remain now until it is amended on Report.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The intention in

(c) was precisely the intention in (a) "Responsible Officer" was the phrase used throughout the Bill, with the significance defined in Section 16.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Johnson objects to the amendment being made now?

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I did not put it down as an amendment. I thought it was a clerical error, that is the reason I drew attention to it. It can come on at a later stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: On this Section, I would say that the whole Section is objectionable. It is proposed to make it lawful for a member of the Executive Council who, I presume, is intended to be an Executive Minister, to cause the arrest of and detain in custody certain persons without trial. Now there is already power to arrest and detain citizens for offences, some of which are indicated in the Sub-paragraphs. I submit that it is not a wise procedure for us to hand over to the Executive Minister by law any such powers unless at the same time we withdraw these powers from the Military Authority. It is not good policy to have two bodies, two sections or elements in the country who may be acting in harmony, or who may not, each with power to arrest and detain in custody citizens without either of them having the responsibility of bringing those prisoners to trial.

The Minister has defended it, and put this Bill forward on the ground that it is, or is intended to be, a gradual resumption of authority by the Civil Force, and a movement towards the reassertion of lawful methods. As far as the aspiration goes, it is commendable and generally satisfactory. But I submit that there should be, concurrently with any transfer of powers, a diminution of power from the one authority when transferring it to the other. By the passing of this Section we simply add to the forces who are authorised to arrest and detain citizens without trial. The Executive Minister is any member of the Executive Council. It may be any Minister, and he shall have power to arrest and detain citizens on the representation of certain Military Authorities. I think that is undesirable. I think it is a pity we should be asked to hand these powers over at the same time leaving similar or greater powers still in the hands of the military, and I propose to vote against the motion.

Question put: "That Section 1, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Dáil divided:—Tá, 42; Níl, 12.

Tá.

Liam T. MacCosgair.
Gearóid Ó Suilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Peadar Mac a' B áird.
Deasmhughain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Ristoárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire MacEochadha.
Earnán Altún.
Sir Séamus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Neill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgain.
Pádraic Ó Máille.

Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslá.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlá oíh.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Coinhghín Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Liam Ó hAodha.
Próinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrihde.
Liam Mac Sioghairl.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Séamus de Burca.

Níl.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubthaigh.
Liam Ó Bríain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Séamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion is carried by forty-two votes as against twelve. I cannot allow Deputy Gorey's vote because he was not in his place in the Dáil when he answered his name, and I am going to insist upon that part of the Standing Orders being observed.

ATTACK ON CIVIC GUARDS.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I beg to move to report progress. In doing so I would like to read to the Dáil a message which reached me in the course of the afternoon. The message reads: "Civic Guards on a cycling patrol patrolling between Killanne and Killealy, County Wexford, met armed men who called upon them to give up their bicycles. The Guards refused and the armed men fired. The Sergeant is believed to be mortally wounded, and at least one other Guard is wounded."

THE DAIL RESUMES.

Progress reported. The Committee ordered to sit again to-morrow.

HOUSING OF OIREACHTAS.

The PRESIDENT: I beg to move:—

That the Dáil appoint the following: An Ceann Comhairle, the Minister for Local Government (Mr. E. Blythe), Deputies Burke, Hughes, McGarry, Murphy, Gorey, Johnson, Davin and William Magennis (five to form a quorum) to constitute, with such Senators as may be appointed by the Seanad, a Committee to consider how suitable accommodation for the Oireachtas may best be provided and to examine such plans as may be submitted to them, and that the Seanad be requested to appoint to such Committee such members of the Seanad as the Seanad may think fit, and that it be an instruction to the Committee to report upon the matter submitted to them at their earliest convenience, but not later than the 27th July.

Motion agreed to.

The Dáil adjourned at 7.45 p.m. to 3 p.m. to-morrow (Wednesday).

DAIL EIREANN.

DE CEADAÓIN, 11ADH IUIL, 1923.

(Wednesday, 11th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar a 3.10 p.m. Bhí an Ceann Comhairle, Micheál Ó hAodha, 'sa Chathaoir.

GEISTEANNA QUESTIONS.

[ORAL ANSWERS.]

COMMITTEE ON FOOD PRICES.

AILFRID O BROIN asked the President if he will say whether the Committee on Food Prices is still taking evidence, if so, will he state when its first report may be expected.

The PRESIDENT: The Commission on Prices is at present engaged on drawing up its report, having heard all the evidence tendered to it.

FISHERY REPORT.

SEOSAMH MAC GIOLLA BHRI-GHDE asked the Minister for Fisheries when the Fishery Report for 1921 will be on sale.

Mr. E. J. DUGGAN (replying for Minister for Fisheries): The Report on the Sea and Inland Fisheries of Ireland for the year 1921 is now printed, and will, it is hoped, be issued shortly by the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction.

ILLEGAL TRAWLING.

SEOSAMH MAC GIOLLA BHRI-GHDE asked the Minister for Fisheries whether he is aware that a fleet of 35 French fishing boats are fishing off the Coast of Mayo, within the three mile limit, and if he will take any steps to put an end to this method of poaching.

Mr. DUGGAN: The Ministry has received complaints of fishing by French lobster and crayfish vessels within the three mile limit off the South and West Coasts of Ireland. The French Consul, to whom these complaints were reported, has taken action with his Government to endeavour to prevent further infringements.

The Ministry of Defence has issued instructions to the Commanders in charge of Coastal Patrol vessels to take the necessary action where foreign vessels were discovered infringing upon the territorial limits.

Mr. McBRIDE: What in the name of goodness has the French Consul to do with it?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I do not think that the Minister for Fisheries can be asked what the French Consul has to do with it.

Mr. McBRIDE: Is he not replying for the Minister for Fisheries?

Mr. DUGGAN: The Minister for Defence has issued instructions to the Commanders in charge of Coastal Patrol vessels to take necessary action.

Mr. McBRIDE: Would not a motor boat, costing £300, and manned by three men, keep the whole coast clear from Slyne Head to Killybegs, if the men in it were of any use?

APPLICATIONS FOR PAYMENT.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that repeated applications have been made for payment of the following accounts, and if he can now say when payment will be made—viz.:—

(a) Mr. M. J. Lally, Attymon, Athenry (commandeered car and hiring charges).

(b) Mr. Condon, Athenry (motor necessities).

(c) Mr. T. Coen, Athenry (motor necessities).

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins) replying for Minister for Defence: Applications for payment have been received from the persons mentioned. Consideration of their accounts is being expedited as much as possible.

BALLYHAUNIS ARREST.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that Frank Waldron, of Ardeary, Ballyhaunis, who was arrested on August the 7th, 1922, and is now detained at Tintown (No. 2 Camp, No. 8615, Hut No. 9), has signed the usual form of undertaking and has obtained the necessary sureties, and can he say if, in the circumstances, this prisoner will be released.

[Tomas O Conaill.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am not aware that Frank Waldron has signed the usual form of undertaking, or has ever offered to do so.

Mr. O'CONNELL: It is asserted that he signed it last October, and that he found the sureties in March last.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Minister for Defence states that he is not aware of that.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I have sent the particulars to the Minister.

DETENTION OF HEADFORD (CO. GALWAY) MAN.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether John Burke, Clydagh, Headford, Co. Galway, now detained in Galway Prison, has signed the usual undertaking, and got two solvent sureties to give the necessary guarantees, and will he say why, in the circumstances, Burke has not been released.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Burke was released on the 6th inst.

NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHER'S ARREST.

TOMAS O CONAILL asked the Minister for Defence whether Hugh Flynn, National Teacher, of Loughcross National School, Carrick-on-Shannon, has been arrested by National troops; can he state the grounds of his arrest, and where he is now detained; whether any charges have been, or will be, formulated against him, and if not, is it the intention to release him.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The enquiries which are being made in this case have not yet been completed.

CEANN COMHAIRLE'S RULING.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Before we enter upon the business of the day, I wish to draw attention to a matter which has come under my notice. Yesterday evening in the course of a debate in Committee on an amendment to delete paragraph (c) of Section 1 of the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Bill, 1923,

Deputy Gavan Duffy is reported to have used these words: "In an earlier stage of the debate the Ceann Comhairle ruled that we could not have an amendment making mockery of the Executive. That I quite understood, but happily we are allowed to criticise the Executive in debate." I was not in the Chair when that statement was made. If Deputy Gavan Duffy has been correctly reported, I take a grave view of such a statement. The rulings which I gave yesterday on certain proposed amendments of Deputy Gavan Duffy had been carefully considered and had been committed to writing. I am, therefore, quite sure of the words which were used. In ruling out one of Deputy Gavan Duffy's amendments I stated that it seemed to me to be offered in a spirit of derision, and that it did not aim at amending the Bill. Deputy Gavan Duffy admitted that. I made no mention of the Executive, nor had I given any consideration to the feelings or opinions of the Executive Council as such in making the ruling. It is my duty while I continue here to maintain the dignity and privilege of the whole Dáil, and see that no Deputy is allowed to lower that dignity or in any way to interfere with its privileges. When an amendment is placed upon the paper as a joke, or in a spirit of derision, that is an insult to the whole Dáil. It tends to lower our dignity and to take away from the seriousness of our proceedings. The Order Paper for the Committee Stage of the Public Safety Bill contains a considerable number of amendments in the names of various Deputies which are offered in a spirit of seriousness with a view to effecting improvements in the Bill in certain directions.

In my judgment it is improper and unfair that discussions on such amendments should be delayed by a consideration of amendments set down without serious intent. The statement which Deputy Gavan Duffy is reported to have made about my ruling is a wholly inaccurate account of the words used by me, and it seems to me to contain an implication that in ruling as I did, I was inspired by a desire to protect the Executive Council. I can see no other reason for the introduction of the word "Executive" which I did not use, nor do I see any other reason for the subsequent sentence. Now, on that point I feel that there is no need for me to refute such an implication. There is every need on the other hand for me to prevent my rulings from being misrepresented, and to prevent implications being made concerning them. The only course open to me is to ask Deputy Gavan Duffy to withdraw his statement and apologise for it.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I must say that I am somewhat surprised that I should have had no notice from you on this matter—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Gavan Duffy will, perhaps, tell us first, if this statement is correct?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I think so, but I have not got the official record.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I will read it. "In an earlier stage of the debate the Ceann Comhairle ruled that we could not have an amendment making mockery of the Executive. That I quite understood, but happily we are allowed to criticise the Executive in debate."

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I would have been in a better position to deal with this matter had I known it was coming on. I certainly had no intention to misinterpret your ruling or to question it. Very often in the course of debate one may use an expression such as the expression "Executive" which is inaccurate. I am not prepared to say what words I did use. But if these are the words reported, I have no doubt they are correct. I had not the slightest intention of reflecting upon the justice of your ruling. But since the matter has been raised, I think it is right that I should say that I considered that I was very peremptorily dealt with in the matter. The decision given by you I accepted at once, as I have always accepted every decision from the Chair. I would have accepted it even did I not agree with it. I was one of the first to recognise, and I have always held that it is essential to the conduct of the Dáil, that we should respect the Chair. I think the Dáil will do me the justice of recognising that I have invariably done so. Now, this particular matter arose yesterday for the first time. That is why I ventured to think that the Ceann Comhairle would have allowed me to say what I had to say in the matter before definitely ruling me out. It was the first time a ruling was made to the effect that we should not put in amendments of a derisive character. Therefore, it was a new matter.

When he made the ruling I fully understood him, and I fully appreciated the fact that it would not be to the best interests of the Oireachtas that amendments of a derisive character would be introduced. I had no intention in what I said, subsequently, of criticising the decision with which I may say I perfectly agree. If I gave any such impression, I regret I gave it. It was certainly not in my mind. The only reason I alluded to the matter, subsequently, was not by way of amendment, but by way of explaining the interpretation I put on the Section in question. I had thought the words I had written down were in order; I ask the Ceann Comhairle, so far as the justice of his ruling on this new point that came up for the first time went, to take it that I do not dispute it. He mentioned it to me earlier in private, and I recognised it at once, and I accepted it as a just and proper decision. I regret he should have taken any other impression from any words I used, which were not intended to have any such effect.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I accept Deputy Duffy's assurance that he used words which he did not intend to bear the meaning which I must say it seems quite clear to me that on the face of them they do bear.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: In reference to one matter you mentioned I may say I had not in my mind any question of a distinction between the Executive and the Dáil at all. That, I gather, is the innuendo. It was not my intention in the least.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I gave Deputy Gavan Duffy notice of my rulings yesterday, but when an amendment was ruled out for a specific reason, and when it was admitted that that ruling was correct, I saw no reason yesterday for further discussion on the point, and I see no reason yet for further discussion on such a point. The whole question of rulings, I am sure it will be realised, is of very great importance in this particular Dáil, because we are in the position of making precedents, and when the Chair is called upon to rule in any matter, that matter must have serious consideration, and the Chair must remember that the ruling will go down upon the records, and it probably will be regarded as a precedent, and will be quoted. It is for that reason that I have endeavoured to rule on these matters so that seriousness in debate would be preserved and so that our business would be transacted in a manner which is befitting to a body like this.

[An Ceann Comhairle.]

CIVIC GUARD (ACQUISITION OF PREMISES) BILL, 1923.

(FROM THE SEANAD.)

Amendment from the Seanad:—

"At the end of Sub-section 2, of Section 3, the following words have been added:—'and where any person being a caretaker was so put out of occupation as aforesaid it shall be lawful for the Minister for Home Affairs, if in his opinion there are any special circumstances warranting his so doing, to authorise the payment to such person of such sum by way of compensation for disturbance as the Minister aforesaid shall, with the consent of the Minister for Finance, think proper.'"

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The amendment suggested by the Seanad is, I think, a proper one. The question was raised there as to the position of a caretaker disturbed by the premises being acquired under this Bill by the Civic Guard, and while I was unwilling to recognise a third party to the proceedings, and while I had held there are really only two parties—the State and the owner of the house which the State finds it necessary to commandeer for the time being—still undoubtedly cases of pretty considerable hardship might arise, and the compromise was arrived at of not giving to the caretaker a legal right as against the State, but reserving to the Minister the discretionary power of dealing with particular cases that might arise. I think the amendment is a proper one, and ought to be accepted by the Dáil. I move: "That the Dáil do agree with the Seanad in this amendment."

Mr. F. LYNCH: I beg to second.

Question put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: A message will be sent accordingly.

DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

PUBLIC SAFETY (EMERGENCY POWERS) BILL, 1923.

THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Progress was reported yesterday, when Section 1 was disposed of.

SECTION 2.

(1) It shall be lawful for a responsible officer to arrest and to detain in custody for any period not exceeding one week any person found committing or attempting to commit or whom such officer suspects of having committed any of the offences mentioned in Part II. of the Schedule to this Act.

(2) It shall be lawful for an Executive Minister to order the detention in custody in any place in Saorstát Éireann of any person arrested under this section in respect of whom such Minister is of opinion that the public safety would be endangered by such person being set at liberty.

(3) Whenever any person is arrested under this section such person shall, not later than one week after his arrest unless an order for his detention is made by an Executive Minister under this section, either be released, or be be charged with one or more of the offences mentioned in the Schedule to this Act, or with any other offence or offences and dealt with according to law, and shall for that purpose, if in military custody, be delivered into civil custody.

Mr. JOHNSON: On behalf of Deputy Corish I beg to move:

In Sub-section (1), lines 7 and 8, to delete the words "or whom such officer suspects of having committed."

The responsible officer may be a Captain in the Army. Schedule No. 2 contains a long list of offences, some very serious and some less serious. No. 12 reads: "Aiding, abetting, assisting in, or encouraging the commission of any of the offences mentioned in this Schedule, or helping in the concealment or escape of any person guilty of any such offence." The officer is to be empowered under this paragraph to arrest and detain for one week any person whom he suspects of having committed the offences mentioned in the Schedule. I submit that that is too great an authority to give to an officer in the Army.

He may suspect that a person has helped to conceal another person who may be guilty of one of a very long list of offences that are set out. Having arrested and detained for one week, the Minister will, under another Section, be empowered to keep that person for an indefinite period without any assurance whatever that such prisoners will be brought to trial. It would be very easy, indeed, for an officer, not below the rank of Captain, to say that he suspects any citizen of having concealed, or attempted to secure the escape, or aided or abetted or assisted in the commission of any of these offences scheduled, and the mere suspicion by an officer that a person was party to, or conversant with, the fact that another person may have committed an offence, or by virtue of knowledge did not inform upon another person whom he may suspect of having committed an offence, is sufficient to warrant detention. This Section would give the officer power to detain for a week, and would give the Executive Minister power to detain indefinitely, merely upon suspicion of such a flimsy kind as that mentioned—not the suspicion of a specific offence necessarily, but the suspicion of having been party to the concealment of an offence by another person. I think that it is not justified by the circumstances or by the facts. It is giving too much power into the hands of a military officer. The military officer may under that power, frankly and openly given to him, simply detain a person, and when the question is raised why, all he has to say is he suspects he knew something of something that happened a week or six weeks, or two months ago, and no grounds further are required. A mere suspicion of the military captain, or the statement that he suspects, which might cover any amount of personal spleen, and anybody, under this Bill, can be brought to book. I do not know whether that is the intention of the Minister or whether he would intend or desire that such a power should be given, or whether it is due to inadvertence that this got into the sub-section. The effect of its deletion would be to make it lawful for a responsible officer to arrest and detain for a period, not exceeding one week, any person found committing or attempting to commit any of these offences, and it would deprive that officer of the power to detain any person whom he merely suspected of having committed an offence. I hope I am right in suggesting Minister to give these very extended powers to an army captain, and I ask him, therefore, to accept my amendment.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. K. O'Higgins): It was not by inadvertence that this sub-section found its place in the Bill, or that the word "suspect" found a place in the sub-section. I could talk for hours on the soundness, as a general rule and in normal conditions, of assuming the innocence of persons until their guilt is proved. It is a quite sound principle; most civilised countries have adopted it as a basis of their system of justice, and yet there are few States that have not, from time to time, claimed the right to depart from it in respect of deterrent detention as distinct from punitive imprisonment. States always have claimed and I think always will in times of crisis and emergency the right to depart from that principle and to detain citizens during a time of crisis without cause proved in Court, and without trial. Now, if any State was ever justified in departing from it I think this State is justified in departing from it under existing conditions, and in such conditions as are likely to exist for some months. It is menaced by a conspiracy, and a conspiracy that has had recourse to acts such as disgraced the pages of very few countries in history—a conspiracy that was absolutely ruthless and conscienceless in the methods it adopted to gain its negative destructive end. The foundations of this State are not set. Arms and explosives are secreted throughout the country, and the hysteria of the last year has not passed away. We are asking power, in these conditions, to arrest and detain citizens on evidence short of legal proof. What is the exact force of the word "suspicion" in this context in sub-section (2)? Everything short of absolute knowledge, everything short of proof, is suspicion. Now, persons found committing, or attempting to commit, offences mentioned in Part II. of the Schedule to this Act, will, I hope, be placed on trial. There is no reason why they should not be; but persons reasonably suspected of committing or attempting to commit acts of this kind will, I hope, be detained. We ask power to detain them. We think that is a matter of public safety affecting the citizens and affecting the future of this

[Mr. K. O'Higgins.]

Nation and State, and that it is necessary that the Executive should have power to detain persons reasonably suspected of having committed the offences set out in the Schedule to this Act. If it is stated that this Bill can be made a medium of tyranny I say it can; and I say it would be impossible to conceive and frame a Bill which, while amply safeguarding the interests of the State and its citizens, would yet be incapable of being used as a medium of tyranny. But, remember, you are giving these powers to an Executive responsible to the people's representatives here from day to day. It can only endure while it retains the confidence of the majority of the people's representatives. It is to such a body that you are entrusting these powers which are certainly far-reaching and certainly drastic, and which are only justified by the situation that exists in the country, a situation which we did not bring about, and a situation which we have done our best to deal with as it should be dealt with.

The alternative to the sub-section, as it reads, is that in fact there could be no deterrent detention in respect of any of the offences set out in Part 2 of the Schedule; that there could only be arrests and trials and imprisonment, and that for everything short of legal proof the suspect should go free. We cannot admit that. Take this crime which occurred yesterday in Wexford. I noticed that one paper refers to it as "a daring crime." I do not agree with that description. Two unarmed men were shot because they refused to deliver up certain property that they were asked to give up. Let us assume that the perpetrators of that cowardly crime get rid of their guns shortly after the outrage; that they are met on the road in or about the time of the occurrence of the outrage, and that they are of a type that would render them reasonably suspect of having committed the outrage. Now, if this sub-section were altered, as it is sought to be altered, men found in these circumstances must go free, because there is no legal proof, and everything, as I say, short of knowledge, everything short of legal proof, is suspicion. You must, if you give these powers, give them with a certain confidence that they will be used with discretion, that they will be used in the interests of the citizens and of the State, and that the body to which you entrust them, and on which you confer them, is not out simply to take the last ounce out of every bit of authority and every bit of power that this Dáil confers upon it in order to persecute and oppress any section of the citizens. Deputies here know well that there are people who have been interned for a couple of months, and whom it is hoped shortly to be able to release, but who if put on trial, as we could have put them on trial, producing proof and producing evidence, would get many years' sentence of imprisonment. We have tried to preserve that spirit and that outlook in handling the whole situation, but when we introduce a Bill, which we consider is a necessary measure to deal with the middle period, a transition period from war or armed rebellion to normality, certain Deputies get up and suggest that it is necessary to be most niggardly and jealous, as if you were dealing with a body of men who might be expected, as a natural thing, to be oppressive, to be tyrannical and to be unjust. That is not the position, and if it is the position, and if the Dáil believes it is the position, then they ought certainly to change the Executive and select men with a different outlook. If you give these powers we are responsible here from day to day. If they are abused, specific cases can be raised, questions can be asked and matters may be raised on the adjournment, but do not say, in the critical condition of things here, and with all the possibilities there are of trouble in the future that a citizen may not be arrested and detained on anything short of legal proof, and that is what the amendment seeks to say.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The Minister is really pushing the "no confidence" thing too far. He says that, in this and all other cases, it is quite open for the Dáil to raise questions, and to debate individual or other cases. That is quite true. The fact that certain Deputies want to make certain changes in a section or a Sub-section of a Bill, does not necessarily mean that the only alternative to change that section is to sack the Executive Council. That is not the position at all or anything like the position. The Minister mentions the case that happened in Wexford yesterday. It was not anything like a "daring" thing at all. It was a most cowardly thing, and no Deputy in the Dáil will express any other opinion about it, because it was a most dastardly and cowardly thing. But at the same time, it is quite an apt illustration of the points in favour of this amendment, because, let us take for the sake of argument, that three or four persons were concerned in this attack on the unarmed Civic Guards. The Minister pictures these persons as getting rid of their guns, of walking along the road and of coming across military or detective officers and getting arrested on suspicion because they looked like chaps who had done this dirty job. That might happen, not only in the case of three or four persons, but it might happen in the case of a dozen persons, so that you can have, under the Section as it stands, a dozen or two dozen people in that district arrested on suspicion of doing a job which, so far as our information at the moment goes, was done by three or four. That is where the introduction of the element of mere suspicion is so hurtful, and why it ought to be taken out of this Section altogether. Now, suspicion, I suggest, is of two kinds; it is either original suspicion arising more or less spontaneously in the minds of certain officers, or else suspicion derived or acquired from information which perhaps would not be good enough to convict, but would perhaps, be strong enough to make an officer suspect that a certain person or certain people had done a certain thing. In both cases there is great room for error. I know a case in point. It happened to a certain Army officer who lives in the City of Dublin, whose house has been raided by officers of the State, because he was suspected of having arms, or at least his house was suspected of containing arms. The suspicion, of course, was a quite reasonable suspicion, and probably was derived from information that was a quite reasonable suspicion.

That has happened in more than one case. Descriptions have been given which were not at all accurate. It is only a trained observer who can give an accurate description of a person or a number of persons whom he has seen only perhaps for a few minutes and has never seen in his life before. On information given by people who, naturally, when certain events take place have been labouring under great excitement, certain other people who bear some kind of resemblance in appearance to the people described by a witness may be suspected of committing a deed which they did not do at all. It is stretching the whole thing too far to allow the element of suspicion to count for so very much. I do not want to go outside the Standing Orders, A Chinn Comhairle, but I think I will not be going outside the Standing Orders by drawing the attention of the Minister and of the Dáil to the bearing that other parts of the Section have on the amendment we are discussing and to the Sub-section which it is sought to amend. The Sub-section provides that it shall be lawful to detain in custody and so forth a person found committing or suspected of having committed certain offences. Sub-section (2) provides that even such suspect if not charged with any offence under the Section may still be detained and kept in custody by the Minister not for the offence of which it was in the first instance suspected he had been guilty of, but of the more general one of being a danger to the public safety. That, I submit, shows the grave danger of allowing detention on suspicion. I mentioned on yesterday evening a certain case. I want to go into it more particularly this evening, because it illustrates a danger of this kind. A certain man, arrested presumably on information supplied by the Intelligence Department, was detained for some time in one of the prisons. Eventually, after a considerable amount of trouble, he was released. The truth of the thing, from beginning to end, was that the man instead of being an enemy of the State was a most devoted supporter of the State, but he was presumably suspected of having been concerned in the commission or assisting in the commission of certain offences against the State. That man when released sought, but sought in vain, from the Ministry an acknowledgment that the Ministry had made a mistake. The Ministry, of course, made no such acknowledgment, and will not make such acknowledgment. Ministers, as a rule, do not admit in these cases that they can make mistakes. All they say is: "You have been released and you ought to be content; we have nothing more to say in the matter." But that man, instead of being released, could, under this Section of the Bill, have been detained, although the suspicion on which he was originally arrested was undoubtedly ill-

[Cathal O'Shannon.]
founded. Under other Sections of this Bill he could have been still detained and he could have been prevented and his friends could have been prevented from raising an awkward question by asking an acknowledgment of the mistake that had been made on the part of the Executive Council. That, I submit, shows the danger of allowing the element of suspicion to count for so very much.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I do not wish on this Section to go into arguments that would be more properly addressed to the general question of internment on suspicion under Section 3. But a specific point was made by the Minister to the effect that specific cases could be raised in the Dáil. This was by way of extenuating the admitted objection to arrest on suspicion. It would undoubtedly be a very great matter if there were any adequate power of redress by raising in the Dáil cases where the allegation could be made that so-and-so was improperly suspected and improperly arrested, but I conceive that such power as there is is very largely illusory for this reason, that the answer the Minister will make and will be entitled to make under this Bill is "Mr. So-and-so is arrested in the interests of the Public Safety." Full stop. He will decline, and he will be entitled to decline, any further information as to the justifications of the arrest of the person in question. A case in point arose the other day. A man in Rathmines was arrested on suspicion and interned. His solicitors took up the case with the military authorities and after several weeks and after what appeared to be very careful inquiry the authorities came to the conclusion that this man ought to be released, and they released him. A week or two after the release the same man was re-arrested. Incidentally he had on the occasion of his release signed a form of undertaking which is given to prisoners. He was re-arrested in spite of that and in spite of the fact that there had been an inquiry as to the propriety or impropriety of keeping him in prison without charge or trial. I put the case to the Minister for Defence and asked whether this man would now be released. The answer was precisely the answer we shall get in every case of this kind under the present Bill.

The answer was that the Minister was advised by the detective authorities that it was not in the public interests to release this man.

Therefore raising the matter in the Dáil was an entirely illusory form of redress. It may give a man some satisfaction to see his name in print and know that his case had been raised, but it did not get him a bit nearer to release. Therefore you are, in dealing with this matter of suspicion, not in any way benefited by the fact that there is an Oireachtas sitting, because the Minister will be perfectly entitled, if this Bill goes through, to answer the challenge in respect of a particular individual by saying "we suspect him of being a person whom in the public interest we should intern." That is enough, and it is enough under this Bill. Perhaps I need not labour this point. I want to mention one other matter: The amendment deals with the words "whom such officer suspects of having committed an offence in the Second Schedule." It is not clear, on the wording of this Section, whether the officer's suspicion must necessarily refer to something which will have occurred after the passing of this Act or whether the officer is entitled to act under this Section in respect to a man whom he suspects of having committed some offence in the Second Schedule a month or two months or six months before. I hope it is not intended that this Section should be retrospective. If not, words should be inserted similar to the words standing in the name of Deputy Duggan in regard to another Section, to the effect that "This Section shall not apply to any offence committed before the passing of this Act." The Dáil will observe that if any other interpretation were put upon the Section it would be wholly unconstitutional, because we should be purporting to create offences which were not offences at the time they were committed. That would be a direct violation of the Constitution. I was going to say that you were dealing in this case with non-legal courts, but I am not sure if that is so under this Section. But it is important to bear in mind that, if the wording goes through as it stands, an officer may be entitled to arrest for an offence named in the Second Schedule which was not an offence at the time it was committed, say, three months ago I hope, therefore, if this Section does go through, words will be put in to say definitely that there is no intention that it shall be retrospective.

Mr. JOHNSON: I want to stress the point made by Deputy Gavan Duffy regarding the illusory nature of the power which the Dáil has in raising questions here. The Minister has stressed a good deal the fact that the Executive is responsible to the representatives of the people, and that we meet from day to day and can raise questions respecting prisoners by question or by a motion for Adjournment, or by a question raised on the Adjournment. Therefore, he argues, the risk of injustice being done is very small. I would point out that the Dáil is not likely to be sitting, day by day, for six months—the length of time during which this Bill is at present designed to be in operation. The important point remains that there is nothing in this Bill that will give any more access to the prisoners in the future than in the past. They will not have any more direct access to members of the Dáil than they have had in the past. So that the plea of the Minister that the grievances or injustices that may be alleged by prisoners can be raised by their representatives in the Dáil fails, inasmuch as the prisoner has no right of access, and the members of the Dáil have no right of access to the prisoner.

Then, again, the Minister has asked that we shall have some faith in the bona fides and good intentions of Ministers. Apart from the fact that Ministers may vary in their composition—the present Ministry may not be all in their present offices three months hence—this is not a request that there should be faith in Ministers. This is a request that we should have faith in the bona fides and good sense and discrimination of every Army captain. The Army captain is to be empowered to arrest and detain for a week, and then the Minister may decide that the detention shall be continuous, without reason stated. The Minister will be the first to admit how impossible it is for him to deal with every individual case. He will take the word of an Army officer. The Army officer says: "This person is suspected of being concerned directly or indirectly in the commission of one or other of these offences." The Minister takes the Army officer's return, and he has no time to consider the merits of the case, so many other things are demanding his attention. He simply has to remit the consideration of this particular case to the person who made the report in the first instance, or to some other subordinate officer, so that, in fact, what the Minister asks us to do is not merely to trust his bona fides, his generous consideration of the cases, his desire to be easy in this matter, but he does, in fact, ask us to trust to the discretion and the judgment and the bona fides of every Army Captain who is empowered to imprison on suspicion for one week any citizen.

Let me draw the Minister's attention to another consideration. We discussed and passed last night Section No. 1, which gave power to the Executive Minister to detain a person in respect of whom he had received a report from a responsible officer that the public safety is endangered by any such person being allowed to remain at liberty. He agreed to insert certain words there that the report must be accompanied by reasons. But now, what are we going to do? If we pass this as it stands, the effect of the change that was made last night is utterly lost, because all that has to be done now is to arrest a person on suspicion, and then the Minister may continue to detain him without any reason stated. No reasons are required. The officer may suspect or convey his suspicion after arrest to the Minister and say, "Patrick Murphy has been arrested, and is in our charge for one week. It is for you to say whether he shall be detained." The Minister has no option, unless he is going to override the original report of the officer, or to say that the officer had no right to arrest such a person, because he was not able to inquire into the merits or demerits of the arrest or detention during that week. There is no requirement in this Sub-section or in any other Sub-section that any reason shall be given. It is a question of the mere suspicion of a subordinate officer of the Army. There is no need to question the bona fides of Ministers in this case. There is every reason to guard against Captains in the Army, or any other officer of higher rank than Captain, suspecting without good grounds a citizen, detaining that citizen for a week, and then reporting to the Minister that he should continue to be detained. The Minister has too much to do to inquire closely into every individual case. All kinds of problems may have arisen which require his attention, and so the citizen has to be detained on the mere suspicion, without reasons stated, of the Army Captain.

[Mr. Johnston.]

I think the case for depriving any local officer of any such power is irrefutable. It is too easy to suspect. As a matter of fact one of the troubles in this country is the almost universal prevalence of suspicion. Everybody is suspect in the eyes of somebody else. There is very little faith in the honesty of purpose or the integrity of the neighbour, and that fault applies to Army Captains and other officers just as well as it does to civilians, and a suspicion engendered in the course of a conversation is but simply a thing to develop and to authorise an arrest upon. I would again ask the Minister to limit those powers and to trust to the ordinary law for the detention for that week. A policeman to-day, if he bona fide suspected any person of any crime, is entitled to arrest that person, bring him before a magistrate, and ask for a remand. In very few cases will the magistrate, who believes in the bona fides of the prosecutor, if the prosecutor is a policeman, refuse the remand; he may the second time, unless some evidence is forthcoming. For the purpose of original detention the mere suspicion of a soldier ought not to be enough.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Before you put the amendment I would like to remind the Dáil that it is quite possible for even higher and better trained officials than the officials defined in the Bill as responsible officers, to mislead and misinform, not consciously but unconsciously, Ministers and the Ministry. Some weeks ago I had occasion to raise certain questions dealing with the administration of a certain Department, and a Minister of whose bona fides no one in the Dáil has any doubt, gave certain answers. Those answers were quite and utterly incorrect. If one did not believe in the good faith of the Minister concerned, but considered that he knew his answer was untrue, one could only characterise what he said as a lie; but the answer did not come from him exactly. I feel quite sure that he answered simply on the information supplied him. That information was incorrect as everybody, including the Department concerned, now knows. That information was incorrect, and the particulars he supplied were lies put into his mouth by other people. I am now giving an illustration which shows that even the legal advisers of a Minister may err and misinform him. I refer to a certain case that occurred in England a few weeks ago when, contrary to all advice a Minister had got, the Courts there decided that certain action taken by the Executive was wrongful action and had to be reversed. It is when you come up against difficult and delicate points like those that one must ask the Dáil to take out of the hands of what are described as responsible officers, this very great power. Every Deputy here, and everybody outside, will agree with Deputy Johnson that one of the national sins in this country is suspicion. Everybody who remembers the situation that existed for a few months before the outbreak of civil war twelve months ago, knows that if there had not been on all sides a deep-rooted suspicion of persons and matters, things might not have turned out so badly as they did. This, which is one of our national weaknesses, is going to be put into one of our Statutes, and the Ministry is proposing to exploit one of the national weaknesses at a time like this. The amendment should be accepted and this power should not be put into the hands of any of the officers defined.

Mr. DAVIN: Many of the offences mentioned in the first paragraph of part 2 of the Schedule are offences in regard to which there would, undoubtedly, be very good reason and clear proof of the commission of the offence. That also applies to most of the other paragraphs, with the particular exception of paragraphs 9 and 12. Now, with regard to paragraph 12, aiding, abetting or assisting, are very doubtful words, and officers might be authorised to arrest people without any clear or legal proof of their connection with anything mentioned in the Schedule. The Minister for Home Affairs regrets the action of certain Deputies—their niggardly action, in regard to handing over powers to the military authorities to do things mentioned in this part of the Bill. I confess that, personally, I am very jealous and shall be very niggardly in handing over to the Army of this country, which is not stabilised and, in my opinion, not very free from political influences and party prejudices, the very heavy responsibilities that it is suggested are to be shouldered upon them. The Minister made reference to the powers that could be, and have been taken in other States to deal with a similar situation. I suggest that the army here is very different from the army of any other country that might be called upon to deal with a similar situation. If the army that serves this or any other successive Government is going to retain the confidence of all sections of the community, it must cut itself adrift from political influences and party prejudices. That, in my opinion, is not the position of the Army of this country. Some of us know that the circumstances which brought about the setting up of the Army may explain the situation here, but when one sees in the Press that Army officers are present at political meetings, one naturally has to become a little suspicious as to whether or not they are the Army of a party instead of the army of the people. That is why I would be very jealous and niggardly in regard to the handing over of any powers from the civil authority to the Army to deal with what is really a normal situation.

The Minister indicated that it was the intention, and I presume it can be carried out, to try all people who would be guilty of any crime mentioned in the Schedule. He said they were asking for the authority of this Dáil, that powers should be given to captains and other officers of a higher rank to arrest people on evidence short of legal proof. That would not apply in most cases except in Clause 12 regarding questions of "aiding, abetting, assisting in." Every Deputy in this Dáil, including many of the Deputies who sit behind the Ministers, are fully aware that hundreds of men have been arrested for spiteful reasons. The number of releases that have been referred to in this Dáil on many occasions is quite clear proof that many hundreds and thousands of men have been arrested without any genuine reason.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Question.

Mr. DAVIN: The Minister appears to question that. It will be very interesting to know the actual facts of the hundreds of people who have been released. If there is clear proof that they have committed serious crimes, it is for the Minister to justify the reason for their release. I cited many cases—one of which I referred to here yesterday regarding the arrest of individuals in my own area. I was interested some short time ago with another member of this Dáil who sits behind the Minister with regard to a man in Co. Dublin who was arrested. When I probed fully into the matter I found that the individual arrested happened to be at a dance or social function where a typist belonging to a local military officer was present, and simply because that person refused to dance with her, or carry out the necessary social duties on this particular occasion, it is presumed that this particular typist used her influence with the military officer to get that man arrested.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Might I intervene to say this, that if Deputy Davin knows of matters of that kind he ought to speak of them somewhere where he will not be protected by the privileges of this Dáil from the proper results of slander.

Mr. DAVIN: I deny absolutely it is a question of slander. I am making a fair statement, and can give the Minister the facts.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is slander.

Mr. DAVIN: I deny it is slander. You are a legal gentleman—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy must be aware what he is saying might be slander anywhere else.

Mr. DAVIN: I have no desire to do anything else but state the facts.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Go out then and state them.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: If the Deputy makes charges here against individuals named or unnamed he cannot be made responsible for the charges made. He is aware of that, of course. That is to say if here in this Dáil he charges an individual with something, the individual cannot take action against him. That is the Minister's contention. If the allegation were made outside there would be a legal remedy.

Mr. DAVIN: I would ask is it right for the Minister for Home Affairs to order me outside?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It certainly is not. I am only explaining so that there would be clarity in the matter. The contention of the Minister is that statements made here are privileged, and if similar statements were made outside there would be a legal remedy for the aggrieved party.

[An Ceann Comhairle.]

Mr. DAVIN: I was merely making use of this case to show reason why the powers asked should not be given. The question of slander did not enter into my mind, for I have not the slightest intention to slander anybody. It appears to me that anybody who gets up in this Dáil to put up any genuine argument in dealing with any Bill, or in supporting any amendment, is committing an offence by so doing. But I am conscious of the fact, and it is up to the Minister to deny it, that before any of the Bills are put up here they are discussed at meetings of the Party that backs the Government, and it is our duty as the Constitutional opposition to put up any reasonable amendments to the Bills introduced with the Party backing. I think that should be quite understood, and that was my contention, and it was my only intention in citing a particular case in support of this amendment.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: It had not been my intention to have participated in the discussion on this amendment, except for the little incident that occurred a minute ago. It seemed to indicate the moral of the amendment so clearly that I thought it might be well to point it out. Deputy Davin rose and made a certain suggestion. The Minister for Home Affairs rose and asked him to make that in such a form that he could be called upon to prove it. In other words, Deputy Davin was reproved in this Dáil for having suspected, for having a suspicion. Now, if Deputy Davin was incorrect in taking advantage of the privilege of this Dáil in harbouring a suspicion how much more serious must it be that persons should have their liberties taken away merely through the same kind of suspicion?

Mr. JOHNSON: And without any legal remedy.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I think the Minister for Home Affairs has proved the objections underlying this clause to which the amendment is moved.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 12; Níl, 40.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Darghal Fíges.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Duimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seunáin.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghair.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Deasmhurnhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Sir Seamus Craig, Ridire, M.D.
Gearóid Mac Giobáin, K.C.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.

Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoiel.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigin.
Próinsias Bultin.
Seamus Ó Dólaín.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Próinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Míchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaire.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Farnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seamus de Eura.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. J. EVERETT: I beg to move amendment No. 10, to delete sub-section (2) of Section 2. Under a previous Section the Minister is given almost unrestricted power to intern persons on suspicion, but in my opinion the most dangerous provision in the whole Bill is this Sub-section. The Sub-section deals with public safety, which is already extravagantly provided for under Section 1, Sub-section (c). Sub-section (2) gives power to a responsible officer to arrest certain persons mentioned in another part of the Bill. If that Sub-section were to become operative it would be possible, in my opinion, for a policeman or a police officer to arrest, and have interned on suspicion, anybody suspected of committing even minor offences. That is why I move the deletion of the Sub-section.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Sub-section 2 applies only to arrests made under Section 2. That is to say, it would apply only to arrests made by a responsible officer where a person was found committing, or attempting to commit, any of the offences mentioned in Part 2 of the Schedule of this Bill, or was reasonably suspected of having committed these offences. These are not, as the Deputy says, minor offences. I do not think there is anyone who would contend that, in the existing circumstances in the country, any single one of the offences set out under separate heads in Part 2 of the Schedule are minor offences. These offences include robbery under arms, arson, unlawful injuring or destroying or attempting to injure or destroy property, illicit distillation, and so on. If you admit the principle of deterrent detention, if you admit the principle of detention without trial, then it is not reasonable to say that a person shall not be detained who is seriously suspected of having committed one or more of these offences, or a person who was arrested by a responsible officer and found committing, or attempting to commit, these offences.

Mr. JOHNSON: What does he mean by deterrent detention? Whom is it he intends to deter? Is it the person who is arrested.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: For one, yes.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is intended to deter the person who is interned from committing an offence. If a captain in the army suspects that I have aided a barman in selling illicit spirits in his employer's possession, of which he has control, then the officer of the army may arrest and detain, and the Minister may order my continued detention to deter me from aiding or abetting a barman from selling any illicit spirit that belonged to his employer. Under this Sub-section that is what could happen. One of the offences is selling or offering or having for sale any illicit distilled spirit—a very grievous offence no doubt. Another is the offence of illicit distillation or having possession or control of any illicitly distilled spirits.

Now it is confidently asserted, and I have no doubt it is true, that much of the illicit spirits sold in the country is sold in ordinary licensed premises. The man responsible is the licensee and he employs in one department of his shop a shop assistant, who is selling paraffin oil or butter or both at another counter, but the army officer suspects that this shop assistant knows something about the possession by his employer of illicit spirits, and that suspicion is sufficient ground for arrest. Then we are to empower the Minister to detain, for an unlimited period, that person who is suspected of this offence. The Minister would say, of course, that that is an extravagant illustration of what may happen. It is not at all extravagant. He is determined to put down the distillation of illicit spirits, and in the exercise of that determination he sends instructions throughout the country that they must keep a sharp lookout on persons who may be engaged in the production or sale of poteen, and then the powers that are given under this Act come to the notice of the Army captain and he suspects shop assistant A of knowing something about the sale of illicit spirits in his employer's shop and he orders the arrest of that shop assistant.

We are asked, now, to give power to the Minister to detain, for any rate, six months, assuming that the Act comes to an end in six months, for that offence without any requirement that the ground for suspicion shall be stated, or that there should be any trial or any charge at any time. The power to detain, interminably, or at least for six months is to be given to the Minister because an officer who is called a responsible officer, and who may be an Army Captain, suspects that a given person may be concealing information. That is altogether too drastic. The Minister pleads that once you have conceded that the Minister should be empowered to detain persons as a deterrent, then everything else should be conceded, and that there should be no restriction whatever, no supervision, no check on the Minister's activities. I admit there is a great deal in that contention. Once you have told the Minister that so far as the exercise of power over the individual citizen is concerned he is supreme; once you have told him that you give him these powers, then it is somewhat futile to suggest that there should be any checks or that your faith should not be absolute. Once you have given the Minister that power the actual deduction to draw is that the faith you put in him should be absolute faith, so that the ordinary checks of the ordinary law in ordinary countries are not necessary to be applied here. Though the logic is with the Minister I hope the practice will be more in accordance with hard facts. The hard facts—perhaps the Minister will be glad to know—are these: That even Ministers are human; they make mistakes, and they may be subject to prejudices; they may be affected by passion; they may be tired and weary, too weary and too tired to deal with details. The ordinary question of a civilian's liberty may be of importance to the individual, it may be of importance to the prisoner, but it is nothing compared with the cares and affairs of State. That is a very natural feeling for a Minister to have at certain times. That is the justification for limiting the faith that one has to place in a Minister even when one has conceded that there should be some power of detention. That faith is not absolute. We do think that Ministers are human and that they may make human mistakes. They may be subject to the ordinary limitations of ordinary humanity. For that reason it is desirable that there should be some check on the power of Ministers to detain citizens. I ask the Dáil to bear in mind that this is not detention for commission of offences, that it is not detention for stated belief that offences may have been committed by the prisoner. It is to give power to the Minister to detain a prisoner because another person suspected that that prisoner may have been indirectly associated with the commission of an offence by another person. That is a power that ought to be opposed. It ought not to be asked for, but having been asked for I hope the Dáil will indicate its unwillingness to hand over those powers over the liberties of the citizens to a Minister merely upon the suspicion of an Army officer.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: There is a point which seems to have escaped attention in reference to the scope in point of time of the word "detention" in this and other Sections. Section 17 says, "This Act shall continue in force for six months after the passing thereof, and shall then expire." I have said before that I put no faith in those six months, because if this Bill is right now it will be equally right six months hence. But let me assume that I am quite wrong and that the Bill does expire six months hence. The prevailing notion that internment will expire at the same time as the Bill is entirely fallacious. If this Bill expires six months hence, the power to order internment will expire with the Bill, but, as I read the Bill, there is nothing whatsoever in it to declare that a person already interned shall be entitled to his release at the moment when the Bill expires. I think that it must be quite clear to Deputies examining this section, as well as others of a similar effect, that if this Bill goes through as now drawn the power to continue internment will continue after the Bill itself has expired. If that be so the prospect is a great deal more serious than it would have been had this actually been a six months' measure. I think the Dáil cannot get away from that conclusion, that the power to continue internment will remain when the Act is dead. The newspapers reported the other day a very unfortunate speech by a Minister. So far as I am aware that report has not yet been disavowed. The Minister is reported to have stated in Cork that, if necessary, prisoners would remain in prison until they rot. That was a sinister phrase coming from a responsible officer of the Executive, and I hope it does not represent the Ministerial mind. I should like to hear a disavowal of a phrase like that. Reading that in conjunction with the interpretation I have ventured to suggest to the Dáil as to the meaning of this Act in perpetuating internment, the phrase has a meaning. It does suggest that the intention of the Executive is to keep certain persons in prison for very much longer than the duration of the Bill. So far this matter has not been made clear from any Ministerial source, and I have failed to find in this Section, or elsewhere, anything which will effect the liberation of the prisoners interned six months hence, even on the assumption that this Bill then comes to an end.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy is quite wrong. Legal power to detain persons without trial is given by the Bill and lasts only while the Bill lasts. When the lifetime of the Bill expires, if there is not in the country a condition of war or of armed revolt, which I trust there will not be, then all legal power to detain persons without trial goes with the Bill.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I am very glad to hear that. Can the Minister point to the Section which shows that? I have failed to find it.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I supported this Bill on the Second Reading and I intend to support a good deal of it in Committee. I do not care to set up my own opinion against that of Deputy Gavan Duffy or anybody else, but it certainly never occurred to me that after this Bill had run its course, in accordance with the last Section, for six months, that it would be open to make a return to any writ of habeas corpus for a prisoner who was kept in continued detention that he was being lawfully detained under a Bill the powers of which were spent. This Bill confers power, as I read it, upon a Minister while the Bill is in force to detain people in internment without trial and it does not in the technical sense suspend habeas corpus at all. Any detained prisoner can apply for a writ of habeas corpus, but it is a perfectly good answer to his application, I take it, that he is not to be let loose because he is detained under the powers of this Bill. When the powers of this Bill are spent, that is to say, when the 6 months for which it is in operation have come to an end, it would occur to me that such a return would be laughed out of Court at once. The prisoner under detention, who was put there under this Bill, applies to get out and the return is made that he is in lawful detention and is not entitled to be released or tried. How does that come about? If the answer is "The Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Bill" the answer to that is that the Bill is dead. That would seem to be a perfectly sufficient answer to any attempt of any Minister to retain any prisoner under the powers conferred by this Bill for a single hour after the Bill itself is spent.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: We have all great respect for Deputy FitzGibbon's opinion on a legal point of this kind, but it is of sufficient importance to justify me in putting the reason for the contrary view, however wrong that view may be, and I hope it is wrong. The reason is that during the continuance of the Bill the Executive has power to order detention. That detention is quite indefinite in period. There is nothing in any Section, as far as I am aware, limiting the time of it, and with all respect to Deputy FitzGibbon I venture to think it will be quite competent for a Court to hold, notwithstanding the fact that the power to order internments has ceased because the Act has ceased that the Order, which was good when it was made for indefinite internment, continues to be a good Order until such time as the Executive choose to abolish it. I should like very much to see words introduced into the Bill to make it impossible for an interpretation of that kind to be put on the Bill, more particularly as we now have it from the Executive themselves that they have not that intention.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Read Section 1 carefully.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The point raised by Deputy Gavan Duffy and answered by the Minister and by Deputy FitzGibbon is, I think, of very great importance. Even if Deputy Gavan Duffy is in error still there is sometimes a virtue in setting out an error in order to extract the truth. Like Deputy Gavan Duffy I have great respect for the opinion expressed by Deputy FitzGibbon, but I should like to have his opinion and a statement from the Minister on another point. I hope I am not going outside the scope of the discussion in order to get that point out. Certain provision is made in the Bill for certain sentences, hard labour and perhaps penal servitude, extending over a period of years. Are we to take it on the answers given that when a case is put to the Court that the Bill has expired, therefore there is no power to detain in deterrent detention a prisoner? Are we to take it also that the sentences of those not merely detained, but found guilty and sentenced under the Bill will automatically expire when the Bill expires? I do not think the Minister will say that such sentences will expire.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: May I explain that Section 1 provides that, subject to the provisions of this Act it shall be lawful for an Executive Minister to cause the arrest and to order the detention in custody of any person. That is detention without trial, what I have called the deterrent detention. A sentence passed by a Court after trial is a very different thing and will not cease to have effect when the Act expires.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: That is as I suspected. But does the Minister not know that I could go a little beyond that, as he will have power, or any Executive Minister will have power, to go beyond it, because under the provisions of the Bill the Minister can order the period of detention to be as far as 18 months or 2 years.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Where is that in the Bill?

Mr. JOHNSON: Line 2, Sub-section 2.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Where is the question of period mentioned in Sub-section 2?

CATHAL O'SHANNON: There is nothing in the Bill forbidding him to do it. There is nothing in the Bill to confine the power of the Minister to detention for six months.

Mr. DUGGAN: Except Clause 17.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Except the limited duration of the Act as defined in Section 17.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: And Section 1.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The whole thing shows what we have remarked on previous occasions, that Ministers' speeches do not always correspond with the provisions of the measure. There was a provision yesterday, and the Minister was good enough to amend and bring it into conformity with his speech. I think Deputy Gavan Duffy's point will have to be more closely examined and gone into before I can accept the assurances that have been given. The Minister, for instance, has been talking all along about reasonably suspected persons. The Bill does not make provision at all for reasonable suspicion. It provides merely for suspicion. Of course the Minister may claim that if we believe in the bona fides of the Ministry, and of the officers concerned, that therefore we must believe they will do things reasonably. It does not follow at all. Deputy Johnson has referred to certain offences covered by the Section and Sub-section and in particular to the offences mentioned in Sections 10 and 11. Now, detention as a military measure, or as a civil measure, for the preservation of the State, has always I think been associated with crime, or at least with offences of a political or semi-political nature. The Minister is extending the offences to include others which no one ordinarily regards as anything in the nature of political or semi-political offences. Even under the British regime, except for the period during which the First and Second Dáil were functioning, no one claimed that illicit distillation and poteen-making were political or semi-political offences. They were ordinary offences against the ordinary law. Although it was for private gain the Minister will remember that that particular manufacture was elevated, more or less, to the dignity of a political offence two or three years ago. I remember that in various parts of the country certain people engaged in the sale of spirits sold spirits which they called "Dáil Eireann." And they would tell you with a great deal of pride that they had paid duty to the Dáil. If you are going to take this into the scope of the clause, I think the Minister might go a little further and add to the sale, exposing for sale, the consumption of this stuff, the purchase of the stuff; and then you will have everybody who desires—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy can move an amendment to insert that in the schedule.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The Dáil, I hope, is giving consideration to the arguments that have been used, and not merely taking the word of the Minister that everything is all right, provided you will take his interpretation of it. Some of us are not prepared to take his interpretation. That is why we want the thing amended. If he is prepared to amend it to please us, we will accept it. But I ask the Dáil not to accept the Minister's speeches in defence of a particular section as being a correct interpretation of it.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think that this point that has been raised respecting the period of detention is very important. It requires very close consideration. It is suggested that the period must expire at the end of six months because of Section 17, but I submit that it is a not unfair interpretation of this Section to say that the Minister may order the detention in custody in any place in Saorstát Éireann of a person suspected under this Section for a definite period. If the Minister in his Order says that a suspected person must be detained for a period of two years in a certain establishment, he is entitled to do that under this Section. The question may arise as to whether he has power. Deputy FitzGibbon raises the question whether the Courts would not order his release under habeas corpus, but I note that in the latter Sections, when dealing with persons found guilty on indictment, the phrase is used, "punishment and imprisonment." The implication is that the person is being punished for an offence committed, but the order for detention is not for an offence committed, but it is "in the interests of public safety." And that Order may contain a period. There is nothing here which definitely and assuredly prevents that Order stating that the prisoner shall be detained for a specific period. It may be that the prisoner's friends have no interest in the matter; it may be that the prisoner's friends would be quite pleased that the prisoner shall be detained in some of the alleged comfortable establishments; it may even be that the prisoner would prefer to be detained, and he does not apply to the Courts. He is not going to seek habeas corpus.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: May I say, Sir, that I am quite prepared to insert—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is this a point of explanation?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Practically. I am quite prepared to insert on the Report Stage anything that would mark it as quite definite that there was no intention to detain without trial for any longer period than the period of the existence of the Bill.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Will the Minister look at Section 4, Sub-section 3 (b), and say whether his undertaking will apply to that too; because in that particular Section the Executive has power expressly given to it to order detention for such period as it thinks necessary in the public safety. That is page 4, line 5.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Let us look first at Section 1—"It shall be lawful for an Executive Minister to cause the arrest and, subject to the provisions of this Act, to order the detention . . ." This "subject to the provisions of the Act" would render the detention subject to, for instance, the provision of Article 17, dealing with the lifetime of the Bill. That expression, "subject to the provisions of this Act" could be inserted also in Section 2. What is the Section that the Deputy has referred to?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Page 4, line 5, Section 4, Sub-section 3 (b).

Mr. O'HIGGINS: "Subject to the provisions of this Bill" could be inserted there..

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is to say, the Minister does not mean that to apply to a period beyond the duration of the Act.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: And I have satisfied myself that it cannot.

Mr. JOHNSON: The words referred to may be intended to refer to the six months that this Act shall continue in force and shall then expire. The mere insertion of these words, "subject to the provisions of this Act," will not ensure the limitation or the detention for that period.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: What do you suggest?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I understood the Minister to say that he was prepared to insert any words which would ensure the restriction of the period.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is satisfactory. Between now and the next Reading the Minister will insert words which will prevent the possibility of any person being detained in custody after the period of this Act has expired.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: If I find on examination that it is necessary—I am myself positive that it is not necessary—I undertake to look further into the matter, and if I find there is even a shadow of doubt about the thing I will insert such words.

Mr. JOHNSON: Of course the Dáil ought to be satisfied, not merely the Minister, and we would like to make it sure now that such powers might not, perchance, be embodied in the Bill. But, assuming that that provision is made clear and undoubted, that the period of detention is strictly limited, we still object to giving power to an Executive Minister to order the detention in custody, even for the period of the Act in any place in Saorstát Eireann of a person who has merely been arrested on the suspicion of an Army captain. We shall bear in mind that it is not intended to be punishment; it is intended to be a deterrent. It is not intended to deter the Army captain from his suspicion, but it is intended to deter the prisoner from allowing himself to be thought of as a suspicious person. I think no case has been made for the inclusion of the sub-section.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: In view of the undertaking given by the Minister, would I be permitted to point out that one difficulty that arises is this, that in three different sections three different phrases are used in connection with detention?

Mr. FITZGIBBON: On a point of order, we are discussing now an amendment that has nothing whatever to do with the period of detention. Surely it is not open now, upon an amendment, to delete Sub-section (2), to discuss a period of detention that may come up under two or three other sections which we have not yet reached. Especially is this so, having regard to the undertaking that has been given by the Minister and that has been rejected by the opponents of this section.

Mr. JOHNSON: I submit, as a matter of order, that when a sub-section deals with detention, "detention" must infer a period, and consequently any reference to the period of detention is in order.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: My point was that an answer was given with regard to the period of detention so far as this sub-section was concerned, and therefore if any question about the period of detention under any other sub-section arises, it should come on when that sub-section is reached.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I rose because the Minister had given an undertaking, in response to the objection I raised, and I desired to point out that the amendment it was proposed to make—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: In this sub-section?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Yes. I wished to point out that that amendment ought to be one that would fit other sub-sections where the same matter of detention is dealt with in different language. And as the question of the amendment arises now—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question of the amendment does not arise now. That is the essential point. I am surprised that Deputy Gavan Duffy does not realise that. In fact, I would like to place it on record that he does, in fact, realise it. It seems to me that I have given considerable liberty in this discussion to the question of the period of detention. Everybody must be aware of that. If Deputy Gavan Duffy believed, when this Bill was being read a second time, that the terms of the Bill gave power to any Executive Minister to intern people indefinitely, I think the Second Reading was the time that that should have been stated, because it is a very important principle. No mention was made of it. We took a long period yesterday to discuss Section 1 of this Bill, which gives power to detain. No mention was made of the period of detention —no mention whatever. Deputy Gavan Duffy raises it to-day on Sub-section (2) of Section 2—

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: On different wording.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: And the Minister has given an undertaking that he will go very carefully into the matter as far as Sub-section (2) is concerned and as far as the other sub-sections are concerned. Now, we are discussing an amendment to delete Sub-section (2), and on that amendment I will not allow any further discussion of the question of the period of detention. If Deputy Gavan Duffy entertains fears that other sections of the Act may be interpreted so as to give power to the Executive to detain people indefinitely, when we come to these particular sections or sub-sections he will have ample opportunity for raising the question.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order, I appreciate the importance of your ruling, but I hope I am not misinterpreting it, and I hope I am not asked to interpret it as meaning that if, in the course of a discussion, it is found by any Deputy that issues are raised that were not foreseen on the Second Reading, that they cannot be raised on subsequent occasions.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No. This is a matter which really concerns the whole Bill, and it would have been very properly raised on Second Reading. If this very important matter and very important legal point escaped the attention of legal Deputies on Second Reading, they are, of course, entitled to raise it in the proper place.

Mr. JOHNSON: Legal Deputies or others.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Or others. But they are only entitled to raise it in the proper place. In other words, if a Deputy forgets to raise something on the Second Reading—something which concerns the whole Bill—he cannot make three speeches on every motion made during Committee Stage on the point which he forgot on the Second Reading.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Do I understand from your ruling that it will be competent to refer to this question on a subsequent section dealing with detention in different words, and to refer, at the same time, to previous sub-sections where similar expressions occur with different wording. The point is the advantage of taking several sub-sections together in dealing with the same matter. I do not know how far one would be in order in doing so under your ruling.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question of the period of detention is done with so far as this sub-section is concerned.

Mr. LYONS: I support the amendment to delete the sub-section. I do so solely because it gives too much power to the Executive Minister. If this section goes through in its present form we will have wholesale arrests throughout the country. It sets out that it shall be lawful for the Executive Minister to order the detention in custody in any place in Saorstát Éireann of any person arrested under this section in respect of whom the Minister is of opinion that the public safety is endangered by such person being at liberty. The meaning of that is, if a person at the present moment is a bit talkative in the country, without any real meaning attaching to his words, and if his conversation is overheard by an Army captain or by a person who would give information against him, he could be arrested under this section. Again, if a person in the country has an enemy, although he may be one of the best supporters of the State, if that enemy invests 2d. in a stamp and sends information about that person, he can be arrested and detained anywhere in the Saorstát. I think that is going a bit too far. What is wrong at present is that we have too many prisoners. I want to see if there is the least hope that the Minister is really democratic and out for the welfare of the people, and that he is not putting forward clauses like these for the sole purpose of arresting every man and woman in the Saorstát who may think contrary to the way the Minister for Home Affairs would wish them to think. You will find in any part of the country that this Bill is the fireside talk. The Government are not gaining anything by allowing this sub-section to remain part of the Bill. They would gain a great deal by agreeing to the amendment to delete the sub-section.

The people have been terrorised long enough, and I think it is not necessary to bring in a law such as this for the pure purpose of trying to govern. If you want to govern properly do not make wholesale arrests and cast people into prison, and do not use words such as those I was sorry to see from the papers that the Minister used the other day in the country—that the people should stop in prison till they rot. I wonder, before the Saorstát came into being, what propaganda did the men who were then arrested and detained use when they were in prison. It may well be that we heard so much from the Ministerial Benches because they know so much about prison life themselves. In the attempt to force the enemy to evacuate this country people credited anything which came from prison. Ministers put up so much propaganda in their own time, they judge everybody by their own experience. I ask the Minister for Home Affairs to agree to this amendment. I do not want to specify the time when you shall release the prisoners. You have already agreed that in six months time this Bill will cease to be an Act, and the prisoners will be set free. I am very pleased to hear even that slight explanation from the Minister, but when we come to realise hard facts and look at the matter from a proper Christian point of view it is not fair to have prisoners in the country who, under this section, will be arrested and detained by military captains or by the Minister himself or his associates, and who will not be brought to trial. It specifies here that they will be brought to trial in one week, but I do not credit that. There are prisoners who were arrested a week of months, and who are still untried, and who have had no charge brought against them. The same thing will apply under this section. These prisoners will be arrested and put in prison for as many days as there are hours in the week and weeks in the year, and shall not be tried unless the Minister so chooses.

[Mr. Lyons.]

Therefore, we must take into account all the innocent persons arrested in the country who may have nothing to say against the Government, but who may be simply an enemy of a man who may be a friend of a military captain or who may associate with "G" men and detectives of the Free State and give information about innocent persons. If he is the father of a family he is taken from his family and put into prison, and the helpless little children are allowed to starve in the streets. The father will not be tried, although he is innocent. He is allowed to remain in prison, and the children will become an encumbrance on the State, and if any public body tries to help them the Minister will, I am sure, step in and not allow it to do so. That is why I support the amendment. I know what will happen. With these people detained under this section their families will suffer. Who are you making to suffer? The rising generations, the youth that is going to build up the Saorstát. I therefore support the amendment to delete Sub-section (2).

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided:—Tá, 12; Níl, 41.

Tá.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghéasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallaoi in.

Nil.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
 Donchadh Ó Guaire.
 Gearóid Ó Suileabháin.
 Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
 Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
 Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
 Séamus Breathnach.
 Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
 Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
 Micheál de Duram.
 Seán Mac Garaidh.
 Pilib Mac Cosgair.
 Micheál de Staineas.
 Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
 Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
 Sir Séamus Craig.
 Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
 Liam Thrift.
 Eoin Mac Néill.
 Liam Mac Aonghusa.
 Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.

Pádraic Ó Máillo.
 Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
 Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
 Piaras Béaslai.
 Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
 Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
 Críostoir Ó Broin.
 Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
 Proinsias Bulfin.
 Séamus Ó Dóilín.
 Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
 Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
 Éamon Ó Dúgáin.
 Peadar Ó hAodha.
 Séamus Ó Murchadha.
 Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighd.
 Liam Mac Sioghaird.
 Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
 Earnán de Blahid.
 Unseann de Faoite.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. COLOHAN: I beg to move in Sub-section (2), line 13, after the word "Minister," to insert the words "certifies in writing that for stated reasons he." The object of this amendment is to protect the person arrested from being detained for a lengthy period without any reason being given. I think the Executive Minister should certify and state clearly why the person arrested is considered dangerous. If this amendment is not accepted it would be possible to arrest and detain people who hold strong political opinions against the policy of the present Government. That is a thing we should have to see to. I contend, if the responsible officer in the district merely suspects citizens of having done any of the offences in Part II. of the Schedule of this Act, they can be arrested and detained, and thus be prevented from exercising the rights and liberties which they are entitled to exercise according to the Articles of the Constitution. If this goes through, I think the constitution is a dead letter as far as the rights and liberties of a citizen are concerned.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am not accepting the amendment. It is not proposed to serve a charge on prisoners whom it is proposed to intern, and it is not proposed to bring them to trial. Later on, when we come to Section 4, dealing with the Appeal Councils, I will state my intention to accept or insert an amendment providing that internees seeking to appeal before the Appeal Council shall be informed with respect to all the offences set out in the Schedule. The principle of the Bill is to provide for internment without trial, and Deputies know that they owe the peace and security in which they are now living to the fact that many people have been arrested against whom it would be impossible to adduce legal proof, or in regard to whom it would be impossible to formulate a specific charge. If Deputies think that we do not sufficiently understand what the public safety means and what steps public safety demands, then they ought to search for someone who does understand these things. This amendment, if passed, would involve the serving on each person whom it was proposed to intern of a specific charge—to state reasons, or, as the Deputy put it, to state clearly and specifically the reasons for which it is proposed to intern. We do not propose to state any other reasons except that, in our opinion, the public safety demands that step. If the internee states his intention to appear before the Appeal Council he will receive information as to the offences in the Schedule in respect of which he has been arrested and detained on suspicion.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the Minister has misunderstood the purport of this amendment. It does not say that the reasons shall be submitted to the prisoner. It does not deal with those cases that the Minister has referred to. It asks that there shall be done in this case by the Minister what he has agreed shall be done under Paragraph (c) of Section 1, in which he agreed that where a responsible officer, or the military authorities, send a report to the Minister that the public safety shall be endangered by a particular person being allowed to remain at liberty, that reasons should be stated by that responsible officer.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: To whom?

Mr. JOHNSON: To the Minister. The amendment requests that where the Minister has decided to keep in internment a prisoner who has already been arrested, that he should set out, write down, put on record somewhere, his reasons for deciding that that person is to be kept in custody.

An Leas-Cheann Comhairle took the Chair at this stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: The amendment does not provide for the submission of these reasons to the prisoner at the time when the order is made. The amendment asks that the Minister shall record in writing the reasons which decided that the public safety would be endangered by such person being set at liberty. Then, if at a later period the prisoner decides to take advantage of the provisions of the Bill setting up the Appeal Councils, such reasons may be referred to by the Appeals Council, but they will have been stated at the time the Minister made his decision. I think the amendment is in thorough accord with the promise that the Minister made with respect to a previous section. In the one case a responsible officer, or the military authorities, were to give their reasons to the Minister. In this case we ask that the Minister should put on record on his own books his reasons, not necessarily for presentation to the prisoner at all, so that they will be clear for the Appeal Councils or for his own satisfaction, even for his own future reference. I think there is nothing objectionable even from the Minister's own point of view, in the suggestion.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I misunderstood the amendment. On the understanding that this will be a mere confidential Departmental record available only for the Appeals Council if and when the detained person thought fit to appear before it, and on the definite understanding that it is not a document to be served on the prisoner when he is arrested, I would accept the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the Minister will see that the phrasing of the amendment does not imply any presentation of these reasons to the prisoner.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: I beg leave to move Amendment No. 12:—"In Subsection (3), to delete the words 'or with any other offence or offences.'" This Bill enables the Minister, having arrested a man on mere suspicion, to keep him in custody until he is able to find an offence to charge him with other than the one on which he was arrested on suspicion. The ordinary rule is that an arrest is not made, or the custody continued, unless there is evidence pointing to the person's guilt. This power encourages the framing of charges, such as the planting of a revolver, etc., and I move the amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: This amendment is unsound. The effect of it would be that a person arrested under Section 2 could not be charged with any offences other than those mentioned in the Schedule. The Deputy must understand that the word "offence" there means, and means only, an offence in law, and to say that a person who had been arrested by an officer could not be charged with any offence except the offences set out in the Schedule seems to be raising certain citizens above the law.

Let us assume that a person is arrested by an officer and he is detained for a week, and in the course of that week inquiries are made with a view to ascertaining whether he had, in fact, committed or had been in any way concerned in committing any of the offences set out in the Schedule, and it is found to satisfaction that he was not, but in the course of these inquiries the fact comes to light that in other respects he had broken the law, why, of course, it should be open to the proper authorities to charge him with such offences. The Deputy's amendment amounts to this, that it would not be so, and that they ought not to be in a position to charge him with any offences except some one or other of the offences in the Schedule of this Bill. That is not sound.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I should have supported the last amendment the Minister has accepted. I do not think this amendment, if accepted, would really be of assistance to the prisoner whom Deputy O'Callaghan desires to protect. Suppose that a prisoner so arrested, or in preventive detention, was at the end of the week to be discharged, but during that period of detention it had been found out that he had been guilty of one of the ordinary crimes of larceny or assault for which people are liable to be prosecuted, the only result of accepting this amendment would be that he would be formally discharged and re-arrested, as often happens in particular cases where a person has been tried and acquitted by a jury, and has been then re-arrested on a charge of assault with intent to injure, and things of that sort, and charged at once. It is desirable to get rid of mere formal procedure like that. It seems to me the only result of accepting this amendment would be to continue that method of formal discharge and re-arrest, which does no good to anybody, and brings the administration of the criminal law more or less into disrepute. The only effect of the amendment would be that if in the course of detention evidence of a crime is found other than semi-military and revolutionary crimes specified in this Schedule, it shall be unlawful to charge him with any such crime. I do not think the amendment would do anything more for a prisoner who could be charged under the section as it stands than to allow him to be released momentarily and re-arrested.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: As a victim of the procedure mentioned by Deputy FitzGibbon I agree with him that there would not be much to be gained by a prisoner if this amendment were adopted, and I suggest that Deputy O'Callaghan should withdraw it. I remember on a particular occasion being arrested for a particular thing, and the British authorities, finding that they were not able to bring me to trial for that particular thing, simply left me outside the jail, where a party of police were waiting to take me inside again, and another charge was brought forward. It would have been more pleasing to me if I had been charged with the offence while in custody than going outside and finding that they were waiting to dump me in again.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: Having heard the various arguments, I withdraw the amendment.

Amendment by leave withdrawn.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 2 as amended stand part of the Bill."

The Dáil divided:—Tá, 36; Níl, 11.

Tá.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Suileabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Pádraig Mag Ualghaigh.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Staines.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Sir Séamus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mag Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.

Seosamh Ó Faoilocháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Criostoir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dólaín.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Proinsias Mag Aonghusa.
Éamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.

Níl.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Séamus Eabhróid.

Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Motion declared carried.

SECTION 3.

(1) Every person who is now detained in the custody of or held in internment by the military authorities and has not before the passing of this Act been sentenced to a term of imprisonment or penal servitude by any tribunal established by the military authorities, may be detained in custody under this Act

(a) by the military authorities if in the opinion of those authorities his detention is a matter of military necessity in the present emergency, or

(b) under an order of an Executive Minister if in the opinion of such Minister the public safety would be endangered by such person being set at liberty.

(2) No person detained in custody under an order made by an Executive Minister under this section shall be set at liberty without the consent of the Minister for Defence.

(3) Every person who at the date of the passing of this Act is serving a sentence of imprisonment or penal servitude imposed on him by a tribunal established by the military authorities shall, whether he is or is not a person ordinarily subject to military law, continue to serve such sentence so long as it is unexpired.

Mr. MORRISSEY: I beg to move the following amendment:—

In Sub-Section (1) (a), lines 28 and 29, to delete the words “in the opinion of those authorities,” and to substitute therefor the words “those authorities certify in writing that for stated reasons they are of opinion that.”

I do not think there is any necessity to say much in connection with this amendment. I expect the Minister will accept it. The same argument applies in the case of amendment Number 11, which the Minister has already agreed to.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: For the same reasons as those which I stated in connection with the previous amendment, I propose to accept this amendment, and on the same condition. I do not think there is anything in the amendment which would imply that this certificate or written statement should be served on a prisoner. We do not propose to do that, but if what is intended is to secure that there shall be confidential departmental records, I think it is reasonable.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NAGLE: I beg to move the following amendment:—

In Sub-Section (1) (b), lines 31 and 32, to delete the words “in the opinion of such Minister,” and to substitute therefor the words “such Minister certifies in writing that for stated reasons he is of opinion that.”

I think it is similar to the last two that were accepted.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I accept the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DAY: I beg to move: “To delete Sub-section (2).” According to this sub-section, the civil authorities, in my opinion, are subordinate to the military authorities, and I do not think that is a desirable thing. Also, according to the sub-section, while it gives the Executive Minister power to keep a prisoner in custody, it does not give him power to release him; that power is vested in the Minister for Defence. For that reason I move the deletion of the sub-section.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy should note that Section 3 deals specifically with the people who are now in the custody of the military authorities; it deals with people at present in military custody. It is natural that the Minister for Defence, who has the primary responsibility for the military situation in the country, should be consulted before prisoners who were arrested on grounds of military necessity are released. I am not particularly set upon keeping in that section if Deputies are keen on getting it out, because, as a matter of practice, prisoners will not be released without consultation with the Minister for Defence. Whether we say it here in the Bill or not, it does not make very much difference. If the Deputy insists, we are prepared to give way on that and to take out the sub-section.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I think that will be all covered in the definition the Minister promised to insert in the Act of “military authorities.” Under the sub-section we have just passed persons may be detained in custody under this Act by the military authorities if in their opinion they ought to be so kept. I can scarcely conceive any definition of the words "military authorities" that would not necessarily include the Minister for Defence. I think the power of detention is not really lessened by the acceptance of this amendment, and it prevents the appearance of setting up one Minister to overrule the order made by another.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I think the Minister, in view of his own and Deputy FitzGibbon's arguments, should accept the amendment and delete the paragraph. There is an implication in the paragraph as it stands that the civil Minister is really subordinate to the military Minister. That is a position of affairs I do not think the Dáil would consider desirable. It is a kind of thing we all want to get away from. The whole basis of government by Executive Council, or anything like that, is rather in the direction that there should be unity, and this paragraph suggests that there could be possible disunity and subordination of the civil to the military side of the Executive Council. I hope the Minister accepts the amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The amendment is accepted.

Amendment agreed to.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I desire to move the following amendment:—

In Sub-section (3), line 41, to add at the end the words "or until an Appeal Council, upon review of his case, in manner provided by this Act, reduces or remits the sentence imposed by the tribunal."

As Deputies are all aware, the next section provides for the setting up of Appeal Councils. I do not propose to discuss these things just now until I come to that section. In passing I wish to say we do not think they are quite satisfactory as provided for in the Bill. The section as it stands deals with persons or prisoners who have already been dealt with and sentenced by military tribunals. Sentences that are imposed upon them are now subject to review. The intention of my amendment is to give to those prisoners a chance of having their cases, if not exactly re-heard, at least reviewed. Now, we may have very different opinions about the conduct and the quality of the military; but, that apart, we all know that these tribunals—military committees as they were called here some months ago—have been sitting in secret. They have operated in a period of great strain and of great stress, in a period when they themselves and the other military with whom they were associated were subject daily and nightly to armed attacks by the Irregulars. It will be more than human, and even Ministers will not claim that, taking them on the whole, the military were more than human. It would be more than human to expect that in all cases of prisoners that came before them they would be uninfluenced by the circumstances of the time. I do not want to make an attack on their integrity or anything like that, but it would be too much to expect that they would be uninfluenced in some cases, perhaps, by the circumstances of the prisoners who came before them. They would be, perhaps, influenced by the previous knowledge of the character and activities of the prisoners. In all these circumstances it would be too much to expect, I think, that they would give anything approaching the consideration or the discriminating judgment that any court of a legal or lawyer kind or even an Appeal Court such as seems to be contemplated in this Bill under another section, would give. I suggest that the prisoners who are being sentenced by these Courts ought to have some opportunity of having their cases reviewed. They may be, and some of them undoubtedly are, amongst the worst criminals that we have ever been cursed with in this country. In every country, this country included, apart from crimes arising out of such a condition of affairs such as has prevailed here for the last fifteen months, the very worst sort of crimes and of criminals accused of the most heinous offences which our imagination can conceive, have an opportunity in ordinary law of appealing from the decision of the lower Courts that have power to convict and sentence them, to higher or other Courts. It would not be too much to ask that the opportunities that have been given, and are still in many cases given, under the ordinary law, to ordinary criminals, no matter how bad or black their records, should be given to these prisoners, no matter how bad their records. None of us are infallible. None of the military courts that have been set up are infallible. Ministers do not even claim that their various Intelligence Sections have been infallible, because they admit, and it is likely enough, that there are a number of prisoners detained at present who perhaps ought not to have been detained. It is not unlikely that there are prisoners at present undergoing sentences who ought not to be under sentence, and whose sentences ought not to be of such a lengthy duration as those originally imposed. There has not been, outside some sections of the Dáil and the Executive Council, in the country as a whole a great deal of confidence in secret tribunals and secret courts. There has been a good deal of distrust, and there has always very properly been a good deal of distrust of secret courts. Now we have an opportunity of rather remedying that state of affairs. Therefore I would ask the Dáil to adopt this amendment, again as one of those things, little enough in its way, that would help us to some extent—to bring us back, if you like, by easy stages—to the ordinary and normal course of law. I think that the Executive Council would gain in public confidence if it took this step and decided that there should be some review of these cases. I suggest that, and I propose the amendment in order to better the Bill and to take out of it one of its bad features. On principle, I object to the Bill all through. But I would be prepared to endeavour to improve it, and I think it would be a distinct improvement, and I ask the Dáil to accept it.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I agree with much of what Deputy O'Shannon has said with regard to the advisability of reviewing the cases that have been heard and the sentences that have been passed by the Military Courts. In point of fact, we do propose to have such a review. We do propose to establish such a review in the future, but not under this Bill, and not by these Appeal Councils established under this Bill. Before the elections an Indemnity Bill will be introduced. It is customary in passing out from a condition of war to pass a Bill Indemnifying Military Officers and other such persons who, in the course of operations, and who, in the course of the conduct of the war, have technically infringed the ordinary normal law of the country.

Now, when we bring that Bill to the Dáil we will provide, within its terms, for Civil machinery to pass in review the cases that have been dealt with by the military courts, with powers to reduce the sentences, and so on, if they think it advisable to reduce the sentences; but we do not propose to establish such machinery under this Bill; and to give the Appeal Councils which it is proposed to set up under this Bill any jurisdiction in that matter, would be to entirely alter their character. They will not be Courts or Tribunals in the ordinary acceptance of these words. They will be Departmental Committees to advise the Minister. Their proceedings will not be public, and will not partake, in any way, of the nature of a trial. They will be small Committees, sitting privately, to hear from any prisoner, who wishes to state it, the cause why he should not be further detained. They will have in their possession a summary, at any rate, of the reasons which convinced the Executive that it was advisable to detain the particular prisoner, and they will hear from that prisoner his side of the case, and why he considers he ought not to have been suspected of committing any of the offences, or of assisting in committing any of the offences set out in the Schedule. But it cannot be too strongly stressed that the proposal is not to establish Courts for the trial of those persons, and still less to establish Courts for the trial of Executive Ministers. These Appeal Councils will be confidential advisory departmental committees. I do go a long way with Deputy O'Shannon in his remarks as to the advisability of passing in review sentences passed by military courts in times of stress and heat, and I give that undertaking that in later legislation which we will bring before this Dáil there will be machinery to meet that end.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I have no enthusiasm for this amendment, because this particular section is one which I do not think any change of words could make acceptable, and because I entertain the hope that the Executive themselves, before this Bill is done with, will come round to the view that this particular section ought not to be pressed in the interests of their good name, as well as in the interests of the repute of the Dáil, and I will tell the House why. The Minister told us, upon another amendment, that the Executive entertained no vindictive feelings. Obviously the Executive should entertain no vindictive feelings, but it is impossible for a section of this kind to wear any other aspect than an aspect of being vindictive. I think it is absolutely unprecedented to prescribe by law that a prisoner shall not get out until his sentence is completed. If there is a precedent for it I should like to hear it. It ought to be unprecedented, because circumstances sometimes come to light that alter the facts as presented originally to the tribunal that tried the case, and it is wrong for the Dáil, and wrong for the Executive, to debar itself from dealing again, as it ought to deal, with a case, the aspect of which may be completely changed later on. How much more is that the case when we are dealing with people tried in secret by military and non-judicial courts. I remember, a short while ago, asking the Minister for Defence for a return of persons convicted by Military Courts within a certain period in the city and county of Dublin, and he said it was not in the public interest to answer that question; and the fact is that the Dáil has no information as to how many persons were convicted by military courts nor as to the offence, nor, indeed, as to the manner of their trial.

The Minister said just now that these sentences were to be reviewed. If that be the settled intention of the Executive, is there anything to be gained from the Ministerial point of view in stating in an Act of Parliament that you are going to keep in prison people tried by military Courts until they have completed their sentence. Is there anything to be gained from the Executive point of view by keeping this section in the Bill at all? All these trials, we are told, are to be reviewed under another Act of Parliament, and therefore this section does not mean what it says. This section will be repealed, and in respect to a matter which is going to be repealed by subsequent legislation we are asked to pass this unprecedented section—a section which is bound to have the air of being vindictive, and a section which incidentally, I suggest, is utterly unconstitutional, because its effect is to validate trials which were not constitutional, and of making into crimes offences which were not technically crimes when committed, such as having a pistol without a permit.

We do not know exactly what people were sentenced for, but there must be many sentences for offences which, when the people were sentenced by the military courts for them, were not crimes at all in the ordinary sense of the word. This Dáil is not permitted to legislate retrospectively to make things crimes which were not crimes at the time they were committed. But the effect of this section is to validate everything done by the military Courts, and that at a time when the Minister acknowledges that some review is necessary, and undertakes that he will make such review. I hope, before this Bill goes further, this particular section, which is a very serious blot upon it from the point of view even of the most zealous Free Stater, will be reconsidered. It effects nothing desirable. It effects nothing that will be of much use to the Ministry if they are going to bring in a Bill to review sentences, and it is putting upon the Statute Book a thing which should not be put on any Statute Book, that sentences—in these cases not imposed by legal tribunals upon persons who committed offences—cannot hereafter be reduced. That is a wrong principle.

Even in English law there is always the prerogative of pardon, and it is right the Executive should retain power to release prisoners when it is proper to release them, even after they are sentenced with every proper formality according to the ordinary law. When the Minister himself tells us that he is not going to ask the Dáil or the country to accept the military sentences as being perfect, without review, passed as they were in a time of war and in a time of trouble, surely it is not necessary, and certainly not desirable, to insert in this Bill a section which effects nothing worth effecting, and which puts into our legislation a very unfortunate blot that one would be sorry to see established in Irish law at this very early stage of the Free State's proceedings. In addition, this section indirectly, not directly, purports to validate what has been done by military courts before anybody outside of the Executive has had an opportunity of knowing what these Courts did. The Dáil in the dark, and necessarily in the dark, will be asked to say that sentences passed in very troubled times by these military Courts are here and now going to be ratified and must be completed, although the Minister himself says "We do not mean that"; but that is what the Dáil will be asked. I hope, on reconsideration, that this matter will not be forced into the Bill.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The Deputy has raised several important points which, I think, will require considerable discussion, but I do not propose to discuss all of them, or in fact many of them, on this particular amendment. I should rather like to confine myself strictly to the amendments, though I do not think that the discussion has been out of order, or anything like that. The discussion, I am glad to say, has brought out a statement from the Minister promising an Indemnity Bill. I think that that will give a certain amount of satisfaction to the country. At the same time, I do not think he has made the case that I should like to have seen put up, or that even his promise of an Indemnity Bill meets that case. I put it to him that the section, or the sub-section, as it stands practically legalises the sentences that have already been enforced. Now, we have not had much experience of Indemnity Acts in Ireland, and I am doubtful whether an Indemnity Act can cover the case of sentences. It could, and usually does, cover cases of persons and actions. I do not know whether it is intended that the Indemnity Act should legalise things which, perhaps, at the time of their doing were not strictly legal, but its intention and its provisions will, of course, protect the officers of the State, who had to undertake certain actions, against the ordinary legal penalties and risks that would commonly follow under the ordinary law. I think I should want to see and examine closely the provisions of the Indemnity Bill before they would satisfy me. At the same time, the Minister's promise of an Indemnity Bill is welcome. There is another point, and that is the question of time. The Minister says that it is intended to introduce the Indemnity Bill before the elections, and presumably to have it carried and put into effect before the elections. The Minister, perhaps, knows, but none of the rest of us know, when that may be. We have no idea when to expect the Bill. It may be within the next five months, but we have no idea when this particular Bill will be introduced.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It must be before the 5th of January of next year.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: That is what I was saying, that it is likely to be introduced within the next five months. This Bill before us now is coming into operation and into effect as soon as the Ministry can get it through the two Chambers of the Oireachtas. I think it is just as urgent a matter that this review, which the Minister in principle has agreed to, should be made as that any Section of this Act should be carried into effect. You want this Act immediately. I suggest that if there are to be reviews, that the review of these sentences are urgent. I said, when I was speaking before, that the amendment had some relation to the Appeal Councils mentioned elsewhere in the Act. The Minister has thrown some light on the character, if not exactly on the constitution of these Appeal Councils. It would undoubtedly be more satisfactory if the regular Civil Courts had power to deal with these review cases. I regretted to hear the Minister say that the Appeal Councils will be merely Departmental, confidential and advisory committees. I should prefer if their scope was much wider. That, however, is a matter for argument when the Section dealing with them comes on for discussion. I would put it to the Minister that there is a doubt as to whether the Indemnity Bill can really declare legal these sentences, or vary them, or anything like that. I would ask the Minister, and also the Dáil, not to legalise these sentences by letting the Sub-Section stand as it is. I wish he could find a way to extend the scope and powers of the Appeal Councils so that they could really do the work now, or as soon as may be convenient before the elections. I submit to the Dáil that the question of time in this matter is of great importance, at least of very considerable importance for the reasons I have mentioned, because the revision of these sentences, if it came now, would show a desire of a return to normal legal processes, and would have a big effect on the country and on the people in the country, even on some of the opponents of this State. It would show that while we are not exactly out of the wood yet, that there is a preparedness to meet the coming out of the wood. Therefore, I submit that the question of time is important, and that the sooner this is done the better. I would like if that could be provided for in this Bill, and not wait until we get in our hands this other Bill. The promise that an Indemnity Bill is coming is very important indeed.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I would suggest that the offer of the Minister might be accepted as sufficient ground for withdrawing this amendment. An Indemnity Bill properly speaking, of course, has nothing whatever to do with sentences that have been passed. It is to indemnify people who have acted in a manner which was technically illegal at the time. But I understood the Minister to say that in that Indemnity Bill, besides indemnifying those servants of the State who may have been guilty of technical illegalities, he proposes to set up a tribunal—that is a matter quite independent of the Indemnity Bill—to revise sentences that have been passed by military Courts. I was very glad indeed to hear that assurance. The Appeal Councils are dealing with a wholly different matter, and it is, in my humble judgment, very important that they should be able to get on with their real work, which is releasing untried prisoners, rather than have their time taken up by trying over again cases that have already been tried. If you are going to retry cases, with all the witnesses, and go into the whole matter over again, that is necessarily a long job. If the Appeal Councils have their time occupied with retrying already convicted prisoners, they will not be able to get to what seems to me their real duty—that is, releasing prisoners untried and under detention, against whom there may not possibly be sufficient ground for the detention that has been imposed upon them. Therefore, I think that, in the interests of the persons who are really most affected of all—the innocent people who would be let out, we will assume, by the Appeal Councils—the Appeal Councils should not be burdened with the task of retrying men who have been already convicted. It seems to me that the definite undertaking given by the Minister that a proper legal tribunal will be set up to investigate sentences that have been imposed ought to be sufficient, and that we ought to let these Appeal Councils go free to deal with the untried prisoners who have a right under this Bill to appeal to them for immediate release.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Dáil appreciates the promise that the Minister has made regarding the setting up of a tribunal whose duties will be to review the sentences that have been imposed by military tribunals. I think we all realise the force of the argument of Deputy Fitzgibbon that the time and attention of the proposed Appeal Councils should be devoted to the consideration of the cases of untried prisoners; but there is equal force, I think, in the contention that the cases of the prisoners sentenced by military tribunals should have early reconsideration and early review. The purpose of the amendment is to endeavour to ensure that there should be review of those sentences at an early date. I think it will be generally recognised that amongst those who have been tried and sentenced are a number—perhaps many—who have on what they considered to have been conscientious grounds—political consciences have been at work—refused to plead. The evidence appeared to be strongly against them, and they were sentenced. It is known to Deputies that, though many of the prisoners had the right under the Regulations to call for legal defence, they did not utilise that right. They did not realise they had such a right, and failed to take advantage of the legal defence which was available. There is the further fact that there was no publicity, and there may have been injustices committed. There may have been unreasonable sentences imposed of which the Dáil or the public knows nothing. We would urge that within this Bill such a tribunal as the Minister foreshadows, as intended to be embodied in an Indemnity Bill, might well be set up—perhaps not the Appeal Council, but some other. I suggest that even the Appeal Councils might quite reasonably be asked to look over the cases of prisoners who have been sentenced—I do not think there are very many—not to retry, but to act somewhat as a Grand Jury might, and at least to review, and see if there is, on the face of it, a case for immediate revision. If the Minister is not prepared to establish within this Bill a tribunal to retry or review the cases that have been before the military Courts, it may not be too much to ask that the Appeal Councils might be empowered to go over the evidence that has already been written down in regard to specific cases, and see whether, in their opinion, any such cases should be immediately retried. That, I think, would reasonably come within the scope of the suggested Appeal Councils. This may be considered going a little too fast, but it does follow upon the amendment and the discussion. I would ask the Minister if he can see his way to meet the demand submitted in the amendment in such a way as to ensure that there shall be at an early date some opportunity for a review of the sentences, at least in these cases which might obviously require speedy retrial.

[Mr. FitzGibbon.]

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided:—Tá, 11; Níl, 42.

Tá.

Tomás de Nogla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Foin.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Éabhróid.

Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Gearóid Ó Suileabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mag Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Deasmhuhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Staineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Sir Seamus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.

Liam Mag Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niccail.
Piaras Béaslaí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigin.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dóláin.
Aindriú Ó Láinhin.
Proinsias Mag Aonghusa.
Éamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murthadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinsann de Faoite.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I take it that Section 3 is now before the Dáil, and perhaps I shall not be accused of obstruction if I say one word—

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:
A motion has to be moved that the Section, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move: "That the Section, as amended, stand part of the Bill." In doing so I want to state, with regard to amendments 13 and 14, which I accepted, that it will be necessary for me at a future stage in some way to alter or modify the words as they stand. I am informed that where it is set out in a Bill that reasons must be stated that it is then open to the Court—in fact it is the duty of the Court if called upon—to examine those reasons and see if they are good and sufficient. Now we could not create a situation in which the Courts could be asked to survey the reasons for a particular person's internment and to pronounce on those reasons. The reason will, in many cases, be partial and incomplete. Very often the source of evidence with regard to a person is such that in times like these to disclose it, or give any information that would lead to its disclosure, would probably be endangering life. In a situation like that we cannot leave it open to the Courts to review the reasons of the Executive for interning a particular individual and to pronounce on these reasons as to whether they are good or sufficient. I want to make this perfectly clear, that it is not an objection to having a confidential departmental record setting out in general terms the reasons for the person's internment, but I must insert words, or in some way qualify these that I have inserted, so that it will not be a matter that can be brought before the Courts for a verdict, whether these reasons are good enough to justify the detention of a person. I thought it right to say that before the amendment would be through, for, as a general thing, when an amendment is accepted in that way you do not like to be told afterwards that you ran away from it. Deputy Johnson made it clear that he did not want anything served on the prisoner. I was, I think, emphatic on that: that we were not going to charge a prisoner or give him a statement as to the reasons for his detention. Simply as a corollary to that, we do not wish to place ourselves in this position—that the prisoner could apply to the Courts to examine the reasons for his detention and to say whether they were sufficient. I will have to take advice on the matter and go into it closely, but I give notice that at some future stage of the Bill I will qualify this.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the Minister will find on his examination that even the safeguard that he has agreed to insert is not going to impose any very grave risk or limit his power to any appreciable degree. The utmost, I think, the amendment, if accepted, will accomplish—I hope it will accomplish more, but I have not much expectation—will be to ensure in this case, as in the others, that the person responsible for stating the reasons will have to think out these reasons. He will have to write something down which imposes on him a certain responsibility, and perhaps before the Appeal Court the records may be called for and the reasons then will be available. It will not be possible, for the detention of persons merely by inadvertence, for new reasons to be given at the time the Appeal Court is going to enquire into the case. I do not think that the Minister need be very anxious that he is giving away very much. On Section 6 I would ask the Minister to give some consideration to the point raised by Deputy Gavan Duffy. It was quite new to me, but I think it is important. It refers to Sub-section (3), where the Oireachtas is asked to state in an Act of Parliament that a person who is being sentenced shall continue to serve such sentence so long as it is unexpired. This may be a matter of phrasology, but as it stands it seems to me almost to limit the prerogative of mercy. It almost limits the power of the Minister to advise that a sentence should be brought to a conclusion.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Would it meet the Deputy if I were to add there, "until such time as reviewed by a competent tribunal"?

Mr. JOHNSON: I think that that would go all the way to meet that point.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: Do I understand that the Minister for Home Affairs will deal with that matter on the Report Stage?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Yes, I undertake to do so.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: This Section raises a very serious and difficult question—namely, what is a Government in the position of the present Government to do with its prisoners after a civil war? I am the first to admit that it is a difficult question. I want, without any special pleading and without rhetoric, to put plainly before the Dáil what, I was informed, was done in similar circumstances in South Africa. The parallel is extraordinarily close. Dutchmen fighting Dutchmen there. Here Irishmen fighting against Irishmen.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: No; burning and robbing Irishmen.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: The parallel is extraordinarily close. There may be a difference in the length and duration of the rebellion in one place, and a difference as to the actual number of prisoners taken. I think the South African rebellion lasted two or three months. There were not so many prisoners as here, but there was a large quantity of prisoners. There was, of course, extremely strong bitterness, as there always is in time of civil war, between the two sides. General Botha and General Smuts were the people at the head of the military and civil sides. Would you believe that when the war was over they did not intern anyone on suspicion? I am giving the Dáil the facts as given to me by a gentleman well known to a good many members, and who served under both of them, and whose recollection I therefore accept as being of a thing with which he was personally conversant. One man, and one man only, was executed, and he was executed for mutiny by the military. Nobody was kept in internment on suspicion. General Botha took quite a different method, and I ask the Dáil to remember that his problem was a much more serious one than our problem, because the war was at its height. This was at the beginning of 1915; the rebellion had occurred in 1914, and if the rebels had succeeded, South Africa was lost to the British Empire. Therefore he was dealing with a very serious problem, and everybody knows that to-day there has been a very general and sincere reconciliation in South Africa between those who were formerly fighting one another. Smuts and Botha established special tribunals to try those whom they had taken in arms, and those tribunals were not manned by military men. Those tribunals were manned by people of legal experience and qualifications—people accustomed to weighing evidence and people trained to giving their decisions without any regard to party feeling or passion. What is, perhaps, the more remarkable is the nature of the sentences that were imposed. The trials, of course, were very numerous. Sentences were imposed of three months, six months, and nine months' duration. I am not sure if in any case a sentence went to eighteen months. There were in all cases very short sentences. I know also that the persons sentenced were released very shortly afterwards without completing their sentence. I think that General De Wet himself came out of the prison to which he had been sentenced in less than nine months. I mention those matters because I think it is well, when the Dáil is asked to pass a very extraordinary measure of this kind, that it should reflect first, and ask itself whether it is doing the right thing. Botha's system may have been right or wrong, but at all events he had a definite system with a definite end to it. He accomplished his purpose. I will not paint the lily by commenting, but I ask the Dáil to look upon that picture and the picture presented in this Bill.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The Minister says it was not a case of fighting here in Ireland but a case of burning and robbing. It may or may not be that. Proportionately there was more burning and robbing in Ireland than there was in South Africa or in any other country in which there was civil war. These are accompaniments of civil war, and there was burning and robbing very extensively in the United States, South Africa and other places. One of the very common charges against De Wet was indiscriminate looting, raiding and burning. I do not know that he conducted himself very much better than some of the leaders of the Irregulars in the South. You do not get over the point by saying it was burning and robbing from fellow citizens. As a matter of fact, I do not think that comes exactly into this Section at all. The Section gives power for the further detention of people who have been sentenced or people who are presently interned. Some of those no doubt are interned on suspicion of having been connected with burning and robbing, but a great many of them have not. Nobody but the Ministry can tell us whether a majority or not have been convicted or held in detention because they are suspected of having taken part in the acts mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule, not, as the Minister would like us to deduce, for taking part in the two offences for which, in my opinion, a particularly brutal punishment is provided in the Bill. No parallels are absolutely complete. We do not get such things, but at least it is to be noted that in South Africa, the United States, and the other places those things were wound up by the Courts. I am glad the Minister has agreed to insert the words "in any stage until reviewed by a competent Court" in one of the Sections. That goes a considerable distance, and if that mind were revealed right throughout the Section it would be more satisfactory still. Even if I may mention it, in one of the most serious of the cases, in America the conspirators who were tried by military commission for the assassination of President Lincoln and the attempted assassination of others, part of the charges against them were burning and robbing, not merely of assassination. So the Minister's argument in that does not come in. I think it well worth the while of the Dáil to consider that Courts are the proper way of disposing of these things, and for the Dáil to remember that not only will there be an Indemnity Act but also an Amnesty Act, as there have been in all such controversies in other countries.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 3, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Dáil divided:—Tá, 35; Níl, 12.

Tá.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Suileabháin.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mag Ualghair.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Domhnall Mac Carthaigh.
Sir Seamus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mag Aonghusa.
Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.

Piarras Béaslaí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaioch.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dólaín.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Proinsias Mag Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faioite.

Níl.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Seamus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Motion declared carried.

SECTION 4.

(1) As soon as may be after the passing of this Act there shall be established by an Executive Minister one or more Appeal Councils, consisting of not less than three members, of whom one shall be a person certified by the Attorney-General to have legal knowledge and experience.

(2) Any person detained in custody under this Act, whether under an order of an Executive Minister or by the military authorities, may in the prescribed manner request that an enquiry into the matter of his detention be made by an Appeal Council, and such Council shall thereupon with all convenient speed inquire in the prescribed manner into the case of such person, and shall report in the prescribed form to such Executive Minister the result of such inquiry.

(3) Whenever an Appeal Council has inquired into and reported on the case of any person under this section, and either

(a) such Council has reported that such person has failed to show that there is no reasonable ground for suspecting him of having committed or been engaged or concerned in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in the Schedule to this Act; or

(b) an Executive Minister, having considered the report of such Council, is of opinion that the public safety would be endangered by such person being set at liberty;

such person may be detained in custody in any place within or outside the jurisdiction of Saorstát Éireann during such period as an Executive Minister considers that the public safety would be endangered by such person being set at liberty.

(4) No person serving a sentence of imprisonment or penal servitude imposed by a tribunal established by the military authorities shall be entitled to appeal to an Appeal Council under this section.

(5) An Executive Minister shall make regulations for the execution by Appeal Councils of the functions imposed on them by this section, and the word "prescribed" where used in this section means prescribed by such regulations.

Amendment by Mr. GAVAN DUFFY:
 "To insert before Section 4 a new section as follows:—

" 'For every hundred persons detained without trial in any one place of detention, under this Act, at least one qualified medical officer shall be appointed, and whenever any such medical officer shall report to the Governor or other the person in chief control of a place of detention that a person there detained is seriously ill, it shall be the duty of such Governor or other the person in chief control immediately to notify by telegram the wife, husband, or nearest relative of such detained person, and to admit such wife, husband, or nearest relative, without further authority or formality, to visit such detained person, and likewise forthwith to admit, without further authority or formality, any medical man of recognised professional standing whom such wife, husband, or relative may call in as a specialist or consultant.' "

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: There is a misprint in the first line of the amendment. The word "hundred" ought to read "five hundred." I think the fault may be mine, because, although the "hundred" is corrected in my carbon copy to "five hundred," it may not have been corrected in the copy I sent in. The proposal, therefore, is that for every five hundred persons interned there should be a medical officer, and that when anyone in the internment camp is seriously ill the medical officer should inform the Governor, and that it shall be the duty of the Governor to telegraph to the wife or nearest relative. It is also proposed to admit the wife or nearest relative, and to admit any specialist or consultant who is a recognised medical man that the wife or nearest relative desires to have admitted. I hope that Deputy Sir James Craig, to whom I showed this amendment in draft at the same time as the amendment concerning the appointment of a Medical Committee, will see his way to give me at least some support on this amendment, even if it does not commend itself to the Executive authority. The matter arises in this way. I have particulars here which I communicated some time ago to the Minister for Defence in connection with the death of Dr. Ferran. I have not yet got the Minister's reply, but he did deal briefly with the matter in answer to a question yesterday or the day before. The circumstances of that case are very painful, and I want to guard against a recurrence of anything of the kind. The information I have is that word first came from a private source that Dr. Ferran was very seriously ill on Friday, the 8th June.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

The Deputy cannot refer to the case of any individual prisoner under this. We are not dealing with the case of Dr. Ferran at present.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: If I may say so, I quite agree, sir; but surely I would be in order if I quote Dr. Ferran's case for the purpose of showing that an amendment such as this is necessary? At the present time it may be supposed that specialists and consultants are allowed in when a prisoner is dying. It may be supposed that the wife can go in when a prisoner is dying as a matter of course. I am referring to these unfortunate circumstances in order to show that it has not been so, and that is the only purpose for which I refer to it. Dr. Ferran died on the night of Saturday-Sunday, at 2 a.m., and the first intimation that he was ill came out privately at 3.30 the day before. His wife was not admitted until after 8.30 on the following day—the day that he died. Immediately this private word came out, a request for permission to see the prisoner and for the admission of a specialist and a consultant was made.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

If the Deputy wants to refer to Dr. Ferran's case particularly, he will get plenty of opportunities for doing it, but he cannot do it on this section.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: To what extent may I refer to it?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

You can raise the case of the death of Dr. Ferran, and you will get any opportunity you wish to do so, but you cannot deal with the case of Dr. Ferran in full. It is not a passing reference that you are making to it; you are going into the case in full.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: On a point of order, might I ask is it not in order for a Deputy to refer to any case in illustration of the argument he is using, as I did in the case of certain people yesterday evening?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I cannot consent to go on with this amendment if I am precluded from stating publicly the reasons which make such an amendment necessary. It is not a case of using this amendment for the purpose of recrimination. It is a question of using the facts which are within my knowledge to prevent a similar episode. If, sir, you rule that I cannot proceed to show the necessity for my amendment by what has actually occurred, some of it in the admission of the short answer made by the Minister for Defence the other day, it is useless for me to attempt to convince the Dáil that the amendment is necessary. I would respectfully submit that it would be an unheard of thing to prevent a Deputy from stating reasons drawn from actual facts, from actual occurrences, which prompt him to put before the Dáil a certain amendment. If you rule to the contrary, I cannot proceed.

Mr. DAVIN: The Minister for Home Affairs asked us yesterday, in discussing this Bill, to confine ourselves to the facts within our knowledge. When I tried to do so to-day I was told I was slandering some people outside.

Mr. JOHNSON: I support the view taken by Deputy Gavan Duffy and Deputy O'Shannon on the point of order made, provided that the use of any name is merely to make a specific illustration of an argument in support of the motion. I think it is perfectly in order, provided that the Deputy is not making use of that illustration for some ulterior motive. If the Deputy had used the words, say, "a prisoner," I submit it would have been in order without question. Inasmuch as the Deputy referred to Doctor Ferran, it would not make the procedure out of order.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: I am ruling that the reference to Dr. Ferran is out of order. I think the Deputy is out of order in going into the merits or demerits of the case connected with the death of Dr. Ferran. If he wants the case debated, he has opportunities of doing so other than on this Section. I am not ruling that he is out of order in illustrating his case by mentioning Dr. Ferran's case, but in going into the case in full.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: If that is the objection, I undertake not to go into the case in full or anything like it. It is a very simple matter. I suggest and I press upon the Dáil that the amendment now before us is necessary in order to prevent the death of a prisoner, without an opportunity being given to the prisoner's wife to attend his dying bedside. I put it that it would be indefensible for a dying prisoner, or a dying prisoner's wife, to be refused the advantage of having such specialist or consultant, being a well-known professional man, as the prisoner or his wife might think proper to call in. I think it is also indefensible that where a prisoner is seriously ill that that fact should be ascertained privately and not publicly in the first instance. I think it is indefensible that conflicting statements should be made on the telephone from a prison as to whether or not a dying prisoner is seriously ill. I think no one can defend a case where the medical authority, in a camp like the Curragh, informs the relatives on the telephone that a prisoner is dying, and yet the prisoner's relatives are not admitted until 24 hours afterwards, when he is unconscious. That is the kind of thing I want to avoid, and if you are adopting this horrible expedient of interning thousands of people without trial, the least that an Executive may be expected to do is to make stringent rules to ensure that in a case of that kind proper humane treatment and justice will be given to the prisoner and his relatives. That is the very least that an Executive, in its own interests and in the interests of the country, ought to ensure.

It may be regulations have been made of which we know nothing. They ought to be published. I do not know of any such regulations, but I do know from what has actually occurred in the case which I have cited that it is essential to insist that the relatives of a dying man, or at least the nearest relative, shall have access. That has not been respected in at least one case. It may be due to want of co-ordination between different military authorities, but, whatever the cause, it ought to be removed, and every care should be taken that it shall not happen again. There should be also leave given to a specialist or consultant to visit a dying man. There was a case in which permission was refused to a specialist or consultant who was asked to see a dying person. Can anybody justify a thing like that, particularly if a man has been ill a short time before and is known to be delicate? The object of this amendment, word it any way you like, is to secure that when a man is dying in internment, a man uncharged, it shall be the absolute duty of the Government to notify his nearest relative by telegram, and to admit that nearest relative at once. Is it not a shocking thing that a military authority at a camp like the Curragh should give leave to a wife or a relative to see a person who is dying, and that that leave should be cancelled as ultra vires by a higher authority in Dublin? That is the kind of thing that you have to fight against in any matter of this kind where you are interning people on suspicion without a proper code of rules. I put it to the Ministry that in their own interests and in the interests they represent they ought to lay down and publish a very definite code, showing they will be no parties to the recurrence of anything of the kind. It is bad enough that it should have occurred in one case, but at least let us have very definite assurance, incorporated in some such way as I suggest in the Bill, that both those grievances will be quite definitely removed, as to the access both of a nearest relative as soon as it is known a man is seriously ill, and of a specialist or consultant who is a well-known professional man.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I do not propose to accept the amendment. I invite the Deputy's attention to Section 13 of the Bill. I submit that under that section regulations can be and will be made providing for the general health and comfort of the detained persons, and when one speaks of efficient management of this and that kind one naturally adverts to sanitation and the general health of the prisoners. Regulations can also be made dealing with cases of serious illness, but this amendment as it stands is unacceptable, and I think that the Deputy would be well advised to waive the matter until we arrive at Section 13. He can again raise the point then that he has now raised. If he does not wish to raise it again I can only assure him that when it comes to the making of regulations under Section 13 what he has said will receive all the consideration that it deserves.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: May I ask if the regulations will be made public?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: You may ask anything you like.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Do I understand the regulations will be private and that the Dáil will never see them?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: You can raise that matter on Section 13.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: The Minister has asked me not to press this amendment on the ground that he is going to make regulations. He says he will consider what I said, but he does not say he will accept what I said. Apparently he is not prepared to say that we shall ever see the regulations.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Raise the matter again when we come to Section 13.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I must say it is very unsatisfactory.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I think the Minister is treating this amendment in a spirit that the amendment does not deserve. I am reluctant to say very much, but it would seem in the face of things that he was dealing rather with the Deputy who proposed the amendment rather than with the amendment. That is not the spirit in which any Deputy in the Dáil should deal with any amendment, and particularly with this.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The discussion on these regulations, which Section 13 deals with in detail, will more properly arise under that section.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I am not dealing with Section 13 at all. I was about to deal with the amendment before the Dáil. I am quite sure that when we come to Section 13 that there will be plenty of discussion on the question of the regulations. In passing I would say that I cannot see that the one word "management" in a section that is providing for the efficient detention of the prisoners leaves or gives much scope for a proper and helpful discussion on the substance of the amendment before the Dáil, unless that detention will be construed wide enough as meaning the prevention of escape by death or something like that. The Minister at this stage is not prepared to consider the substance of the amendment. The arguments put forward in favour of the amendment will, I hope, be considered by the Dáil, because I think they are worthy of consideration at this stage of the Bill. There is nothing, I think, very far-fetched in the amendment. It is naturally one of the first duties of an Executive authority to make proper medical arrangements for its places of detention and its jails.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Hear, hear.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The Minister agrees. The Minister will go further and say that that is already being done. But he has not been good enough, even in answer to this amendment, to tell us exactly what is being done in that respect. We know very little about prison regulations. It would be useful, to say the least of it, if he would detail and outline the arrangements that either are in force at present or that he contemplates putting in force to cover the matter raised in this amendment. If he thinks that one qualified Medical Officer for every 500 prisoners detained in these Internment Camps is either too many or too few; or if that is the number that is there at present he might let the Dáil know. I am not going to accuse him or accuse any Minister of having a particularly stoney heart, but he might let us know whether it is his opinion or the opinion of the Ministry, that Deputy Gavan Duffy is asking too much under present circumstances. He asks that the wife or husband or the nearest relative of the person likely to die in a detention camp should be admitted to that person, or that if, as in these cases, the relatives are very anxious that if only for the comfort of these, not so much as a reflection on the official medical attendance inside, that it would be well to have some properly qualified and some trustworthy Medical Attendant to go in and see that prisoner; the Minister might let us know whether that is too much to ask. But to turn and simply say "You may ask such a thing" and get no answer is not treating the subject with that importance that it really deserves. I support the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: I was hopeful that the Minister would have said, in reference to this amendment, that the circumstances which have resulted in certain suffering and death, and hurt to the friends of those who have died having somewhat passed, there was no risk in the future of these incidents happening again, and that he would have met the amendment by a statement of some reassuring kind in regard to the availability of competent medical assistance, and some assurance too that when the prisoner was seriously ill that his relatives would be immediately advised and allowed access. That, as I read the amendment, is the object sought to be attained and to be made part of the Bill. I do not think that unless the Minister is prepared to amend in a mandatory way, Section 13, that it does meet the case required. It is desirable, I think, that detained persons should know that there is a medical officer available, and that in case of serious illness, that his friends will be informed; and it is fair, I think, to their relatives that they should know that they will of a surety be advised when any of their relatives interned are seriously ill. Every Deputy, I think, has had communications during the past month from people saying that they had no letters from their friends who are interned. They are distraught and wondering what is the matter, whether they are alive or dead, or what is the state of their health. If they had an assurance embodied in a Bill of this kind that such a prisoner, if seriously ill, will have the fact of his illness communicated to his relatives, there would be confidence at any rate that nothing was seriously wrong with the prisoners. That would be a distinct advantage, and I think it would be a humane provision to be embodied in a Bill of this kind. I think it would be proper to make regulations prescribing medical attendance and of the kind that is desired, and conveying information to relatives.

I think the Dáil would feel a great deal of satisfaction if they had the assurance of the Minister that that was the intention; that he would agree to it being put into the Bill, and not that the regulations that will be made will embody the intention of the amendment. One hopes that the reasons that have been given, in the past, for the overcrowding of prisons, and the extraordinary nature of the case, prevented certain things being done that the Minister would like to have been able to do, but in view of the easing of the situation, and the expectation of releases, the less overcrowding, some very positive assurance should be embodied in the Bill that medical attention will be available for prisoners, and that where there is serious sickness the relatives will be informed. I think it is due to the Dáil to have assurances of that kind from the Minister. It would be a source of comfort and confidence if such a provision as this were actually embodied in the Bill. We may have the assurance of the Minister that such regulations will be made; that would be of great value; but from the point of view of giving confidence and comfort to those who fear for their friends who are interned, it is not too much to ask that if anything serious is the matter with the prisoner in his health they should be informed, I think it is due to the House that some assurance of the kind should be given, and if possible, embodied in the Bill.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I do not think that this amendment as it stands could be reasonably accepted because I quite conceive that in certain cases almost the worst thing for a prisoner seriously ill might be for a number of people who if this amendment is passed, would have to be admitted in spite of any consideration of propriety or even of the welfare of the prisoner himself. I think it would not be wise to embody such an amendment in the Bill and make it mandatory. But I would like to add my voice for what it may be worth to what has fallen from Deputy O'Shannon and Deputy Johnson as to some assurance as to the nature of the regulations that are to be made.

An Ceann Comhairle at this stage resumed the chair.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: It does seem to me that it would be very hard to say that provision of medical attendance was fairly included within the 5 sub-heads of Section 13. They seem to me rather to deal with provision as to visitors and letters and the detention of prisoners. But notification to the relatives as to the state of health of a prisoner who is untried and in preventative detention seems to me, ought to be provided for by regulation in some shape or form. I feel it would be very difficult indeed to embody a mandatory provision in the Bill, and especially such a mandatory provision that on the mere receipt of a telegram a wife, husband or other relative of a particular prisoner must be admitted, and that no one has a right to exclude them, when such a visit to a prisoner might be considered by his doctor to have a dangerous effect. As the amendment is drawn the relative would have a right to insist on being admitted although it might be to the actual detriment of the prisoner. For that reason I do not think that the amendment should be accepted in the form in which it is, but I should gladly hear an assurance from the Minister that he will amend Clause 13 so as to provide for some of the matters included in the amendment.

Sir JAMES CRAIG: As Deputy Gavan Duffy introduced my name I want to say a word or two, because I had no idea, when he spoke to me about the number of prisoners that could be attended by a medical officer, that it was intended for an amendment in this case. I could not possibly agree as to the first part of the amendment, and I could not possibly state the number of prisoners that should be attended by one medical officer. None of these men may be really ill at all. A medical officer might attend a thousand prisoners if there was no illness whereas if there was serious illness he could not attend more than 50 or 100, so that the Government must be left entire freedom as to the number of medical officers required. I feel in existing circumstances that there should be one medical officer for each 500 men.

As regards sanitary matters a medical officer could look after that by giving one hour each week. Deputy FitzGibbon touched upon a thing that I feel very shy about. Whereas I would like that the relatives of the prisoner who was seriously ill should be acquainted with the fact, I should be very sorry to have it inserted in the Bill that the relatives should be admitted, under any circumstances. If a man is very ill with pneumonia, it might be most injudicious that his relatives should be admitted at all to see him. With regard to the third point in the amendment, about which I feel most strongly, I say that the Minister should see that it is put into the regulation that where a man is seriously ill, say from pneumonia, his relatives should be acquainted, and if they were anxious that another doctor should be called in as a consultant then I think it should be possible for the prisoner's relatives to have the right to bring in such a consultant. We all know, in private life, that though a consultant may not be able to do anything, still what a relief it is to the friends to have his opinion. I appeal as Deputy FitzGibbon has done, to the Minister to assure us that the relatives should be made acquainted with the fact when a prisoner is dangerously ill, and that if they express a wish to bring in a consultant, they should be allowed to do so.

Dr. WHITE: I desire to support some of the points raised in this amendment. Like the last Deputy I am not going to say what medical attendance there shall be for each person interned, but I certainly think that if an internee becomes seriously ill, the relatives should be acquainted, and the nearest relatives admitted to see the patient. In some cases, of course, the admittance of relatives might be detrimental to the patient, but, on the other hand, I think that the visits of relatives to internees who are ill would be very desirable.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: When I was going through this Bill and the amendments to it, it struck me that Amendment No. 74 could in large part, at any rate, be accepted as a suitable amendment to Section 13. The making of regulations is primarily a matter for the responsible Minister. Section 13 provides that these regulations shall be made by the responsible Minister, and not by Deputy Gavan Duffy. It is the proper thing to suggest, as Amendment 74 suggests, that the regulations should cover certain things. On the question of visits of consultants, and so on, I am well aware that the greatest possible care was taken, all through last year, to ensure that the relatives of prisoners seriously ill would be informed, and that if necessary they would be admitted. I am also well aware that there was never any difficulty whatever, when a bona fide request was put up for a consultant. I am aware, for instance, that a consultant, and the consultant that was asked for, was allowed in to Miss MacSwiney when she was on hunger strike, though that particular illness, and that particular critical condition, was brought on by her own act, and could have been terminated by her own act, or at least rapidly remedied by her own act. Yet, when Madame O'Rahilly came to me and asked that a particular consultant should be allowed in to see Miss MacSwiney, I at once translated that request to the Minister for Defence, and the consultant was, in fact, admitted. There is no use in Deputies getting up and, by implication or innuendo, suggesting that we are out to break the hearts of relatives of prisoners, or that we are out to kill prisoners by ill-treatment, or to deny them any necessary medical, surgical or nursing care. The contrary is the fact, and the contrary is well known to be the fact.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: The Minister does not improve the case by overstating what was said in favour of the amendment. I never said anything distantly resembling the remarks he has apparently attributed to me. I wish to inform him in reference to the admission of Specialists, that the Director of Medical Services asked for a panel of Specialists in cases such as I have referred to. In other words, the mere fact that the man was a Specialist would not be enough. His view was that the military authorities should choose from a panel of Specialists, and from a panel of Specialists submitted by the relatives. The Minister's assurances, I must say, are very unsatisfactory. If he had definitely told me that he would deal with this matter, as suggested, in the Section to which he has referred, and would, if necessary, make the necessary amendment to that Section to enable the matter to be dealt with, I should not have been inclined to press this matter. I should have withdrawn the amendment. Instead of that he deals with the matter very evasively. He does not answer a perfectly reasonable question, and seems to think that the proper way to deal with this matter is to indulge in sneers at the person who proposes the amendment. I think that is a most unsatisfactory way to deal with a matter which is a very serious one for prisoners.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 12; Níl, 34.

Tá.

Tomás de Nogla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Séamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Deasmhunnáin Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Domhnall Mac Carthaigh.
Sir Séamus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.

Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béalal.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Cristóir Ó Bréin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dólaín.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dugáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaire.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Éarnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.

Amendment declared lost.

DAIL RESUMES.

Progress reported; Committee to sit again to-morrow.

The Dáil adjourned at 8.30 p.m.

DAIL EIREANN.

DEARDAOIN, 12ADH IÚL, 1923.

(Thursday, 12th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar 3.5 p.m. Bhí An Ceann Comhairle, Micheál O hAodha, 'sa Chathaoir.

GEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

[ORAL ANSWERS.]

ATHLONE-MOATE-STREAMSTOWN RAILWAY SERVICE.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether he is aware that the inadequate train service on the Midland Great Western Railway is causing great inconvenience to the people of Athlone, Moate and Streamstown; whether the first train for Dublin leaves Athlone at 11.15 a.m., and the last train for Athlone departs from Broadstone at 2.30 p.m.; and whether he will use his influence with the Manager of this railway with a view to having an earlier train run from Athlone to Dublin, and likewise a later one from Dublin.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh) replying for Minister for Industry and Commerce: I have been in communication with the Midland Great Western Railway Co. on this matter. The Railway Co.'s position is still the same as was stated in reply to a question by the Deputy on the 15th November last, except that in regard to a later train in the evening from Dublin the Co. is in communication with the Postmaster-General.

I may explain that on the Post Office side we are endeavouring to get late trains running, not only on the Midland Great Western line, but on other lines. I hope our efforts will materialise before six weeks.

Mr. LYONS: Do you mean within six weeks from now?

Mr. WALSH: Well, certainly not in a lesser time than one month.

Mr. LYONS: It is owing to the number of people taken from Mullingar to Athlone to attend Courts, and that there is no train service to take them back at night, that I raise the question. I think the Government ought press for a better service.

Mr. WALSH: We are pressing for it.

TEMPORARY PRISON STAFF— QUESTION OF PENSION.

LIAM O DAIMHIN asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether provision will be made by him, by way of compensation or pension, for the temporary staff of the prison service, and who were so employed on, or previous to, the 6th December, 1921, should their services be no longer required, and whether any such compensation or pension as may be agreed upon will take into consideration the length of service of the individuals concerned.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. K. O'Higgins): It will be open to any member of the temporary staff of the Prison Service who was employed on or previous to the 6th December, 1921, and who may be discharged, to make a claim for compensation to the Civil Service Committee (Compensation). I would, however, point out to the Deputy that the case of temporary staffs who are liable, under the express conditions of their service, to discharge after a given period of notice stands on a very different footing as regards compensation from that of the pensionable staff.

LAND SETTLEMENT COMMIS- SION COURT DECREES.

SEOIRSE GHABHAIN UI DHUBH-THAIGH asked the Minister for Home Affairs whether it is proposed to put into the forthcoming Dáil Courts Bill a provision enabling the decrees of the Land Settlement Commission Court (including decrees for damages against trespassers) to be enforced.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is not considered necessary to include in the proposed Dáil Courts Bill any provision for the enforcement of decrees of the Land Settlement Commission Court. All such decrees are covered by assignments with the exception of a few which are being enquired into individually by the Minister for Agriculture.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Can the Minister say if the few that are being inquired into individually will cover cases for damages against trespassers?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I could not say.

DUNSHAUGHLIN R.D.C. ESTIMATE.

DOMHNALL O MOCHAIN asked the Minister for Local Government whether the estimate of the Dunshaughlin Rural District Council, passed by that Council on the 30th January, 1923, whereby it was proposed to raise £17,788 off the rates for maintenance of roads, has been sanctioned by the Local Government Department, and, if so, on what date; whether the Minister is aware that the estimate of £17,788, if so sanctioned, exceeded the estimate of the Co. Surveyor by £7,200, and exceeded the limit of expenditure, as fixed by the Local Government Act, by £13,144 5s., and whether the Minister, before sanctioning such excess, satisfied himself as to the necessity therefor, as promised by his letter of 23rd May, 1923, to the Solicitor of the Meath Association of the Irish Farmers' Union; further whether if the Minister satisfied himself as to the necessity for said excess, he would state on what grounds; and to ask, if the said excess has not been sanctioned, he will state whether the Meath Council are legally entitled to issue warrants for and collect rates calculated on the basis of said excess.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. E. Blythe): The estimate of the Dunshaughlin Rural District Council is subject to the sanction of the Minister for Local Government only in so far as his consent is necessary under Sub-section 2 of Section 27 of the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, to expenditure on roads proposed by the Council in excess of the limit fixed in pursuance of that enactment.

The Meath County Council have adopted the estimate of the Rural District Council and applied for consent to an expenditure of £17,700 on roads in the Dunshaughlin Rural District.

I am satisfied, however, after inquiries that the County Surveyor's estimate of £10,588 is reasonable and sufficient and am not prepared to authorise an extension of the limit beyond that figure. Any unexpended balance of rates which may have already been struck in respect of the current financial year in anticipation of an expenditure of £17,788 will be placed in due course to the credit of the Rural District and will be taken into account when next year's rates are under consideration.

The question of the legality of the rate at present being collected is not one for me.

CLOSING OF RURAL SUB-POST OFFICES.

MICHEAL O DUBHGHAILL asked the Postmaster-General how many rural sub-post offices were temporarily closed down on the 1st of May, 1923, in Co. Clare; whether the persons ordinarily employed therein received full salary during the period of enforced idleness; whether new appointments were made during the period of suspension. If the answer to the third portion of the question is in the affirmative, to further ask the Postmaster-General to disclose the method of selection, and if those selected received salary from the date of their appointment or from their taking up work; and to ask that, having due regard to economy, the Postmaster-General will in future fill those positions and posts by tender, coupled with the necessary guarantees.

Mr. WALSH: The information asked for is not available at present, but I have taken steps to obtain it and will communicate with the Deputy on the subject at an early date.

MOATE TELEPHONE SERVICE.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Postmaster-General whether inquiries have been completed with reference to the installation of the telephone service in Moate, and when this service will be in working order; further, whether he is aware of numerous complaints as to the charges for telephone service, and if he contemplates making a 50 per cent. reduction in same, and whether the Postmaster-General has received complaints that the charge of £15 0s. 0d. to private subscribers is considered excessive.

Mr. WALSH: The inquiries regarding the proposed opening of a Telephone Exchange at Moate have just been completed, and definite terms for the rental of lines will be quoted to the prospective subscribers in a few days. Should agreements be signed by a sufficient number of subscribers the Exchange will be opened with the least possible delay.

In the case of new Exchanges the rental for a subscriber's line varies according to local circumstances, and is based upon the cost of the extension of the trunk telephone system to the place, and of the installation of the Exchange equipment. There is no standard charge in such cases, and numerous complaints have been made as to the prohibitive rental usually quoted. It is recognised that high rentals are not conducive to the development of the Telephone Service, and I am having the whole question of Telephone rates enquired into, with a view of ascertaining whether any reduction in the charges is warranted, and whether it would be practicable to afford extensions of the telephone system under more favourable terms.

Mr. LYONS: Is the Postmaster-General aware that a large number of people in Mullingar who had the telephone installed into their premises have now cut it off, owing to £15 being charged and there being no free call allowed? Persons who had the telephone installed had to pay for the calls in addition to the £15, and it was with a view to reducing the charges by the Government that I put this question.

Mr. WALSH: I have already made a very full statement on that subject and I do not want to go into it any further.

ATHLONE BRANCH POST OFFICE.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Postmaster-General if inquiries are yet completed regarding the Branch Post Office, Connaught Street, Athlone, and if he is aware that traders in Connaught Street applied for a licence to sell stamps, and that they were informed that conditions are not such as to warrant the issuing of such licences; and further, in view of the fact that the Minister has already stated in answer to a previous question that a licence would be given, whether he will take steps to relieve the inconvenience caused to the people living in Connaught Street, Athlone, by the closing of the Branch Office.

Mr. WALSH: Inquiry as regards the necessity for a second Post Office in Athlone has been completed, and it is found that the circumstances do not warrant the expenditure involved in the maintenance of such a facility. It is not proposed, therefore, to re-open a Sub-Post Office in that town.

The only application received for a licence to sell stamps has come from a shopkeeper whose premises are licensed for the sale and consumption of intoxicating liquor. It is not usual to grant a stamp licence for premises of the kind, but if an application is received from a shopkeeper in the locality who is not a publican, it will be given favourable consideration.

Mr. LYONS: Can the Postmaster-General state if it is his intention that a person who wants a licence to sell stamps in this particular street is supposed first to lodge £100 as security, and if that person wants to send for £4 worth of stamps that he will have to send £4 for them—will you give any statement to the effect or will you say what that person is gaining by getting this licence?

Mr. WALSH: There is no fee required.

KELLS (CO. MEATH) ARRESTS.

CATHAL O SEANAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether military assisted in the arrest of Michael and Matthew McInerney, Cornacross, Kells, who were apprehended some five or six weeks ago; what charge, if any, has been, or is to be, preferred against these men; whether the Minister is aware that strong representations have been made by the priests and people of this district for the release of these men, on the ground that it is a case of mistaken identity, and to ask if these prisoners will now be released forthwith.

MINISTER for DEFENCE (General Mulcahy): Michael and Matthew McInerney were arrested by military in conjunction with the Civic Guard on suspicion of being concerned in malicious damage to the property of Mr. Bond, Ballinlough. Matthew was released yesterday, and the case of Michael is under consideration.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Can the Minister say whether there is any difference between the two McInerneys?

General MULCAHY: I can only infer that there is. One has, however, been dealt with. The other is being considered.

RATES FOR BUILDINGS OCCUPIED BY FREE STATE FORCES.

LIAM O DAIMHIN asked the Minister for Defence whether several applications have been received by him for rates due for the period ending 31st March, 1923, in respect of premises occupied by Free State Forces in Tullamore, Portlaoighise, and other towns in the division of Leix and Offaly; whether it is the intention, and if so when he intends, to pay such amounts, or will he state the reason for non-payment of same.

General MULCAHY: I do not appear to have received the applications referred to. The question presumably relates to premises commandeered by the military. In arriving at compensation payable in such cases the principle usually adopted is that such compensation shall be inclusive of rates. Applications from local authorities should not, therefore, be sent to the military authority.

KILRUSH I. T. & G. W. PREMISES.

LIAM O BRIAIN asked the Minister for Defence whether he is aware that the premises belonging to the Kilrush Branch of the Irish Transport and General Workers' Union were commandeered by the military in July, 1922, and have since remained in their custody, and that in consequence business in this Branch has to be transacted in the private residence of the Secretary; and whether the Minister will direct that these premises shall be restored to the Kilrush Branch of the I. T. G. W. U. at the earliest possible opportunity; and whether the Minister has received a claim for compensation for such occupation, made on behalf of the Branch, and when such claim will be dealt with.

General MULCAHY: The premises were taken over as a military necessity on 31st July, 1922, and are still occupied by troops. I am having an investigation made, and if it is found possible to evacuate the premises they will be handed over to the owner.

No claim has been received on behalf of the Kilrush Branch of the Irish Transport and General Workers' Union in respect of the occupation of the premises, but a claim made on behalf of the owner is being dealt with by the Office of Public-Works.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DAVIN: I desire to raise a matter of privilege concerning me personally, and concerning what I deem to be a misrepresentation in to-day's papers of what you said yesterday, regarding an incident that happened in the debate. You are credited in to-day's Press with having stated: "The Speaker was understood to say that the statement was slanderous." That refers to the statement I am alleged to have made here yesterday. However questionable my position in this Dáil may appear to any Minister or Deputy, and may I say that can be tested at any time either now or in the near future, I do not admit the right of any Minister or any Deputy to pass judgment here on any statement I make. Unless it is to be assumed that I and those who sit with me appear here as criminals in the dock, I think that your statement, as reported in the Press, is a misrepresentation of what you actually said. I say with all respect I would deny the right of any Minister or Deputy to pass judgment on any statement I make here.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question of whether a particular statement would constitute a slander is, of course, one for a Court to decide, and I would never undertake to give such a decision. But yesterday evening, in order to avoid what I thought might develop into a scene between the Deputy and a Minister, I intervened to point out that any statement made here by a Deputy is covered by the privilege of the Dáil. If an individual is aggrieved by a statement made here, the individual has, I understand, no legal remedy. If the statements were made outside the Dáil a person aggrieved by the statement could take legal proceedings. That was, I think, the meaning which the Minister for Home Affairs had in his mind when he said Deputy Davin could go outside. I think that was what the Minister had in his mind when he said, "Make such a statement outside." I do not think the Minister had any intention of ordering a Deputy out in general. I think the Minister will agree with that.

The Minister indicated assent.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It was in order to prevent the Deputy from misunderstanding the Minister, and to prevent some words that might not help us that I intervened to point out the question of privilege. I could not have said that a particular statement constituted a slander. What I did say was that if a statement were made outside against any particular person that the person would have a legal remedy, whereas, when made in the Dáil the aggrieved person is deprived of a remedy.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: There is one aspect of that that I thought of raising to-day, it is this, that the question of privilege extends over such matters and that question of privilege has been assumed in every country for some public purpose. It may be the duty of a Deputy to make a statement which if he made outside would subject him to legal procedure under the well-known tag "The greater the truth the greater the libel," but which, if true should be made here. There must be some place where a public statement could be made covered by protection, if that statement be in the interests of the public. I believe it is the custom that when a statement is made it is not anybody in the Dáil who challenges the maker of the statement to repeat it outside. It is the aggrieved party, and nobody else, who does that. I think we ought not in this Dáil raise any question affecting what is a very necessary privilege even in the public interest.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I did not say anything yesterday about the matter which Deputy Davin had raised. I expressed no opinion but I merely intervened to explain a thing which arose between a Minister and a Deputy. The other question raised by Deputy Figgis is not relevant to this particular matter.

EXTENDED HOURS OF SITTING.

The PRESIDENT: I regret I have to call upon the indulgence of the Dáil to some extent for longer sittings than have been anticipated, in order to permit the discharge of the business which we found it necessary to introduce into the Dáil. I have made a personal examination of the time that has been taken to deal with the various amendments put down in connection with the Public Safety Bill. I find that we are not in a position to devote, through normal meetings, a sufficient amount of time to this Bill. It is, therefore, my unpleasant duty to ask the Dáil to sit later and longer in order to deal with this matter. It is, of course, always within the power of the Executive to apply the remedies which are provided in the Standing Orders. We have not, so far, exercised our rights in those matters, and we do not wish to exercise them; we think that the ordinary time, which Deputies think is necessary to enable them to discuss and deal with the business presented to them, ought to be allotted, but it is not in our power to make an hour any longer than it is or to make a day's sitting longer than it is, unless we extend the period of a day's meeting from 3 o'clock p.m. until after 8.30 p.m. Now, the motion, therefore, I would move is this: "That the Dáil sit after 8.30 p.m. to-night for the consideration of the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Bill, 1923, and that it adjourn not later than 4 a.m. to-morrow, Friday, the 13th inst." Before putting that I would like to know if it is possible to divide on questions after 8.30 p.m. I presume that you Sir, are the judge of that, and if it be possible to divide it is unnecessary to include in the motion any provision to suspend that Standing Order. If you decide against me on that I will include something which will enable us to take divisions after that hour.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Can a motion of this kind be taken without notice?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, there is a Standing Order, No. 10, which says: "A motion that Dáil Éireann shall sit later than 8.30 o'clock on any evening may be made without notice, and not later than 6.30 o'clock p.m. on the same evening. On Tuesdays and Thursdays this motion shall be made only by a Minister."

The President wants a ruling on Standing Order No. 9 (the old No. 10): "While Dáil Éireann is in Session, it shall meet at 3.0 o'clock p.m. punctually on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, Thursdays and Fridays of each week, unless the Dáil shall otherwise order. At 8.30 o'clock p.m. the Ceann Comhairle shall take the Order of the Day for the adjournment of the Dáil, whereupon any Teachta may bring forward any matter for discussion of [An Ceann Comhairle.] which he has previously given notice, not later than 6.30 o'clock p.m. In the event of such discussion taking place the Dáil shall adjourn not later than 9 o'clock, p.m., but the Dáil shall not divide on any question after 8.30 o'clock p.m." The last paragraph which I have read seems to me to have special reference to a case where notice is given and a matter is raised on the adjournment. If under the Standing Orders we have power to decide that we shall sit later than 8.30 I take it, if such a motion were carried, we would be sitting later than 8.30 for the transaction of business. The transaction of business seems to me to involve the making of decisions, and if necessary the taking of divisions. If a motion to sit later than 8.30 were decided in the affirmative the business could go on in the ordinary way.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I second the motion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion is that the Dáil sit after 8.30 to-night for the consideration of the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Bill, 1923, and that it adjourn not later than 4 a.m. to-morrow, Friday, the 13th instant.

Mr. JOHNSON: One hears with interest, if not with pleasure, the statement of the Minister in making this motion. One might have been better satisfied if one had heard from the Minister an expression of regret that the business of the Dáil for the past three months has been so conducted as to make it necessary to have recourse to a motion of this kind. We have had meetings for one or two days and then adjournments for several days. We have had proposals to meet for three or four days, and then a suggestion that we should adjourn for a week or ten days because there was no business ready. Then we have the Minister coming along and saying "Here is a Bill which requires discussion, and there are other Bills on the stocks which require discussion of an equally serious character, and there are so many Bills of that kind on the stocks which require to be discussed, considered and amended before the expiry of the Parliament, that we can only get the business done by having all-night sittings." That is not a testimony to the way the Minister has directed the business of the Dáil. There is implied in this motion a suggestion that there is too much consideration being given to this present Bill.

MINISTERS: No.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am glad to hear the disavowal. It has been implied by others who sit behind the Ministers.

Mr. BLYTHE: No.

Mr. JOHNSON: The fact is then that close consideration is required of the Bill, and that it cannot be done within the ordinary time allotted. I am not going to grumble at any demand upon the Dáil for time to consider fully every Bill that is put forward. I suggest, however, that it is not good for the Dáil or for the members that we should be asked to come here these days, sit from 3 o'clock in the afternoon until 4 o'clock next morning, and give proper consideration to important matters of legislation. I think the Dáil will agree, with the heat of the day such as we have had it in this building, members cannot—they show that by their absence—give proper consideration to those measures. I think it would be in the interests of the measure and of the Dáil if we accepted the suggestion of the Minister with regard to the night sitting, and adjourned until 7 o'clock or 8 o'clock from now and sit in the cool of the evening, and consider those matters under better atmospheric conditions. I am sure that that proposal will meet with the unexpressed assent of members. I am sure members will much prefer to meet here at, say, 7 or 8 o'clock p.m., and continue the discussion and consideration of the measure in the cool of the evening rather than sit from now onward for twelve hours and 25 minutes. It is not possible for those who take a serious view of their duties to sit here the whole time, and it is not possible for those who take a serious view of their duties to spend hours nominally in attendance, but not hearing the discussion, and I want, if possible, to avoid any reasonable excuse for that kind of conduct on the part of Deputies. I hope the suggestion will be received as it is made, and I, therefore, beg to move, as an amendment, that the Dáil do now adjourn and resume its sitting say, at 7.30 p.m., and continue to sit from that time until the hour named in the Minister's motion.

Mr. LYONS: I formally second the amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Standing Order under which the motion is moved clearly contemplates an extension of the hours of sitting. It contemplates sitting until 8.30 p.m., and by motion made before 6.30 p.m., ordering that the Dáil may continue to sit. The amendment is an amendment to adjourn, and I think is not relevant to the motion. The motion could be amended by reducing the time during which we shall sit, but I do not think it could be amended by our adjourning, which is a different method of increasing the time available.

Mr. O'BRIEN: It is felt by some of our members that 4 o'clock would be a rather awkward time to disperse and that it might be well to extend it to 8 o'clock a.m. Perhaps the Minister would accept that?

The PRESIDENT: I am very glad to hear from the Deputy of the innocence of the Deputies for whom he speaks. I have been occasionally out at 4 a.m., and I do not think it would do the Deputy's friends any harm just to see the morning break at that hour.

Mr. NAGLE: The objection to 4 o'clock does not apply to me personally, but it does to those who are not living in Dublin, in whose case it would mean walking around the streets for about three hours, until a train would be running to Dun Laoghaire or Bray.

The PRESIDENT: I will try to provide accommodation for them when they are going, if that would meet the Deputy.

Mr. NAGLE: I do not think it would be very much use going to bed for two hours, getting up for a journey and finishing the sleep elsewhere.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I move, as an amendment:—"That 8 a.m. be substituted for 4 a.m."

Mr. MORRISSEY: I second that.

The PRESIDENT: I accept that.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amendment is to substitute for the words "4 a.m.," "8 a.m.," so that the motion would then read, "That the Dáil sit after 8.30 p.m. to-night, for the consideration of the Public Safety (Emergency Powers)

Bill, 1923, and that it adjourn not later than 8 a.m. to-morrow (Friday), the 13th inst."

The PRESIDENT: I am very glad to be able to meet the Deputy on that.

Amendment agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion, as amended, is now before the Dáil.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: There is something to recommend the motion, and if the motion is carried I hope that the Ministry will make such provisions for the conduct of business that the more serious part of the business will be taken from 9 or 10 o'clock at night until the earlier hours. It is, I think, obvious to everybody who is taking part in the business that it is very trying. Many of us have been remarking, within the last three or four days, that Ministers themselves must be feeling the strain very much, much more than the ordinary Deputies, and if the Minister's motion is intended to give plenty of time for the discussion of the serious Bills that are to come before the Dáil I think that nobody could have a reasonable objection. There was some talk the other day to the effect that the Dáil was rather a churning machine for churning out Bills. It looked to some extent very like that. The churn, if we are to take the Minister's word for it, does not seem to have been working very effectively, because it has not been churning them out quickly enough. There would be an opportunity for churning them out much more quickly and giving much more time to their consideration under this proposed arrangement. That, I think, is of very great importance. I do not know whether I would be in order in referring to another House in this connection, but some of us have rather an admiration for the ease and facility with which another House can dispose of several weeks' work in about twenty minutes. We have not yet, with all our experience of eight or nine months' legislation, acquired that particular facility, but I have no doubt that, if in the early parts of our day's debate we are meeting in a more or less heated atmosphere, as we go into the cooler atmosphere of the night we will be able to legislate in a manner becoming to the Dáil and to the whole nation. It is important, I think, that we should [Cathal O'Shannon.] legislate in that manner. I hope for the sake of the Dáil and the credit of the nation that we shall have rather more active and actual interest taken in the measures before the Dáil by those Deputies who take very little interest apparently except only when it comes to a division and to vote. I for one hope to see to-night that the benches will be not only full from eight o'clock on, but that the cooler atmosphere, not to talk about other things, will enable those Deputies to speak and take a real interest in improving not only the machinery of legislation, but the legislation itself.

Mr. MILROY: I would like before the motion is put to know is it the intention of the Government to sit also to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

The PRESIDENT: Yes, from 12 o'clock to 4.

Mr. MILROY: In that event I do not know whether human nature can stand the strain. If we have to sit now until 8 o'clock in the morning, and resume after four hours that is not conducive to serious discussion.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: You will get the serious discussion all right.

Mr. MILROY: I have a good deal of sympathy with Deputy Johnson's suggestion that we should adjourn until later on this evening and then sit until a late hour to-morrow morning.

Mr. WHELEHAN: I have been very much impressed in finding that Deputy O'Brien has approved of the principle that we should work for seventeen hours per day, and I am also interested in finding that those who support him so whole-heartedly support that proposition.

Mr. LYONS: I am sure the reason of the President in extending the hours is simply to try and get the Public Safety Bill through before morning. I presume there must be a very large number of offenders throughout the country waiting for this Bill to be passed so as to be put inside and kept in safe places at the expense of the ratepayers. So far as I am concerned, I am quite prepared to act in continuous sittings for any length provided that the Minister for Home Affairs, and other Ministers, do not make such long speeches against amendments to the Bill. If there is any delay in passing those Bills the Minister who puts them forward must accept all responsibility for the delay. I can assure the Dáil that I will not let the Minister for Agriculture get away, for he made very long speeches to the amendments on the Land Bill last week. In fact I was of the opinion that those Bills were only brought forward to flabbergast the people of the Saorstát. Those Bills were brought forward with no serious idea that they would go through until after the next election.

Coming back to the subject of sitting here all night, and adopting the same policy as another country across the Atlantic—I really find it very hard to say the sister nation—I cannot do it. If we are going to adopt this policy, I sincerely hope that the President, who is also Minister for Finance, will not forget that the messengers, attendants, and all the people who are employed by him to act in the Dáil, will get double pay for overtime. All overtime starts from the time the day's work finishes, and it is not their fault if the Minister puts forward the idea of sitting all night, and if these attendants, messengers, and others are paid this overtime it will be at the expense of the Minister, and I hope not at the expense of the State. Furthermore, I think Deputy Johnson's amendment is a very reasonable one. He has taken into account the terrible wave of heat that is passing over the country at the present time.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy Johnson's amendment is out of order.

Mr. LYONS: Well, Deputy O'Brien's amendment. Deputy O'Brien, being a sensible Teachta, has taken into account the long hours for the employees. Deputy O'Brien recognises as well as I do that the benches opposite were practically empty during the sittings for the past few weeks, and that after a discussion, when the button was pressed, Deputies just came in to say "Tá" or "Níl" on the division. If this night sitting takes place I hope every Deputy will be in his place, and I can assure the Minister for Home Affairs that, as far as the Labour benches are concerned, we will give him speeches enough on the amendments to this Bill.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: It is now 4 o'clock, and if the Atlantic has got shifted from the West to the East of Ireland by 4 o'clock in the afternoon, where would it get by 4 o'clock in the morning?

The PRESIDENT: I think it is due to Deputy Johnson and to other Deputies that I should admit what he said about the indulgence of the Dáil with regard to the business put before them for the last six or nine months. There has been serious cause of complaint. I have explained more than once that that was owing to the circumstances of the time and to the fact that although it took some time to prepare certain measures and produce them in the Dáil, no undue delay took place. We gave them very careful consideration before we brought them forward, and I can certainly answer for the Ministry that, so far as I know, it has not neglected any opportunity of bringing business forward at the earliest possible moment. There is, of course, cause for dissatisfaction, but I should say that we were not concerned entirely with legislation that came before the Dáil. There were many other matters, and for some time there will be other matters, engaging the attention of the Ministry. I admit that we have had to draw a good deal on the indulgence of the Dáil, and I would like to pay a tribute to the members of all parties for the consideration they gave the Ministry in connection with the discharge of its duty.

Mr. JOHNSON: On this motion I would like to say that, except from the point of view of the personal convenience of Deputies sitting in the heat of the day, no case has been made for the extension of time beyond the ordinary. I understand that the Seanad has adjourned for a fortnight. Except for the Corrupt Practices Bill, I do not think there is any Bill before the Dáil at the moment awaiting consideration. I submit that no case has yet been made, except the one for the personal convenience of Deputies, for insisting on a twelve hours' sitting. This is Thursday evening. Only last week we decided to change the period of the sitting on Friday to allow Deputies to go home. It would have been a very much more reasonable proposition to extend the hours of Friday's sitting rather than to cut off a Friday's sitting one week and then go on with all-night sittings next week. As I say, there are two measures before the Dáil of importance, and when these are passed the Seanad will have nothing to do for several days. The Seanad will not sit for a fortnight, but when the Seanad gets these Bills I do not know how long they may take over them. They may take a considerably longer period than the Dáil would take—very likely will, I think. I am sorry that the Minister has not been able to make a better case for a continuous Session to-day than he has done. I hope that will be remembered on the next motion.

Motion put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 42; Níl, 15.

Tá.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Uáitéar Mac Cumhaill.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mag Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Sir Seamus Craig, Ridiro, M.D.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mag Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.

Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dólaín.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Próinsias Mag Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchaitha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seamus de Burea.

Nil.

Donchadh Ó Guaire.
 Tomás de Nógla.
 Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
 Liam de Róiste.
 Tomás Mac Eoin.
 Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
 Liam Ó Briain.
 Tomás Ó Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
 Séamus Eabhróid.
 Liam Ó Daimhín.
 Seán Ó Laidhín.
 Cathal Ó Seanáin.
 Domhnall Ó Nuirghoasa.
 Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Motion declared carried.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS MOVED.

Mr. JOHNSON: I ask permission to move the suspension of Standing Order No. 10, so as to allow the Dáil to adjourn until 8 o'clock, so that the discussion of the measure before the Dáil, which is on the agenda, might be conducted in conditions that the measure itself deserves. I think that is the orderly way to proceed, and I want to give my reasons for asking why this course should be adopted.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy has asked leave to move the Adjournment of the Dáil until 8 o'clock. Standing Order No. 11 reads:—"A motion that Dáil Éireann do adjourn for a period, not exceeding two hours, may, at any time, be made by permission of the Ceann Comhairle and without notice."

That Standing Order prescribes that the period shall not exceed two hours. The other Standing Order which deals with the suspension of the Standing Orders is quite different. It reads:—

"In case of urgent necessity of which Ceann Comhairle shall be the judge, any Standing Order, or Orders, of Dáil Éireann may be suspended for the day's sitting on motion duly made and seconded, with or without notice, provided that such motion has the support of a majority of Teachti of Dáil Éireann who are qualified to vote."

Mr. JOHNSON: My desire was to move the suspension of the Standing Orders, thinking that that was probably the most orderly procedure.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That would have to be a case of urgent necessity.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the case is urgent.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think in view of the decision we have just reached it could not possibly be maintained that the necessity is urgent.

Mr. JOHNSON: Owing to that ruling I ask permission to move that the business be suspended for two hours to allow of the special heat of the day to pass before we are asked to undertake the business on the Agenda. I do not think the weather is any cooler now than it was yesterday, and it is within the recollection of the Dáil that the great majority of the Deputies were not able to sit in this building because of the heat. For many minutes or hours of the day there were very few members here, and many times it would have been quite competent, if we had not been in committee, to call for a Count because there were not twenty members in the House. I can only attribute their absence to the discomfort arising from the heat, and I am sure members are as anxious to discuss this measure with all the earnestness and consideration they think it deserves, and that though the flesh is weak the spirit is willing. We have a right to assume that; it is only fair to the Dáil to assume that. To do otherwise would be assuming that Deputies were treating the Dáil with disdain and in fact were doing what you yourself, Chinn Chomhairle, ruled upon yesterday, treating the Dáil with derision.

It is the duty of members to be present when urgent important matters of legislation are under discussion. If the atmospheric conditions are such that members find, notwithstanding their desire to be present, and to fulfil their duty to their constituents, notwithstanding the anxiety they have for the interests of their constituents when matters of this kind affecting dozens of them is under consideration, and their earnest desire to look after those interests, they are not able to attend because of the condition of the atmosphere of the House, I submit it would be in the general interest that we should adjourn until 6.15, to let the torrid heat pass, and to allow members to get a breath of fresh air, and, perhaps, to provide themselves with the nutriment necessary to carry on their work

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Standing Order No. 11 reads: "A motion that Dáil Eireann do adjourn for a period not exceeding two hours may at any time be made by permission of the Ceann Comhairle and without notice." The motion which has just been carried was a motion to continue after 8.30 to-night, presumably because necessary business would not be transacted by 8.30, and to move to adjourn for 2 hours now seems to me to be a negative of the motion just carried. Unless a reason, better than the atmospheric conditions can be adduced, I do not think permission can be given for a motion to adjourn for two hours now, in view of the motion which has just been carried.

Mr. JOHNSON: I just wish to draw attention to this fact that the suggestion made on the original motion was, I think, favourably received, and it was only because of the fact that it did not conform to the Rules of Order that it was not generally accepted. I think Deputy Milroy was speaking the views of the members on the opposite side, and only for the fact that the suggestion was not in accordance with the Rules of Order, I am sure the Minister in charge of the original motion would have accepted it. On that ground alone I think the Dáil might be asked to agree to this motion.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: When an amendment was offered to the motion that has just been carried, I ruled it out for certain reasons, and the reasons must have made it clear to Deputies before they voted on the motion that the motion was one to sit until 8.30 and to continue longer than 8.30. I, therefore, could not give permission now for a motion to adjourn for two hours for the reasons stated. I allowed Deputy Johnson to state his reasons so that I might be able to see what was precisely in his mind in order to rule on the question.

[DAIL IN COMMITTEE.]

PUBLIC SAFETY (EMERGENCY POWERS) BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I move Amendment No. 18, to insert before Section 4 a new Section as follows:—"It shall not be lawful to detain in custody without trial any person who shall have three or more children under the age of sixteen years wholly or mainly dependent on him."

I think it will be generally agreed that some amendment of this kind is necessary from ordinary motives of humanity. I have had occasion recently, for another purpose, to make some enquiry as to the prevalence of distress in Dublin, and I must say that I have been amazed at the number of cases of large families whose bread-winner is in prison here in this city of Dublin, cases where a man interned leaves three young children, or five, six or even seven practically unprovided for. I do not like to cite actual figures, because I have not got them absolutely accurate, but the Dáil may take it as a fact that there are a large number of such families in this city. In a case like that there are frequently three young children, and the mother is not able to work; she has to look after the children, and very often the eldest child is not old enough to be earning. The consequence has been that there have been cases of acute distress. I ask the Dáil to observe that the motion is confined to cases of persons imprisoned under suspicion.

I quite recognise that if you are dealing with a criminal against whom you can bring a charge, that man should be proceeded against irrespectively of the number of his dependents, but I think it will be agreed that it is fair when you are passing a law to intern people on suspicion that cases where other persons wholly innocent will be seriously injured or will be liable to be seriously injured by your acting on suspicion against their fathers are cases which should be specially provided for. It seems to me where a man answers the general call from those whom he looks to as his leaders to go out in such a rebellion as we have seen, and where that man in so doing knows that he is risking great hardships for his children it is a great proof of his loyalty and sincerity. I do not think that the State need be apprehensive of such sporadic acts by such a man as that as would be a danger to it. In view of the fact that there are many such men with large families, a fact which I can absolutely vouch for, and that there has been great distress in consequence of their internment, I very earnestly press this amendment. I may say this further fact makes some such amendment all the more necessary, namely, that the Ministry or its agent have thought it necessary to annex very considerable sums of money collected for prisoners' dependents. Those sums have been held for a considerable time on the ground, apparently, that they might be used for some other purpose than the relief of prisoners' dependents, and on the suspicion that they might be so used. I do not know if any such sums have been returned, but, at all events, the fact of the withholding of such large sums has made it very difficult to deal with persons in the category with which this amendment deals. There has been very great distress, but there will be more distress if people who have a large number of dependents are allowed by the Dáil to be interned on mere suspicion.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS

(Mr. O'Higgins): I regret I cannot accept the amendment, nor can I accept the principle that the person with three or more children is entitled to exemption under an Act of this kind. I assume that many persons with three or more children have taken part in the armed revolt against the State within the last year, and I cannot undertake if the opinion is held, and held strongly, that the release of such person would be a danger to the public safety, such persons will be released. The amendment would involve that. Neither can I accept the principle that if a man with three or more children is reasonably suspected of the offences mentioned in Part II. of the Schedule he must go free in the critical conditions of things in the country. It is for those who have called him out and who have applauded from behind in the campaign of the last twelve months to advert to the sacrifices and the hardships that they are plunging people in, both the individuals themselves and their children, and the responsibility lies on them. I think it will be obvious to Deputies that an amendment of that kind, drawing distinction between citizens on the purely accidental circumstance of the numbers of their families, would be impossible of acceptance. I do not propose to stress the matter any further.

Mr. LYONS: I am surprised to hear the Minister for Home Affairs rejecting this amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I was wondering whether Deputy Lyons was not a rather biassed person to speak on this amendment?

Mr. O'CONNELL: He has only ten.

Mr. LYONS: I am going to press the acceptance of the amendment on the Minister for Home Affairs, who has charge of this Bill, and in whose power it is to accept amendments such as this in order to improve the Bill, so that the people of the Saorstát may gain some benefits from it, instead of the Bill, as it at present stands, leading the Saorstát into complete bankruptcy of the worst type. The new Section suggested is a very reasonable one. I wonder does the Minister fully realise the number of men who are at present interned and who have more than three—some of them eight—children under sixteen years of age. What preparations, if any, has the Minister made in connection with the dependents of prisoners who may be taken on pure suspicion and detained without being charged or tried for a week? What is to happen the dependents of those persons? What is to happen the little children during the time their breadwinner is in prison under a false charge? The Minister says he cannot accept the amendment, but he offers no help or no way out for the children of the man who is imprisoned on his signature. The Minister may put his signature to a particular letter simply because some of his captains or somebody in the Saorstát may get in touch with him and tell him that such a person is a dangerous character to have at large. There is no proof that the man is a dangerous character. What the Minister says is, "If you say this man is a dangerous character, it must be so; the man must be dangerous and he must be taken and interned; his children must starve and we will have to make an example of this particular man although he has a family. We must teach the children, and when they are reared they will have the same respect for the Saorstát as we, in our time, had for the English." That is what you will do. Instead of giving the parents an opportunity of rearing the children and educating them so that they may be in a position to assist in the progress and general welfare of the country, you will be working in the contrary direction. You will be so doing if you do not accept the amendment. I am surprised the mover of the amendment did not specify any man who is married and who, if not a father, might be a prospective father. It is a shame and a crime against humanity to arrest and intern without trial or uncharged the father of a helpless family. By doing so you are really allowing children to starve. What will their mothers become? The women whose husband is arrested and interned knows perfectly well that the breadwinner is absolutely innocent, as innocent as the falling dew from heaven. That is the only comparison I can find at the moment; I can find no comparison in any living person, and therefore I must compare it with the dew falling from the heavens, for the dew cannot commit sin. Now I do not stand up here simply to try to prolong the time, as I can see that thought passing in the mind of the Minister for Home Affairs. I can see that he believes that I am standing up here supporting this amendment in order to prevent this Bill passing through before 8 o'clock in the morning. My intention is nothing of the kind. I am supporting it because, to my mind, this amendment is just and honest and perfect. If you want to make citizens have respect for the Saorstát, then you must treat them as citizens. Do not make the young child that is toddling along to school an enemy of the Saorstát. If you reject that amendment, believe me, you cause that child suffering. If you cause that child to go to bed without its supper or to school without its breakfast, if you cause its mother to be penniless, and if you cause her to go with her hand out looking for alms, as she would have no other way of living if her husband is cast into prison by the representatives of the majority of her own people, they are wrong tactics. It is the wrong way to get people to support you. Give the children an opportunity of being educated and brought up as they ought to be. I ask you to accept this amendment, and so prove that there is one soft spot in the heart of the Minister for Home Affairs, a heart which the people say is something like flint. I ask you to accept that amendment. You might possibly think that it is owing to the motion being put forward asking the Dáil to adjourn and because we were defeated that we are standing up here. I can assure the Dáil it is nothing of the kind.

The Minister for Home Affairs knows as well as I do that he has succeeded in getting the majority of this Dáil to pass every Bill he puts forward. He knows in his heart of hearts, if he has such a thing as a heart, that this amendment is one of the most necessary amendments put forward by any Deputy. I know the Minister for Home Affairs has a heart, and that is why, more or less, I am not going contrary to him. I am making what I would call a fatherly appeal. By accepting this amendment I am sure that the Minister for Home Affairs will improve the Bill. I am sure he will change his mind, and that he will prove that he has a heart. Before this amendment is put to the Dáil I hope that every Deputy who answered his name here to-day will be able to stand up and deliver at least a half an hour's speech on it. If we do we may be able to get the views of the Dáil whether they are against having the fathers of families cast into prison and allowed to remain there until some humbug of a charge shall be made against them. I know myself of three or four particular cases where men have been arrested. I know one man from Edgeworthstown in Longford. I know a man out of the town of Longford and another man from Castletown in County Westmeath. These men are fathers of families. Worse than all, I know some men who are at the present moment without any charge having been made against them. These men were ex-service men. They had a pension from the British Government. As soon as these men were arrested and interned the pensions ceased, and their wives are dependent solely upon the generosity of the locality where they live. What will apply under this particular Section 4 if some such amendment is not accepted? Are you going to have the same thing apply here as applied for the past hundreds of years? They say of a man, "We have knocked all we can out of him, he is no earthly use to the Saorstát; there is a possibility, as somebody has told us, that he is thinking of doing something against the Saorstát, and I am going to arrest him now and allow his children to starve." You punish the innocent for the sake of the guilty. That is the idea the Deputy had in mind when he put forward this amendment. It is put forward to save these little innocent children that we are looking to for the future of the Saorstát, to build it up and to prove that we are a credit, even though the present generation has been such a disgrace. The Dáil should accept this amendment. Let the Deputies say, "We will not allow the fathers of innocent children to be imprisoned. If a man is an innocent man we will not allow his children to starve. We will not allow their mothers to become solely dependent upon the generosity of their neighbours." The idea of this amendment is to save that. I ask the Dáil to accept it. This is an honest amendment. If the Minister does not accept it it will be the worse for the Bill. I hope he will accept it, and if he does I can assure him he will have a more easy passage for the Bill. If he rejects it I can guarantee him having a very rough passage for it.

[Mr. Lyons.]

Mr. JOHNSON: The motion of Deputy Gavan Duffy in moving this amendment has been treated with a certain amount of levity by the Deputies, and not unnaturally, because of the dramatic way in which Deputy Lyons has emphasised the arguments he puts forward. He is entitled to speak in a matter of this kind. Apart from the fitness of the amendment, in the place where it is intended to be put, I want to ask the Dáil to consider whether some such provision should not be included in the Bill. It asks that there should be some discrimination, and that a person having three or more children dependent upon him under the age of 16 years shall not be imprisoned without trial. I think Deputy Gavan Duffy argued fairly when he said that the very sense of responsibility for children must be somewhat of a deterrent against the commission of acts which might bring a citizen under the provisions of the Bill, and that the very fact that such a citizen has responsibility to children ought to be security against the risk that he is going to be detained for a possible 6 months without trial. After all it is not the desire of the Dáil to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children and surely it is not, at least I hope it is not, the desire of the Dáil to visit upon the children the punishment which is an almost certain consequence of the arrest on suspicion of the father. Deputy Gavan Duffy has cited cases of families whose breadwinners have been in prison for some months and who are in actual physical want. On another occasion when a matter of this kind was mentioned it was said that there had been money provided and that the families of prisoners, the dependants of prisoners, had as a matter of fact been cared for. I happen to know one case, at any rate, where the family of a prisoner has not in fact been provided for, for the simple reason that the family had no connection whatever with any organisation which pretended or professed to take under its charge such prisoners. It is for the consideration of the children of people for whom there is no provision that I ask the Dáil to consider the merits of this amendment. It is no fanciful story or prophecy that Deputy Lyons has put forward for consideration when he says that the children of internees will grow up with a spirit of anger against the State which enforced upon them, on the mere suspicion of a captain of the Army, hunger, perhaps cold, perhaps shortage in many ways and upon their mother actual suffering, physical and mental. The Minister has told us, and it is no doubt his intention, that this Bill is designed to meet the transition period. That being the case, I would urge that there can be no great risk in providing an assurance that the heads of families are going to be immune from arrest and imprisonment without trial. The Minister has minimised the risks of persons being arrested and detained on suspicion, saying that such suspicion will have to be very well grounded before these imprisonments will continue. You are under this amendment asked to provide that the children will be protected against the risk that their father or their mother, who may be the breadwinner, shall be detained for a period of six months merely on suspicion. I personally am not satisfied that the best way to arrive at that end is by this means. I am not sure that the form of the motion or the place in the Bill is the most fitting, but I am sure Deputy Gavan Duffy is not considering the verbal form of this amendment so long as he can get a positive assurance that the children of citizens are not going to be allowed to suffer, and that the parents are not going to be imprisoned on suspicion and their children allowed to suffer. I think it is to his credit, and I hope the Dáil will participate in that credit, that he should have regard to the children of possible suspects, and try to make provision in the Bill for safeguarding their interests. I would ask the Dáil to vote in favour of the insertion of this new section.

Mr. O'DONNELL: It is all right to adopt a humanitarian attitude, and it certainly is very popular on all occasions. This amendment is with regard to the imprisonment on suspicion of parents who are heads of families. I know an occasion where the head of a family happened to be in the National Army. He came home on leave for a few days. He was the father of ten. The mother came out of the infirmary a week or two previously. There had been twins four months previously. A certain party came to his house, nine or ten men, at two o'clock in the morning, and gave him a trial. They took him out from the bed where one of the twins, four months old, was sleeping, and shot him after three hours of a trial and something more than a trial. If he had been shot decently it would have been all right.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would it?

Mr. O'DONNELL: Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order I am sure that the Deputy would not desire it to go down in the records that it was all right if he had been shot by these persons decently.

Mr. O'DONNELL: It would have been better; but he was not shot decently. Supposing there was another head of a family under suspicion for this offence. Has the Opposition on any occasion advocated that those persons should be brought to justice, or that those who bring them to justice should be facilitated? Have we always to adopt this humanitarian attitude? I want to ask have those who wish to bring culprits to justice been facilitated by the parties who are now humanitarians?

CATHAL O'SHANNON: If the Deputy suggests that those of us whom he refers to as the Opposition in any way approve of the act or similar acts to that which he mentioned, he is making an implication that is not only undeserved, but one which we resent. So far as our judgment goes, we have not done anything that would prevent the proper authorities from taking proper action in such cases as that. What we did object to were certain things which we thought improper.

MINISTER for EDUCATION (Prof. MacNeill): Is this discussion in order?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Deputy O'Donnell speaks so seldom that I heard him patiently to the end. When he had told his story he spoke two sentences that were relevant to the amendment. Then he went away from the amendment to make a statement that I was not quite sure about, and which Deputy O'Shannon has refuted. I think it is hardly necessary to refute those statements. I do not think that Deputy O'Donnell had in his mind that Deputy O'Shannon or anyone associated with him would not do his best to trace up crimes of that sort.

Mr. JOHNSON: Deputy O'Donnell's assertion is one of a series of similar statements charging us with condoning crime, and I resent it. The Minister for Education did not call Deputy O'Donnell to order.

Professor MacNEILL: I have asked if the discussion was in order. If Deputy O'Donnell went out of order, and if Deputy Johnson was of opinion that he did, he should have called attention to it at the time. I now ask if it is in order on the amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No, the discussion is not in order, but, as I say, Deputy O'Donnell speaks so seldom that I allowed him to develop what I thought possibly might be an argument for or against the amendment. He said something at the end which Deputy O'Shannon interprets that Deputy O'Shannon and all associated with him would not assist in tracing people committing a crime such as Deputy O'Donnell describes. Surely Deputy O'Donnell does not mean that?

Mr. O'DONNELL: No. What I mean is that all parties who come to this Dáil and have any respect for the dignity of this Dáil should always facilitate the parties in every legitimate way who are out to trace up crimes of all kinds.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is an excellent statement, with which we all agree, but which has no relevance at all to the amendment. Deputy O'Shannon can now continue on the amendment.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Deputy O'Donnell says that it is all right to talk humanitarianism, and I suppose there is a limit to humanitarianism. There is, undoubtedly, at the same time if there is a limit to it, that is not any particular reason, in my view, why when we can be humane and show a certain amount of humanity we should not show it. I did not suggest, in supporting the amendment, that we should let humanitarianism run mad, because if we did we would not be able to take measures for the protection of life or the preservation of the State or anything else. There are degrees in all those things that have got to be considered, but his argument does not go as far as he thinks it does. The fact that the Deputy asks that certain things be done which are mentioned in his amendment does not mean, unless I am misjudging his words altogether, that everything is to be allowed, provided that the head of the family is the person concerned and that he has dependent on him three or more children under the age of sixteen. I do suggest that in a case like that there is a reason for a very much greater care in examination than there is in a case where one has not so many dependent on him. Even during the period of the war with the British here I think there was a certain amount of consideration given to that. While everybody agreed that when a man's duty directed him to take a certain line, it was his duty to take that line, while giving full consideration to his responsibilities otherwise, yet in many cases care was taken to discriminate, if it were possible to ease the pain, and the penalties then were made to fit that. I do suggest that the amendment asks for very little more than would be ordinarily reasonable. I do not think that it asks for more than can reasonably be considered just, at all.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 14; Níl, 40.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghlaidh.
Liam de Róiste.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seánus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Dainhín.
Seán Ó Leidhín.
Cathal Ó Seomáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghéasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Gearóid Ó Súilcabháin.
Uáitéar Mac Cumhaill.
Seán Ó Maolnuadh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Seánus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghaigh.
Doasmhunnain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Durain.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolcaththa.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Earnán Altún.
Sir Seánus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.

Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seoirse Mac Niocail.
Piaras Béaslaí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seánus Ó Cruimhlaoidh.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Seánus Ó Dóláin.
Próinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seánus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaid.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Seánus de Burca.

Amendment declared lost.

Amendment (19) by Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: In Sub-section (1) to insert after the word "experience," the words "and of whom the two others shall be persons well known and distinguished for their integrity, their sense of justice and their impartial judgment."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment No. 19 is not in order on the ground of vagueness. It is altogether too vague to be inserted in an Act of Parliament.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: It is a minor amendment in itself. The purpose of it is to draw attention to the need for some definition. Perhaps its definition is vague. May I amend this by having words put in now or at the next stage?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No. I told the Deputy several days ago that this amendment was too vague, and I have not received any further word from him since.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I will bear in mind the class of person whom the Deputy thinks ought to be appointed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It would be possible on Report to improve the matter.

Amendment (20) by Messrs. O'BRIEN and NAGLE: In Sub-section (2), after the word "authorities," to insert the words "and any person serving a sentence of imprisonment or penal servitude imposed on him by a tribunal established by the military authorities."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This amendment follows 16, I think. Amendment 21 next.

Mr. JOHNSON: Do you rule 20 out of order?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 20 is the same, it appears to me, as amendment 16.

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes, but Amendment 16 referred to a person being detained until an Appeal Council, upon a review of his case, reduced or remitted his sentence. Amendment No. 20 says: "any person detained may in the prescribed manner request that an enquiry into the matter of his detention be made by an Appeal Council." One is the case of the application; the other provides for the continuance of the sentence.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 16 provided for the review by an Appeal Council of sentences imposed by the Military Authorities. That was rejected. Amendment 20 provides an appeal for the same persons to an Appeal Council.

Mr. JOHNSON: With all respect, Sub-section (3) of Section 3 dealt with the continuation of the sentences until the decision. The amendment proposed that such a decision should come to an end when the tribunal decided to remit sentences. That was rejected but provision was promised for insertion at the next Stage that the sentences should not extend longer than the Act extended.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Was that assurance given?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: No. I think the Deputy is making a mistake. The assurance given was that words would be added to the Section to provide that persons serving sentences—

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg the Minister's pardon; I misread my note. The promise was that so long as it is not expired it will be something of this nature: "until such time as such sentence is reviewed by a competent tribunal." The amendment dealt with the period of a sentence. This amendment proposes to give power to the prisoners to appeal.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: "To an Appeal Council established under this Act."

Mr. JOHNSON: Exactly, and I submit that that is not consequent in any way on amendment No. 16.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question of a tribunal to be set up subsequently is not the same as the question of an Appeal Council to be set up under this Act. Amendment 16 said that "Every person who at the date of the passing of this Act is serving a sentence of imprisonment or penal servitude imposed on him by a tribunal established by the Military Authorities shall, whether he is or is not a person ordinarily subject to military law, continue to serve such sentence so long as it is unexpired, or until an Appeal Council, upon review of his case in manner provided by this Act, reduces or remits the sentence imposed by the tribunal." The question debated on that was whether or not a sentenced prisoner should have an Appeal Council established under this Act. Is that correct?

[An Ceann Comhairle.]

Mr. JOHNSON: I think that is not correct. I think the question was whether the sentence should continue until it has expired, which may be six months after the passing of the Act. The contention was made that it was indefinite, and the amendment had to do with the indefinite nature of the sentence. That amendment was lost, but there was a promise given that a tribunal would be set up which would review it, but now we are coming to an entirely different proposition. Sub-section 2 says:—"Any person detained in custody under this Act, whether made under an order of an Executive Minister or by the military authorities." And we desire to insert "and any person serving a sentence of imprisonment or penal servitude imposed on him by a tribunal established by the military authorities may request an inquiry into the matter of his detention be made by the Appeal Council." I submit that is an entirely different question from the one respecting the continuation of the sentence until expiry of that sentence.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The discussion that took place on Amendment 16 made it clear that the acceptance of the amendment would involve a complete change in the character of the tribunal which it is proposed to establish under this Act. There are, as I pointed out, Advisory Departmental Committees, and they are in no sense Courts, still less Courts of Appeal, and, in my opinion, to proceed with the discussion of Amendment No. 20 would be covering precisely the same ground as was covered in the discussion on Amendment No. 16, and to vote on it would be to vote on precisely the same issue.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is a further point. Whatever discussion has been, I do not for a moment admit it was out of order; if it had been we should have been called to order. The issue is whether the amendment now before us is in order, not whether the discussion would be the same discussion. It is whether the amendment to be discussed is in order, and I submit that it is perfectly in order, notwithstanding what the Minister says about the Appeal Council, for the Council has not yet been set up. It is being set up by the clause we are discussing, and it may be altered radically before the Dáil passes from this section.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The statement the Minister has just made rather backs the case made by Deputy Johnson, for if one kind of Council were contemplated in Amendment No. 16, and later the Minister gave a definition which would not correspond to the kind of Council contemplated in Amendment No. 16, I submit that this amendment is quite in order, because it is an amendment of a particular kind of Council which has now been defined by the Minister.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I made no suggestion that the discussion of Amendment No. 16 was out of order. The question decided by the vote on Amendment 16 was that certain persons shall not have sentences upon them reviewed by an Appeal Council in manner provided by this Act. If we discussed this amendment we would be asked to take the very same decision, and the amendment, therefore, cannot be discussed, because we cannot discuss and decide the same thing twice on Committee, but if it transpires on a further stage that the Appeal Council is substantially altered, and if any amendment is put up, then the amendment would be decided, and the question of the order of the amendment for the next stage will be decided upon, having consideration to all the relevant facts.

Mr. JOHNSON: With all due deference, might I point out that on Section 3 the Appeal Council had not been reached. It was a tribunal that was referred to in Section 3. The question of an Appeal Council had not been reached or touched at that time. Therefore we were not aware of it in detail.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is exactly what I have said. If it transpires that there is any necessity for again discussing this matter, which was discussed on Amendment 16, facilities will be provided for that discussion. Facilities cannot be provided now. The amendment is, consequential on the defeat of Amendment 16, out of order.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I beg to move:

To add to Sub-Section (2) the words, "It shall be lawful for the Governor, or other the person in chief control of any place of detention, to recommend for release any person or persons detained under his charge, and to bring the case of any such person or persons to the notice of an Appeal Council, who shall thereupon enquire into the same."

This amendment deals with a matter of machinery, and I am proposing it on the assumption that the Appeal Section will be very considerably modified before it goes through the Dáil. I will reserve what I want to say about the Appeal Council until the proper stage. The object of the amendment is merely this: that the person who is best qualified on behalf of the Executive to judge of the kind of people who are interned, namely the person in charge of internees, should be in a position to recommend internees for release and to bring their case before the Appeal Council. I think the Dáil will realise that that is a very reasonable suggestion. It has always seemed to me a strange thing that Prison Governors at the present time have no right, no authority, no jurisdiction to recommend prisoners for release. I do not think this amendment needs any commendation. It speaks for itself. I trust the Dáil will agree that it should be lawful for the Governor or any other person in control of a place of detention to recommend for release any person or persons detained under his charge, and to bring the case of any such person or persons to the notice of an Appeal Council, who shall thereupon enquire into the same.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE

took the Chair at this stage.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am not accepting this amendment. It is proposed to give to detained persons the right of appeal to this Council. It is not proposed to authorise any person to act as proxy for them in the matter of such appeal. It is not any part of the official duties of the Governor in such a case to make recommendations with regard to release, and it is not proposed to add that particular function to his official duties. If information is required with regard to prisoners it will be asked for from the Governors of such places, and I have no doubt that it will be given. But the amendment proposes to go further and to impose on Governors the duty of recommending persons for release and bringing their cases before the Appeal Council. The amendment contains nothing useful and nothing helpful. If a prisoner wants to appeal to the Council he can surely appeal himself. If he does not want to appeal to the Appeal Council, why is it proposed to put the duty on the Governor to appeal for him?

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I am not very enthusiastic about the amendment, because, as the Minister says, it does give a certain new function to the Governor, and I am not sure that this is a particular one that should be given. Perhaps my lack of enthusiasm for the amendment is due more to the form in which it appears than to the intention behind it. I think, for instance, that nothing should be put in the way of a Governor if he thinks fit to take steps to facilitate, either by exercising persuasion on a prisoner or otherwise, an appeal by that prisoner to the Appeal Council. The Amendment, perhaps, goes a little beyond that. I am not quite sure—I have some doubts about the wording of it—but it seems to me that it goes a little beyond that. On the main question, I think that it should be the duty of the Executive Council and of all authorities to facilitate in every possible way the exercising of the right of appeal, and, in any way which may be considered legitimate, to help the discharge of prisoners. I think that that is a general principle that is adopted at the end, or towards the end, of all periods of trouble, and I should not like the Ministry to be acting on the view that it is not their business, but that it is wholly and entirely the business of the prisoner himself, to take such steps as will help him to get out. I think that the duty of a Government is greater and more extensive than the mere negative duty of permitting a prisoner, if he so desires, to do certain things. I think it is its duty rather to help and facilitate in every way the prisoner doing this. If I can be convinced that the amendment does not give more power than I suggest to the Governor, and that the giving of more power would not mean a radical change in the functions of a Governor then I would be inclined to support the amendment. I do not know that I would do so otherwise.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Mr. WM. O'BRIEN: Would the mover of the amendment tell us whether under it it would be possible for the Governor to bring forward the case of a person to the Appeal Council although that particular person may not wish it to be brought forward? That would seem to be so from the wording of the amendment, and if so it would be very undesirable.

Amendment put and declared lost.

Mr. T. O'CONNELL: I beg to move: To insert after Sub-section (2) a new sub-section as follows:—

"At any inquiry under this section the Appeal Council shall be furnished with the reports or certificates in virtue of which the person whose case is being inquired into is being detained."

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I will accept that amendment.

Amendment put and agreed to.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: On behalf of Deputy Davin I desire to move to insert after Sub-section (2) a new sub-section as follows:—

"Not less than ten days before any inquiry under this section the person whose case is to be inquired into shall be furnished with copies of the reports or certificates in virtue of which he is being detained, and with a statement of any charges or allegations against him which it is proposed to lay before the Appeal Council in justification of his detention."

There is, and always has been, a good case on the part of the prisoner for something of this kind. Although the main objection was really to alien government, practically every one of those who were interned from 1916 onwards objected, and rightly objected, on the ground that it was an alien government, that it had no right to detain them, and also on the other ground, the insufficiency of cause shown. They objected to the summary manner in which their liberty was taken away from them for the time. Many members of this Dáil were in that position. They will remember that on the mere order of a Secretary of State they were arrested, detained and interned. In that case there was an Appeal Council, or an Advisory Council, not exactly of the same nature as this particular one, but one whose function in a broad sense was to hear appeals. Now, when internees or detained persons went before that Court, the Court had plenty of material, and the prisoner or internee had no idea in the wide world of what that material was. There was no means by which the prisoner, if he so desired—many did not take advantage of the privilege or the right at all, and others who went there denied the right of the Court—who went before the Advisory Committee could know what was against him, except that a Secretary of State, under 14B of certain Regulations, had ordered that he should be detained. Now, some of the material came out in the course of questions put by members of the Council to the prisoner. I remember the case of a certain person who was prominent in athletics, and one of the pieces of information that came out, perhaps not against him, but out of the volume of information, was that on a certain date fifteen years previously he had attended a Rugby football match at a certain place. The intention of this amendment is to give the prisoner some chance. On the one side you have the authorities well briefed, and on the other side you have the prisoner completely ignorant of what is going to be used against him, and which will undoubtedly, if the authorities consider it necessary, be brought before the Appeal Council. I think it is fair and reasonable that, before making his appeal to this Council, the prisoner should be entitled and enabled to do what the amendment asks. It is not, I think, too much to ask. As a general rule it is the practice in ordinary common law. It is common even in court-martial, where there is at least a preliminary investigation, at which the prisoner has some means of knowing what exactly the prosecution has against him. Something of that kind, to help the prisoner at the Appeal Council, is wanted—something like what the amendment proposes to give.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: In this amendment as in others we come definitely to the question of the character of these Appeal Councils, and a thing I want Deputies to keep well in mind is that these are not Courts. The whole principle of the Bill is to give to the Executive, because of an emergency situation, the power to detain persons without trial and without charge. It is a very big and a very drastic power—one that can only be justified, as I say, by an emergency situation which challenges the very existence of the State. One could, as I said yesterday, talk for hours on the soundness of the principle that a person ought to be assumed innocent until proved guilty. That is a good, sound principle. Almost every State in the world, I suppose, recognises and acts upon it. Equally every State will, in time of great stress, in time of great emergency, ask power from its Parliament to depart from it, and ask power to detain citizens on something short of legal proof; and everything short of legal proof is called suspicion, for want of a better word. It may be a moral certainty, but it is something, at any rate, which could not be supported by strict evidence before a Court. These Appeal Councils are set up to give detained persons an opportunity of showing cause why they should not be further detained, and to show cause why suspicion ought not to rest upon them with regard to particular offences. I have promised, by accepting a previous amendment, that the Appeal Councils themselves will be in possession of such reports and information as is at the disposal of the Executive with regard to the prisoner who appears before them. It is not proposed to put such information before the prisoner. On the Report Stage I would undertake to introduce something to this effect: "That a detained person appealing to the Appeal Councils shall be informed of what offence in the Schedule of this Act he is reasonably suspect." That at least will give him the general grounds on which he can proceed to base his case and his appeal. I would not undertake that prisoners will receive a copy of the specific charges or a statement of specific evidence against them. Yesterday, in dealing with this matter, I pointed out that in a certain situation—in a situation of turmoil and revolt and outrage generally—it is very advisable that the Executive should not disclose or give information that might lead to the disclosure of the source of its information with regard to particular prisoners. It might be a question of life and death upon this prisoner obtaining his release. We are asking power in the Bill to arrest and detain persons whose liberty is held to be prejudicial to the public safety. We will undertake to use that power in the most guarded and conservative fashion, but we cannot allow these Advisory Committees to take on the character of Courts. The prisoner will not be charged. But he can come before the Appeal Council and say: "I see no reason whatsoever why the Executive should think I am a proper person to be detained. I see no reason whatsoever why suspicion should rest upon me with regard to any of these offences, and I adduce here before this Council or Committee certain evidence of my good citizenship, certain references as to character, and so on." But it is not a Court; it is a Committee. We will lay before that Committee the reasons that led to the arrest and detention of the prisoner, and the Committee will hear the prisoner on the question as to why he should not be detained in that fashion. Anything further than that would give to these tribunals the character of Courts. Who would they have to try? Not prisoners. The prisoner is not charged. The whole purport of this Bill is to enable people to be detained without charge or trial, and it seems to me to give any further power than that would constitute a Court of that Committee, and a Court to try the Executive as to its use of the powers given by this Bill. That would be wholly wrong and a wholly anomalous situation. These Councils will be Advisory Departmental Committees. They will have at their disposal, to some extent at all events, the material upon which the arrest and detention of a person is based; they will have in substance the case of the Executive for the detention of that person. They will hear the prisoner on his aspect of the thing, and on the question of why he should not be further detained, and they may examine and cross-question the prisoner, and they will finally make their recommendation to the Executive. But we cannot agree to serve upon the prisoner a specific charge, or to place in his possession the information at our disposal with regard to him. To do so might lead to very grave danger to persons outside.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister's statement rather belies the title he is giving to these Councils. He has decided that the Councils should be called Appeal Councils, but he has told us that they are not

[Mr. Johnson.] to be Appeal Councils at all; they are to be Advisory Committees to the Executive Council. I think it would be much better that the Bill should actually state what it is that the Minister's desire was when drafting the Bill, and that the Dail should know what it is agreeing to. I think Deputy FitzGibbon rather commended the provisions of this Bill, especially the Appeal Councils, on the ground that it was some movement towards trial by Court. Now the Minister informs us that they are not to be Appeal Councils, and that they are really not to do anything more than has already been done by Ministers themselves. It has been competent, I am glad to acknowledge, for prisoners to make representation to Ministers, and to ask for a release on certain conditions, and Ministers have decided on cases without any Appeal Councils. They have taken the whole responsibility for detaining or releasing; they may have had Advisory Committees or they may not; they may have already in existence Advisory Committees of whom one person at least on each Committee "has legal knowledge and experience." I assume that they have had such Committees, or at least that they have had some such advice. It seems unnecessary to embody in a Bill of this kind a provision setting up Appeal Council Committees, which one may presume are already in existence, or if they are not in existence that the Ministers have already power to set up. But, according to the Minister, it is quite a misnomer to speak of this as an Appeal Council. They have no power except to advise the Minister, and he has claimed the right to refuse that advice if he wishes. That cannot be called an Appeal Council, and it seems rather to tend towards making little of the legal profession to ask them to appear before, or to sit on, a body called an Appeal Council which, in fact, has no right to decide anything, and which is, in fact, a mere Advisory Committee to the Minister, but whose advice need not be taken. I think the draughtsman of the Bill either misinterpreted the original instructions, or the Minister has retrograded since the instructions were given, or he has forgotten what these instructions were. We ask him to go back and think rather of the intentions of the Bill when he gives the name to his Councils of Appeal Councils, and not to confine their functions to that of Advisory Committees.

The amendment surely is not an unreasonable one. I understand that the Sankey Committee was frankly and openly an Advisory Committee, but even as an Advisory Committee the provision there was that the Chairman of such Committee must be a High Court Judge. This Committee is to be of less importance than that, inasmuch as all that is required of one of the members is that he "shall be a person of legal knowledge and experience." That is, however, by the way. If one is purporting to give to a prisoner rights or privileges that he has not hitherto had, to appear before a Council, it is surely not enough simply to tell that prisoner of what offence he has been suspected. It is reasonable, I suggest, to give that prisoner some information which he can reply to and answer, and to make some charge in respect of, not merely the offence, but the time and the circumstances in which it is suspected the prisoner was guilty of such an offence. How can a prisoner prove his innocence of a charge that is not made against him? We have been asked to agree to a Bill which purports to give an opportunity to a prisoner to prove his innocence. That reverses the normal practice, which was to ask the prosecutor to prove the prisoner's guilt? But not only are we now asked to give powers, or to impose upon the prisoner the duty of proving his innocence, but he is to prove his innocence of a charge which is not made, and, having proved his innocence of a charge that is not made, and having been able to convince the Appeal Council that he has proved his innocence of a charge that has not been made, the Minister still reserves to himself the right to refuse the advice of that Advisory Committee. However, that is perhaps going a little too fast, because that matter will come up on a later amendment. I would urge it is only reasonable that the cause which the Appeal Council is to inquire into shall not merely be before the Appeal Council, but that the prisoner himself shall have some knowledge of the case that is made against him, and of the charges, and of some of the circumstances upon which the suspicion has been formed. The Appeal Council will have had under the Bill itself certain information, but unless it is provided that the Appeal Council shall have the duty of examining and cross-examining a prisoner and of inquiring into all the circumstances surrounding the prisoner's activities round about a particular period, unless that duty is mandatory upon the Appeal Council, the prisoner's opportunities of proving his innocence may be nil, because all he is to be informed of is the offence, in a long series of offences, of which he is suspected of being guilty. The prisoner may be suspected of assisting in, or encouraging, the commission of one of many offences. He has been arrested and detained on that charge, and that is all that is to be told to him. He appears before a Court, and has to prove to that Court that he is innocent of assisting in the commission of one or of a dozen or of twenty different offences. I would urge the Minister to think more seriously of the responsibility he is putting upon the Appeal Council, and of how much easier it would be for that Council to inquire into a case if the prisoner is given some knowledge of the case that is made against him.

Mr. DAVIN: I desire to support this amendment. I take it the intention of this Bill will be, particularly if the amendment to this section is properly applied, to reduce to a minimum the number of people who are in custody on suspicion or on definite charges. Section 2 of the Bill says: "Any person detained in custody under this Act, whether under an order of the Executive Minister or by the military authorities, may in the prescribed manner request that an inquiry into the matter of his detention be made by an Appeal Council." I have always tried to look at this question from the point of view that there are several classes of people at present detained. There are people who, perhaps from high political motives, may have answered the call of leaders, believing that they were doing right. The number of people who responded to such an appeal, and who had previously done anything during the period of the Anglo-Irish war, may be comparatively small, taking into consideration the very large numbers of people at present detained. I take it that that class of prisoner would be reluctant to make an appeal to any tribunal set up under this or any other section of the Bill for the purpose of obtaining his release. But there is a class of prisoner, the class which has been interned and is being detained on suspicion, which would undoubtedly take advantage of whatever Appeal Tribunal would be set up, and I think it would be an encouragement to that class of prisoner to appeal to the tribunal if he was in possession of the actual charge on which he is being detained. In dealing with this matter of detention and the question of releases the Government and everybody who has an interest in the prisoners, or in the proper administration of the Government, must look at the question not from the point of view of the individual who has a grievance because he feels he is wrongly detained on suspicion. If, for the sake of argument, a brother of the Minister himself was detained on suspicion and interned, and that the Minister and those of his family connections knew quite well that there was no reason, from their knowledge of his movements, why he should be detained, we can see that the opposition to the Government goes right through the family and affects a far greater number than the individual who is personally concerned. I think that is one of the reasons why an amendment of this kind should be accepted in order to minimise the opposition to the Government, and to reduce to a minimum a number of people who are detained or interned longer, at any rate, than they should be.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Speaking a while ago, the Minister said there would be danger, if this amendment were accepted, or if anything like this were done, that the sources of the Government's information might be disclosed, to the personal danger of certain people, perhaps, as well as to the danger of the State. I would not suggest that the sources of information should be disclosed in such a way as to justify the Ministry's fears. Not at all. The intention of the amendment could be quite well achieved without going to the length which the Minister seems to contemplate. The Minister says that the prisoner appealing will be informed of which of the offences mentioned in the Schedule he is suspected.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: As a matter of practice he will probably be informed of a good deal more. I want to draw a distinction between practice and a right. If you set down here that the prisoner shall receive a copy of the charge and all the evidence against him, you make a Court of this Appeal Council, and you give the prisoner an absolute right to be charged and tried. In point of fact, this is an Appeal Council to hear the prisoner on the question as to why he should not be further detained, and as a matter of practice the prisoner will receive all the information that it is considered right or safe to give him on the question of the reason why he is detained. If you set it down here in the Bill, you would make it a matter of absolute right, and you would make of the Advisory Council a Court, and that is where the objection lies.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

CATHAL O'SHANNON: That is a very important statement of the Minister as to practice. It was the point that I was about to raise. But if we had more information really about the Council we would not be working so much in the dark. I had taken a note to raise the question of the procedure of the Court. The section does not prescribe the procedure of the Court. The Minister now says that the Executive authority in dealing with the Appeal Council will adopt a certain practice. I presume that we can accept the word of the Minister on that. But he may not be the Minister who will exercise the powers given in this at all. For that reason I think it is necessary that there should be some better definition in the section of the rights or, if you like to put it, the privileges of the prisoners. Even if a prisoner is informed that he is suspected of one of these offences, and he is told something more than that, I wonder whether he is going to be told that at a certain time or on a certain occasion a certain one of these offences was committed, and that he was suspected of that? The Minister might say that that may disclose information which he does not want to be disclosed, and which he thinks it would be dangerous to disclose. But the offences, as given down here, are so wide that, taken not as charges, but as matters for suspicion, it would be extremely difficult for any prisoner, unless he has a great deal of information—more than I think is contemplated—to make a case. Some Deputies will remember that formerly one of the grounds on which people were interned was that they were associated with certain other people who were suspected of acting or being about to act—the Deputies will remember the rest of the phraseology. I know a Deputy who is a personal friend of a certain man in his town. That friend was deported and interned along with that particular Deputy. He was kept in detention even after the appeal to the Sankey Committee, although the Deputy's friend had not had, act or part in any particular activity in the particular Western town to which he belonged. He was suspected, presumably, because of his association with this Deputy. Now, the present situation lends itself to that kind of thing. If, in a case like that, that internee had known the real grounds on which he was suspected, it might have been possible for him to make a case at the Appeal Council. He did not, and he was not able to make a case, and it was extremely difficult for anyone to make a case. Take, for instance, Section 12: "Aiding, abetting, assisting in or encouraging." Take that in conjunction with 10 and 11. It might be claimed that the Appeal Council might feel it was justified in detaining a prisoner because he was associated with somebody whom the Appeal Council had already convinced itself was reasonably suspected of some one of these offences. I think there is a case, if there is not too wide an interpretation given to the amendment, for the acceptance of the amendment, and that it would not go so far in the direction of making a Court with actual powers of release and anything like that, as the Minister seems to think. I will ask the Minister to accept it.

Mr. LYONS: I support this amendment. I think it is only right that the prisoner that you are about to place before a tribunal of justice, or before the Appeal Council, should know the exact nature of what he is supposed to be charged with, and that he should know also every particle of evidence that was in your possession. I think it would be only fair that you should furnish the prisoner with such evidence, so that he may be able to put forward any evidence which he himself possessed or could offer to the Court with a view to proving his innocence.

The Minister has already said the prisoner would be brought before the Appeal Council. The amendment goes a little further and states "not less than ten days before any enquiry under this Section, a person whose case is to be enquired into shall be furnished with copies of the reports or certificates in virtue of which he is being detained." When you have such a large number of prisoners at the present moment, not taking into account the number likely to be interned under this new Act, it is only fair that those persons should get an opportunity of proving their innocence. If you take a man and detain him behind prison walls for a fortnight, three weeks, or a month, and at the end of that time you say to him "You are to be placed on trial to-morrow," it is hardly fair that he should not be given some particulars of the charge preferred against him. If you give him only 24 hours' notice, the man has no chance of getting together any evidence so as to contradict the evidence brought against him by the prosecuting solicitor, or whoever may be in charge on behalf of the Minister for Home Affairs. It is only right that the prisoner should be placed in such a position that he shall have furnished to him the evidence to be brought forward against him.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: As a matter of explanation, I would like to say it is not a trial. There is no charge. A person whose liberty is interfered with under the provisions of the Bill will be told there is an Advisory Committee, an Appeal Council, before which he may appear if he considers that he can show cause why he should not be further detained, and why, in fact, he never should have been arrested. In other words, he may be told, "If you feel you are innocent, you can come before a body of reasonable men and convince them a mistake has been made in your case." There is no use in the Deputy keeping on using such words as trial, and charges, and so on, after I have explained very fully that it is not a trial and this body will not be a Court. We are very emphatic on that. The whole principle of the Bill is to entitle the Executive, in view of a special emergency situation, to detain people without trial.

Mr. LYONS: That is all the more reason why a person who is to be brought forward—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: He is not to be brought forward; he is to come forward.

Mr. LYONS: You have him in your custody, and if he is not a prisoner, why not release him without setting up any Appeal Council that he is to go before? If what the Minister states is correct, there is all the more reason why the prisoner should be previously furnished with particulars. Take, for example, that I am the prisoner. If I am the victim that you may choose to lay your claw upon, just like a hawk watching for an unfortunate little swallow who might happen to be around, I should have some opportunity of defending myself. Just like the hawk, you and your associates are watching to see what victim may come into your grasp, so that you could sentence that victim to a term, even if it were only a few days, in order that you can show your authority. The explanation of the Minister for Home Affairs proves more clearly why the amendment should be accepted. It is only fair that a prisoner should be given an opportunity to show why he should not be detained, and for this purpose he should be supplied with copies of the evidence brought against him by the Minister for Home Affairs or his servants. It would be only right to furnish him with that evidence ten days before he is to be brought forward. Then he could be in a position to tell you why you must release him. If an innocent man is interned he cannot get an opportunity of explaining why he had been arrested. He is simply told he is arrested on suspicion; he has no knowledge of the evidence that is in the possession of his captors. He is just like a little bird in a cage. The wires are all round him. In this case the place of the wires is taken by the associates of the Minister for Home Affairs. They are so closely around that it is impossible for him to get out unless the Minister opens some avenue, and, in my opinion, the best way to open that avenue is to accept this amendment.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 13; Níl, 39.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó D'aghaidh.
Liam de Róiste.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seánáin.
Domhnaill Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnaill Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnaill Ó Mocháin.
Séamus Breathnach.
Peadar Mac n' Bháird.
Darghal Fíges.
Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Domhnaill Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Earnán Altún.
Sir Séamus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobáin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.

Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Próinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Éamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaid.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Séamus de Burea.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. LYONS: I propose the following amendment:—To insert after Sub-section (2) a new sub-section as follows:—

“ Every person whose case is inquired into by an Appeal Council shall be afforded reasonable facilities to obtain legal advice and assistance before the inquiry is held, and may appear before the Appeal Council in person and/or by counsel or solicitor or a friend on his behalf.”

I am sure that the Minister in charge of this Bill cannot possibly find an argument to offer against this amendment, or that he does not want to deny the right of a person whose case is to be inquired into of getting in touch with a solicitor or appearing in person before the tribunals. If this amendment is accepted it will certainly go a good way to facilitate some of those persons who will be brought before these Councils. Take, for example, the person who is detained in custody. If the solicitor is notified twenty-four hours before that person is to be taken forward to give an account of himself the whole conversation between the solicitor and client is overheard by a warder or soldier standing by. There is many a thing to be said probably by a solicitor to his client, or a client to his solicitor, which they do not want the soldier, policeman or warder to hear. Furthermore, I am sure the Minister has already explained that the prisoner will appear in person. If so, we can take it for granted that that portion of the amendment is already accepted. I do not think that it is possible for any honest, straightforward and just-minded, thinking man to deny the right of any person whom he may have in his power to procure some legal aid so that he may be able to prove his innocence of any of the charges that have been brought against him. I know it is the duty of the Government to prove a man guilty. Under this Bill it lies with the person himself to prove that he is innocent. If this amendment is accepted you shall give a person whom you have in your power an opportunity of appearing personally before the Appeal Council and of hearing every particle of evidence that is brought against him. You will be also facilitating him by allowing his solicitor to visit him without the aid of one of your soldiers, warders or policemen.

Surely we must for a moment cast our minds back. I am sure every Deputy in this Dáil can well recollect the human cry that went out from the nation that no person could possibly have a conversation with his solicitor simply because there was somebody always standing by to hear the conversation. All the words pronounced by the solicitor to the client or the client to the solicitor were known by the people who were directed to prove against the man a charge of which he was not guilty. I will ask the Minister to accept this amendment. I would like, of course, that the amendment should be accepted, not alone because it may help some of the prisoners already behind the prison walls, but because it will also help some of those persons that are still at large and honestly watching and waiting for this Bill to get through the Dáil, so that the hawk of the Saorstát might not be able to lay its claw upon its prey and put it inside. The hawk of the Saorstát, to my mind, is a particular class of bird out listening to and watching everything people have to say, and under this Bill persons will be able to give a certain amount of information about many innocent men and women who may have to appear before this Appeal Council. It is for that purpose that I ask the Minister to accept this amendment giving those persons whose cases are to be inquired into by the Appeal Council an opportunity to get legal aid, legal assistance, and appear before the Council in person, so that they may be able to prove their innocence and be set free, and, above all things, that they shall not be kept at the expense of the ratepayers.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am not accepting this amendment, and my reasons for refusing it are simply the reasons I have given in connection with previous amendments that this body will not be a Court before which prisoners will be tried on a specific charge. It is a body set up to act as much in the interest of the detained persons as in the interest of the State. It will be substantially in possession of the Executive side of the question. With that before it and at its disposal, it will proceed to hear the prisoner on the question of why he should not be further detained. There will be nothing technical about it. It is a body of one legal man and two sensible laymen, and hearing two aspects of the question, they will come to a conclusion and make their recommendation to the Minister. To surround this thing with the trappings and procedure of a Court would be to convey a doubly wrong impression, as I have remarked before. There is a very special situation. Deputies, I think, will not question that, and in that situation the Executive asks Parliament, as it is its duty to ask Parliament, for all the powers which it thinks necessary to deal adequately with that situation. We ask for the very special power of interfering with the liberty of citizens to the extent of detaining them for a period without trial or without making specific charges against them.

Deputies must know that people have been active against the State and against the citizens for ten months who are now detained, and against whom it would be impossible to prove a specific charge in Court. It is simply common knowledge in that vague way that they were leaders of a column perhaps in an area, they were known to have been connected with particular acts of outrage and destruction, but it would be a very different thing to prove that in Court. There would be the difficulty of securing evidence. There is far more physical courage in this country than moral courage, and in a time like the present people are unwilling to come forward and give evidence with regard to offences. We are asking power to detain persons without trial for a period of six months. This body, the Appeal Council, is not a Court, but it is a body set up to deal between the detained person and the Executive, lest mistakes should occur. Mistakes conceivably might occur.

Mr. DAVIN: Hear, hear.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: And the prisoner who feels that, can come before a body of sensible men and put his case to them, give his references, and so on, and the mistake can be rectified. He will get that opportunity. But this is not a Court, and we do not propose to have solicitors appearing on behalf of prisoners in connection with it. If a prisoner is an honest man, with just that average share of intelligence which a normal man has, he can appear before this body and put his case perhaps better than any subtle lawyer could put it, and the very plainness and bluntness and frankness with which he can put his own case would probably be the biggest factor in the minds of this advisory body. I cannot accept the Deputy's amendment, and I stress the point that the members of this Council will be there as much in the interests of the persons who come before them as in the interests of the Executive, and having heard what they have to say for themselves, and weighing that with what has been put at their disposal by the Executive as the reasons for the arrest and detention of the persons who come before them, they will discuss matters between themselves, and come to a conclusion and make their recommendation. That is the conception of the Appeal Council.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

Mr. DAVIN: I thought when listening to the speech of Deputy Lyons that if his arguments were not sufficient to convince the Minister as to the necessity for this amendment that, at least, the tone of his voice would have struck a very weak chord in the Minister's heart, and would have persuaded him to take a view contrary to the one he has now expressed. I, at least, expected that every Deputy with a legal training would have stood up to back up an amendment of this kind. Paragraph 1 of Clause 4 states "as soon as may be after the passing of this Act there shall be established by the Executive Minister one or more Appeal Councils consisting of not less than three members, of whom one shall be a person certified by the Attorney-General to have legal knowledge and experience."

What is the meaning of having on this Tribunal, if there is nothing technical about its conduct, a person who is certified by the Attorney-General to have legal knowledge and experience? It is either a Court or it is not a Court, and if it be necessary to have a legal gentleman whose knowledge of legal matters cannot be disputed, I think it is very desirable, in the interest of the prisoner, that he should have some legal advice, or somebody to deal with that particular gentleman who may be acting on behalf of the State. I take it that the presence of the legal gentleman on this Court, acting in company with two other commonsense individuals, will be for the purpose of determining any legal quibble that may arise with regard to the conduct of the Court or any argument that may be put up by the prisoner. The prisoner, no matter how intelligent he might be, would not be in a Court of this kind—and it is a Court, there is no use in putting any other complexion upon it, once you have a legal gentleman there on the one side—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: He is not on the one side. That is where the Deputy is making a mistake. He is acting between the two parties—the Executive and the person whom the Executive has detained.

Mr. LYONS: Who is paying him?

Mr. DAVIN: He is certified by the Attorney-General to have legal knowledge and experience, and he is there, I presume, first in the interests of the State and appointed by the State. It is for that reason, and that one alone, that I think this amendment should be open to the consideration or reconsideration of the Minister. No matter how intelligent a prisoner may be, he will not be able to answer or meet the arguments of any legal man. In the interests of the prisoner who recognises this particular Court, and I take it every prisoner is not prepared to do that, I think the Minister might reasonably accept this amendment. The Minister also seems to harp, in every argument he puts up against any amendment from this side, on the fact that these people were active against the State and against the citizens. I am sure the Minister, even in his wildest moments, would not say that every man now detained in prison has been active against the State and its citizens. This Bill makes provision for detention of men on suspicion on any ground, good or otherwise, of aiding and abetting. Deputy Cathal O'Shannon gave a case with regard to a person in the West of Ireland who, because he was associating with a Deputy during the troubled period—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Long horns!

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I could give an instance nearer home.

Mr. DAVIN: He was arrested, and in spite of an application to the Committee, which was dealing with cases of that kind, he was still detained. When the whole situation is reviewed, when this trouble is all over, and when all those at present in prison are released, I think it will be found that the action of the Government in imprisoning men on suspicion will have done nothing except throw a cloak of patriotism over a large number of men who did not deserve it—who did nothing for the country, for the Republic, or for anything else. It is recognised that any man who was imprisoned during the British regime in this country, whether on suspicion or for the commission of a political offence, came out a hero. Under an Irish Administration I do not think the Government should be prepared to encourage that. By refusing to give a prisoner an opportunity to prove his innocence they are furnishing him with a pretence of patriotism, when perhaps he has no right to such a cloak.

Mr. MORRISSEY: I would like to support this amendment, which I think the Minister should accept. There is nothing in it that I can see which would invest this Court of Appeal with the trappings of an ordinary Court. It simply says that the prisoner shall have the right to consult counsel or a solicitor. The Minister says the prisoners are all of average intelligence. "Average intelligence" is rather a vague term. The Minister knows as well as I do that there are men in prison who would not be able to put their case before a Court. As the last speaker said, there are innocent men in prison who may find it difficult to prove their innocence. If those prisoners who are innocent got an opportunity of consulting a solicitor and stating the reasons to him as to why they should be released, and if he were allowed to put those reasons before the Court, I think it would be only fair to the prisoner, especially when the President of the Court will himself be a legal gentleman.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: I would ask the Minister to bear in mind the case of a young country man or a young country boy taken up here and interned. That man will not go before a tribunal; and even if he did, he would not be able to put his case as it should be put. We all know that all country men are more or less nervous when going before a gentleman looking at them, perhaps, through an eye-glass. If that man had the assistance of a legal gentleman he would be able to make a very good case. In fact, I am sure that if the Minister read the case he would let him out at once.

Mr. LYONS: After hearing the argument put forward by the Minister against this amendment, I can assure the Dáil that it has not in the least convinced me. I am well aware that the members of the Appeal Council may be there, as the Minister stated, as much on behalf of the prisoner as of the Government, but I would ask the Dáil to remember that the members of this Council will be employees. I am sure that when their salaries come out of the Exchequer of the Saorstát and are given to them, probably by the would-be boss or will-be boss, the Minister for Home Affairs—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy seems to be assuming that we want to keep innocent men in internment. We do not. The Deputy is assuming too much when he assumes any hostility or juxtaposition on our part to innocent men.

Mr. LYONS: I am not assuming any hostility on your behalf against innocent men. It is the Minister himself who is assuming hostility. By not accepting that amendment he is proving that his intentions and the intentions of the Council are to intern and detain innocent men. As some of my colleagues have already explained, some men have not the courage to go before the Appeal Council. Some men may be nerve-struck owing to all the terrors that have taken place since 1921. If people who have lost their nerve are arrested on suspicion, and are not allowed to get legal advice to put their cases before the Appeal Council, I think it is ridiculous, absolutely ridiculous. If you have a charge against a person, you should give him an opportunity of getting legal aid. The Minister has not even yet stated whether the person concerned will be allowed to appear before the Appeal Council in person. Furthermore, I heard the Minister say that this Bill gave power to arrest, detain, and intern people without charge or trial for six months. The Minister may have made a mistake in using those words a few moments ago when he was answering me on this amendment. He made [Mr. Lyons.] use of the words, "The Bill gives power to arrest and detain people without charge or trial for six months," although it says here in Section 2: "It shall be lawful for any responsible officer to arrest and detain in custody for any period not exceeding one week"—that is what the clause says—one week.

Professor MacNEILL: The Deputy is out of order.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy must confine himself to the amendment on the Paper.

Mr. LYONS: I am confining myself to the amendment on the Paper. I made use of the same words that the Minister used in arguing against this amendment, and if the Minister was allowed to proceed when he was out of order, then I think the same thing should apply to the Deputy. I would like the Minister to explain whether he really meant those words.

Professor MacNEILL: I submit that the Deputy is out of order. I am trying to protect the Deputy and keep him in order, although it is not my duty.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy cannot go back and discuss a section already passed.

Mr. LYONS: Surely the Minister fully realises the necessity there is for giving a prisoner an opportunity of contradicting any erroneous charges there may be against him. I would ask the Dáil to remember that the events of the past few years have seriously affected the nerves of a great many people. Deputies should also realise the strength of the arm of the law. You place the strength of the law against the weak arm of an individual. Surely he has not the strength or the full courage to stand against the mighty arm of the law without, at least, getting a little protection. He must have some protection, and the protection is given to him in this amendment. I fail to see why the Minister rejected it when he had already accepted the principle of it, at least, in a previous amendment, when he stated that the prisoner would appear before the Appeal Council in person.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the Chair at this stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: I was hopeful that the Minister would meet this amendment, at least, part of the way. The case that he has made, in resisting the proposal that facilities should be given to a prisoner who appears before the Appeal Council to have legal advice, is that he does not desire—that it is not the intention—that this appearance before the Appeal Council will be the same as an appearance before a tribunal trying a case, and, consistent with that intention, he says that he does not desire that the prisoner making the appeal shall be confronted with all the legal trappings of a Court, and have around him, to speak for him, solicitors or lawyers, and to treat the court as if it were a court belonging to and siding with the Government. But I think there is force in the argument made by Deputies Davin and Lyons, that many prisoners are not of a capacity, not fitted to make the best of their own case in a court, to put it before even a body of three gentlemen friendly disposed towards the prisoner. One can imagine the session. There is a private room where the three members of the Appeal Council are meeting with the papers before them. I will assume that nobody else is present but the prisoner and the three persons constituting the court, and that they and the prisoner are on friendly terms. I think there is no one but has had experience of an individual appearing before unknown people and having to state his case. Deputy Burke, for instance, will recognise what I am suggesting, that a young man, or an old man, who perhaps has not had many associations with what he might call the gentry, will go into a room and be asked questions, and he is immediately off his guard. He does not know what he is doing. He is not merely off his guard, but his wits are not with him. He is not at home. He feels he is before a tribunal, although he may not be, in the Minister's view, and he cannot state his case. Now, even if he had a non-legal friend, somebody that he could feel was a support to him, a moral support to help in making his case, the case might be very much more effective, simply by the fact that he had his wits about him and he knew that he was not before a court which was out to frighten him and perhaps put him in jail for ten years. I suggest that the case for the next friend, even if he is not a lawyer, to be present with the prisoner when he appears before this council is a very fair suggestion, and not at all an unreasonable one. But, even supposing that that, reasonable as it is, cannot be conceded, surely it is not unreasonable to ask that that prisoner, who knows that he is going to appear before such a tribunal, shall be able to get the assistance and the confidence that a solicitor, or a counsel, or a next friend could give him before he appears before that tribunal. Surely that is not an exceptional or extravagant request that will meet the Minister's objection that he does not want this council to take upon itself the character of a court? There will be no need for that objection to be stressed at all if the prisoner has an opportunity to confer, either with a solicitor or a layman before he appears before the tribunal. He, at least, has the feeling that there is somebody else in the world who is thinking about him besides the prisoners, on the one hand, and the tribunal on the other. I do not think there is anything extravagant in that request, and I would ask the Minister if he cannot meet the desires of the Deputy who moved it in some way, so that the prisoner shall have some facilities for conferring with a solicitor or a friend, either before or at the hearing of the case.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Let me reinforce Deputy Johnson's argument. One Deputy's argument was that there would be a difficulty, perhaps through sensitiveness or something like that, which many prisoners find themselves in when they come before any tribunal like this. I have in mind an instance of one who occupies a very responsible office in the State, a comparatively young man, who had to go before a tribunal like this. He was much younger then, of course, little more than a boy, a boy, though, of more than ordinary intelligence, and whose career since then has shown that he had a brilliancy in certain directions that has been a very great service to the State. He did not know when he was called up before this tribunal what course he ought to take. He did not know what he ought to do. He had no idea of what his position was, and he admitted quite frankly to those of us who happened to be associated with him then that he did not know what to do when he went in.

He had no one to advise or direct him, and, of course, the only thing he could do was to turn to those who happened to be prisoners with him. I would urge strongly that the Minister should not leave consultation merely to fellow-prisoners of a man like that, because the purpose that he wants served by the Appeal Council may be defeated by wrongful advice, perhaps wilfully and deliberately given, to prisoners by their fellow-prisoners who take a certain line inside a Court that would not be to the good of the State or the prisoner or anything else. That has happened before, I know, but in quite different circumstances. The circumstances at present ought to be taken into account, and a prisoner should not be left to the mercy of the suggestion merely of his fellow-prisoners, but should have opportunities of consultation and advice with somebody else in whom he would have confidence, and who would give more independent and unprejudiced advice than his fellow-prisoners.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: The Minister has mentioned that the majority of the prisoners arrested under this Bill have been arrested on suspicion.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: No prisoners have been arrested under this Bill yet.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: They will be, or dealt with under it, and it is to enable people to dispel this suspicion, to enable them to prove that they are innocent, that we are asking him to accept this amendment. Surely that is not too much?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I regret I cannot make any concession in this matter. It is what a prisoner has to say for himself, and not what his wife, brother or sister has to say for him, we are anxious to get at, and we have set up this body as a medium for his saying that to the Government. That is about what it amounts to. This body is a buffer one between the two parties, the Executive and the person whom the Executive believes it to be necessary to detain for a period in the public safety. He can go before this Council, and he can say what he wants to say for himself. He may endeavour to show that he is not the kind of person that it is at all necessary in the public safety to detain, that he was not connected with outrage or lawlessness generally, or with, possibly, the particular act of outrage that he may be told he is believed to have been connected with. But it is what he has to say for himself, not what some solicitor thinks he might stretch a point and say for him, and not what his wife or next relative may say for him or advise him to say, but simply what the man has to say himself to the Government through this body.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: But what about what his enemies, who brought him into that position, will say about him? It is to combat that we are trying.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: He has got to make an impression on three impartial men sitting there to hear what he has to say as to why he should no longer be detained, or as to why he should not have been arrested. You may take it, if he puts up a reasonable case, and that at least a recommendation would come along, that the case should be further and very closely scrutinised and inquired into, and there would be of course the possibility of there coming from that body a recommendation that that man should be released. There are amendments that that recommendation should be absolutely mandatory. That would give this tribunal the complexion of a Court. There is no reason to believe that the recommendations of that body would be lightly overruled just because it is not a Court. We do not propose to make these recommendations binding on the Executive.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: That would be all very well if we had some experience of the manner in which the Appeal Council was carrying out its duty. We have not had so far that experience. It is all very well for the Minister to say that what they want is to hear what the man has to say for himself. But before any such tribunal, I submit that a good deal will depend on the form in which the man says what he has got to say for himself. Many a prisoner may have a great deal to say for himself, but he may not, for one reason or another, be able to put it in the form most effective and most appealing to the judgment of the tribunal. He may have a great deal to say, and yet may not be able to assemble the different parts of what he has to say in such a way that he would present a reasoned case to a tribunal. I think that the Minister can see that there is point in that. One of the extraordinary things to some of us who had experience of a somewhat similar tribunal was that certain people, whom we knew to be well worth, at all events, an unfavourable decision from the tribunal, were released on the advice of that tribunal; but a great many more, who were much more notoriously to very many of us completely innocent—many were absolutely innocent of any kind of offence except the kind that I mentioned a while ago in dealing with another amendment—were detained for the full duration of detention at that time. Some of us made a rough-and-ready examination to try and arrive at the reasons for this, and we came to two or three conclusions. One was that sometimes a Council might be more, not exactly "getatable," but more lenient or more generous on some days than other days for some reason or another. Perhaps it was because its personnel changed slightly from time to time. But one of the conclusions we came to that seemed to go some distance to explain the decisions of the Court was that certain people, to our knowledge, were able to put their case in a very good form, and in such a way that they were able to put up a convincing case, while others who had a much better case were not able to put their case in a convincing form. There is much more in the form than the Minister seems inclined to agree to, and I would ask him to reconsider that particular point because it is of importance. Many a good case is spoiled by the form in which it is put.

Mr. DAVIN: There is another reason, perhaps a reason which concerns the Minister himself or whatever other Minister will be called on to review the report of this tribunal, as to why these cases should be thoroughly inquired into. The clause stipulates that whatever decision the Appeal Tribunal may arrive at is subject to review by the Executive Minister. It says: "... having considered the report of such Council, is of opinion that the public safety would be endangered by such person being set at liberty." If the Minister, by accepting this amendment, agrees that the prisoner who is trying to prove his innocence, and who if things were right, should be treated the other way about, allows a legal representative to appear on behalf of the prisoner, or, on the other hand, acting on behalf of the Government—as I presume they are appointing an individual—there will be two legal men. I take it, in such circumstances, whatever legal quibbles would be at stake or raised by the Council or Appeal Court, would be thrashed out to a conclusion, and the Minister would thereby be relieved of the responsibility or trouble of reviewing the case that would have been thrashed out from the legal and from every other point of view concerning the detention of the prisoner. I think that is an additional reason why the Minister should not persist in refusing to accept an amendment of this kind.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá 13; Níl, 31.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dubhthaigh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Ní.

Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Séamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghaigh.
Deasamhain Mac Gearailt.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Eoin Mac Níill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.

Piarras Béaslaí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faolte.
Séamus de Burea.

Amendment lost.

Mr. DAVIN: I would suggest, provided the suggestion meets with general approval, that there should be a short adjournment of an hour. It is quite evident that the Minister who is in charge of the Bill, and those of us who are responsible for amendments, are not in a position to leave our places, and therefore I suggest such an adjournment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: There is no agreement on that.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Amendment 25 is not being moved.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:—

“In Sub-section (3) to delete all words from the word ‘and,’ line 56, page 3, to the word ‘liberty,’ inclusive, line 7, page 4, and to substitute therefor the words: ‘and such Council has reported either (a) that the reasons given for the detention of such person are not adequate to justify his detention without trial; or (b) that, having regard to the period during which such person has already been detained, there is not sufficient reason for continuing his detention, then, immediately upon receipt of the report of the Appeal Council, the Executive Minister shall cause such a person to be set at liberty.’ ”

The object of the Appeal Council in this case would be not even yet to act as a Court, but to consider the case that has been put forward by the Minister, the grounds of suspicion, the grounds of detention, and presumably to examine the prisoner in his own defence. Having satisfied themselves that there is no case for further detention, they shall report such fact that there are no grounds for further detention, or that, supposing there were originally some grounds for detention, that the grounds are so trifling and that the circumstances have changed in such a way as to make detention no longer reasonable. On receipt of such a report the Executive Minister shall cause such a person to be set at liberty. If the Appeal Council is to be composed of three persons, men or women, one of whom shall have had legal experience, and is to have the evidence which originally justified in the mind of the Minister the detention, and an opportunity of hearing what the prisoner had to say for himself, and if that Council has no grounds for recommending continued detention, or, on the other hand, has positive grounds for recommending release, it seems reasonable that such a person should be released. The Minister has described this Council as being something in the nature of a go-between between the Executive and the prisoner. I presume he did not mean to suggest that it was merely a channel of communication, but that it was a body which he intended would have at least common-sense and discretion, and would be capable of forming a judgment as to whether further detention without trial was justifiable. The Minister proposes to reserve to himself the right to say whether the tribunal he has set up is a competent one. He proposes to reserve to himself the right of saying whether he was wise or unwise in setting up that Council. I am going to presume, and I ask the Dáil to presume, that the Minister, when he sets up such a Council, will have satisfied himself that the people constituting that Council will have at least an average amount of discretion, that they will be capable of discriminating as to the case the Minister puts before them regarding the prisoner, and having tested the case by the appearance and bearing and the evidence that the prisoner himself submits to prove his innocence, that they will be competent to declare that this prisoner should no longer be detained, and that thereupon he should be released. Notwithstanding what the Minister has said in regard to earlier amendments, I think he will see the justice and the reasonableness of this proposition.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. FITZGIBBON: This amendment covers the two principles that are involved in the next three amendments standing in my name. As I have some doubt whether, if this amendment were defeated, it would be open to me to move the amendments I have put down with the same object, and as I have no desire to waste time in going twice over the same ground, I propose to support this amendment with the arguments that I had intended to put forward in support of the amendments in my own name. The wording of this amendment differs to some extent from mine, and perhaps goes a little further. The two real principles involved are these, (1) that the onus should not be put on a man who is merely detained on suspicion of proving that there is no reasonable ground for that suspicion; (2) that when the tribunal that has been set up by the Minister to inquire into the question whether there are or are not reasonable grounds for detaining the prisoner has reported that there are none, it does seem to me to go far beyond justice and far beyond the necessities of the case that when, after investigating all the reports that the Minister has placed before him, they come to the conclusion that there is no reasonable ground for detaining a man, that he should nevertheless be kept in custody. The section as it stands does these two things, although they seem to me to be contrary to justice, (1) that a man who is merely suspected should have to prove that there is no reasonable ground for suspicion, (2) that when he has succeeded in doing that he should nevertheless be detained at the option of the Minister. I do think, with every desire to support the Government in all reasonable and even in some unreasonable methods of dealing with the present situation, that this goes too far. I do suggest that when the Appeal Council, having investigated all the facts, finds itself in a position to report that there is no reasonable ground for detaining a man, that that decision ought to be adopted. I think that every word that the Minister said on that amendment with regard to the constitution and modus operandi of this Appeal Council supports the view I am putting forward to the Dáil. They are not to be deluded by the subtleties of lawyers. There are to be three reasonable people appointed by the Government, I have no doubt, with every desire to support the cause of law and order and to maintain regular government in this country. I have no doubt that after the reports that will be put before them—because the previous amendments decided that they were to have the reports upon which men were detained—if they see there is nothing to be found in these reports, and nothing to be found in the statement made to them by the responsible Minister, that, being reasonable men, and coming to the conclusion that there are no reasonable grounds for detaining the prisoner, he ought to be released. The wording of this amendment goes beyond mine in this, because it goes on to provide that if he is detained for a certain period the Council may deem that a proper cause for release. I do not go so far as that, but I would go so far as to say that, as the Minister says the prisoner is in reasonable detention, it would be for the Ministry to say how long he shall be detained, and not the Appeal Council. I am inclined to support that view. But the two vital principles in this amendment, and which induced me to put down my amendment, are that, although we are far from the position that a man is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty. I think if the people who detain a man can show no reasonable grounds for suspecting him, then he ought to be treated as a person free from all suspicion and therefore ought to be entitled to get out; and if, having failed to discharge the onus of proof that there are some grounds for suspecting him, they ought not to be put in a position of overriding the decision of their own tribunal and declaring that the man must still remain in custody. I support this amendment, and I trust that even if the second clause of it does not meet with the approval of the Minister in charge of the Bill he still may give us some release as regards the first clause, and, secondly, as to the power of the Minister to override the decision of his own tribunal.

Mr. McGARRY: I suppose I may be regarded as more or less interested in this matter. I am going to vote against this amendment, because I know the difficulties the military authorities have even in dealing with prisoners. I know there are several prisoners in custody at the present time against whom I could prove several charges of loot, robbery, and arson and other things, and the only reason I do not do it is because I would get somebody else into trouble. That has happened all over the country and in Dublin. People have looted property and stolen motor cars, but the people who know they have done it will not come forward and give evidence in public, and the reason is because they think they would be shot the next day. I know, at the present time, that we have in custody six or seven people against whom I could formulate charges, but I could not conscientiously ask witnesses to come forward and prove them. I simply cannot do it. I am in trouble enough myself, and I do not ask other people to walk into trouble. What is the use of talking about reasonable suspicion? You cannot prove it, and it is not fair to ask people to come forward and prove it. I shall vote therefore against this amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Deputy FitzGibbon said there are really two principles in the amendment, and that is correct. There is the principle of whether we are entitled, in any circumstances, however grave, to put upon detained persons the onus of showing cause why they should not be detained, rather than take upon ourselves the onus of showing why they should. That is a matter that has been referred to over and over again on this Bill, and runs right through the whole Bill: that is, the question of detention upon anything short of legal proof. Now, I would like to meet Deputy Johnson and Deputy FitzGibbon by throwing (a) into a positive, rather than into its present negative form, but on (b) I am afraid I could make no concession. Dealing with (a) first "wherever an Appeal Council has enquired into and reported on the case of any person under this section and either—(a)—such Council has reported such person has failed to show that there is no reasonable ground for suspecting him of having committed or being engaged or concerned in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in the Schedule to this Act."

That is reading it as it stands now. We must remember that such a person was arrested and detained because an Executive Minister was satisfied that there was reasonable grounds for suspecting him of having committed offences mentioned in the Schedule, and this body is set up with a view of enabling the prisoner to rebut that suspicion and to show that he is not the kind of a person who should reasonably be detained as a matter of public safety. That is why (a) is in its present negative form, because it would amount to reporting from this Council that the detained person had failed to throw off from himself the suspicion on which he was arrested.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

Now I would like to meet, as far as I possibly could, the objections that have been urged, and I would be prepared to consider some such reading as this:—

“Whenever an Appeal Council has enquired into and reported on the case of any person under this section and either—

“(a) such Council has reported that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting him of having committed or being engaged or concerned in the committing of any of the offences mentioned in the Schedule to this Act.”

That is, that their report would be positive confirmation of the suspicion upon which a person was arrested rather than a report to the effect that the person did not clear himself of such suspicion. I think myself that the negative form is in the circumstances reasonable. A B has been arrested in a time of crisis because the Executive Council of the country which is responsible for public safety considers him reasonably suspected of having committed certain grave offences, which offences being for the most part the methods by which a campaign against the State and the citizens may be conducted, we set up this body, and we give to detained persons an opportunity of clearing themselves of this suspicion, and I think it is not unreasonable to say that they shall be continued to be detained unless that body reports that they have cleared themselves. That is what it means as it stands.

I would like to go a little further and put a more positive burden on (a), and make the Section read: “Whenever an Appeal Council has inquired into and reported on the case of any person under this section, and either (a) such Council has reported that there are reasonable grounds for suspecting him of having committed or being engaged or concerned in the committing of any of the offences mentioned in the Schedule.” If I put in that positive wording I would insist upon (b) as it stands, and the section would go on to read: “or (b) an Executive Minister having considered the report of such Council, is of opinion that the public safety would be endangered by such person being at liberty, any such person may be detained,” etc.

Deputies may think that that is treating the Appeal Council very lightly, and, of course, there is the obvious point to make that we ourselves set up this Council and selected its personnel, and that it seems a strange thing to refuse to bind ourselves by its recommendations. But there is this: Deputy Johnson the other day spoke of “public safety.” He took the two words “public safety” and made play with them, and asked for a definition of them. I did not reply by saying that it was the safety of the public, or anything of that kind. There is this about it, that the Executive Council, for the time being, must be the judge of it, and must be the judge of what it demands in particular cases and in a particular set of circumstances. We could not, even to this Appeal Council, leave the absolute last word on the matter. As I say, I do not really expect that any recommendations from that body would be ignored or overruled, and yet I would not concede the right to overrule them, because to concede that would be to concede to a body that has no mandate from the people, or any responsibility to the people, the right of saying the absolute last word on what the public safety requires. It may be academic or theoretical, but there is just that about it that it ought not to lie with a body of this kind, in such circumstances as we have in the country at the moment, to say absolutely that the public safety does not require the detention of A B. If a change in (a) of that section would meet Deputy Johnson or Deputy FitzGibbon, or both, I will be glad to insert some such change on the Report Stage, but I could not concede the other principle that Deputy FitzGibbon has urged—that we should say, in such a situation as the present, it will lie with some Appeal Council which we will set up to say the ultimate “yes” or “no” on the question of prisoners’ releases. It might well be that there would be circumstances which would prevent us from putting before such a Council absolutely all the information that would be at our disposal with regard to a prisoner. It might well be that for sufficient reasons, for very good reasons, we would find it incumbent upon us to withhold and to lay only a partial report, or a partial dossier of evidence, before this Council. There might be an item, and a very grave item, which it would be considered necessary to withhold. In such times as the present Deputies will perhaps understand that point. Deputy McGarry touched on it. The Executive Council for the time being must always be the judge of this vague thing called "public safety." That is their peculiar function. If they judge it wrongly or unwisely, and consistently show an inability to appreciate what it is and where it lies, then the representatives of the people would take appropriate action; but for the time being, and while in office, they must judge it rightly or wrongly, and they cannot delegate to such a body as this Appeal Council the power or the right to judge it.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: The Minister in his speech seems to me to have agreed substantially to accept Amendment No. 28, but he refuses to accept Amendments 27 and 29.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: These would be the exact words if Amendment 28 be accepted.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: In regard to what Deputy McGarry said, no one suggested that the Ministry should prove the guilt of any detained prisoner to the Appeal Council. All that they are asked to do is to prove that they have reasonable grounds for suspecting him, which is a very different thing indeed from proving that he is guilty. He has not got to do what the ordinary prisoner in the dock, in the ordinary case, may have to do when a case is established against him, and that is to prove his innocence. He has got to go a good deal further than any criminal was ever asked to go, and that is to prove not only that he is innocent, but much more than that, to prove that no reasonable person ever suspected him of being anything else but innocent. To put that onus on any man seems to me to go far beyond the limits of even the grossest injustice. I am very glad indeed that the Minister has seen his way at any rate to modify Sub-head (a) to the extent that he has outlined. I have no desire to press amendments to divisions merely for the sake of recording my vote one way or the other. But what I want to do is to get as much reasonableness into this Bill as I can, and if I cannot get more than what the Minister has offered I will take that with modified thankfulness. As I say, I am not moving my amendment at present, but I am supporting the amendment moved by Deputy Johnson. When my own amendments come on I will ask leave, if the first amendment is defeated, in view of what the Minister has said, to move Amendment 28.

Mr. DAVIN: Deputy McGarry assumes that these Appeal Councils would be Courts where it would be necessary for him or any other person with information at their disposal to bring forward people in order to prove charges against prisoners. There is no necessity to labour that point, because the Minister takes an opposite view in so far that he does not agree that it is a Court. The Minister referred to this vague thing called public safety. That is a thing that I have in my mind all the time when dealing with people detained or interned on suspicion. I know a few people at the present time who are enjoying the hospitality of the Free State Government in Tintown.

As far as I know, and I know one of them very well, they could never be accused of anything more than blowing off a lot of froth and steam. Simply because in their excited moments they may say something they are to be taken up for that. It might not be a crime to say that I am a rotter or a danger to the public safety or a tool of the Government, but it would be a crime if, in his excited moments, an individual said such a thing about the Minister. Possibly it might be set up as a charge against him that he was a danger to the public safety. I think you are placing a rather extravagant interpretation on the patriotism of such a gentleman by detaining him, at the hospitality of the Executive Council, at the Curragh. I know of a few gentlemen who go about shouting their anti-Government ideas and nothing more. I do not think they could be accused of having the courage to go into active opposition to the Government. That is the class of people you have to cater for in the amendment we move, and there should not be any necessity to detain these people, if at all, a day longer than would be necessary to give them the means of being accused by you and an opportunity of defending a charge before the Appeal Tribunal.

[Mr. Davin.]

Mr. O'CONNELL: It seems to me the Minister must have had some object in putting this Appeal Council into the Bill. He must have expected these Councils would be availed of by those held in detention. If he expects they will be availed of there should be some measure of confidence inculcated in the minds of those detained to the effect that their decisions will carry some weight. If by refusing this amendment and by the statement he has made, the Minister makes it clear at the outset that, no matter what the Appeal Council will decide, he will still retain the right to hold the prisoner—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The right.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I foresee that what will happen will be that none of those people detained will approach the Appeal Council. Most of the Deputies know that as regards the Sankey Commission which was set up under the British regime, very few people availed of it, although there was nothing more wrong with it, from the point of view of the people with whom we are dealing appearing before it, than there would be in appearing before this Tribunal from the point of view of the people who will be dealt with under the Bill. In the North of Ireland some of the prisoners who were detained in the "Argenta" did, at the beginning, appear before these Appeal Councils, or somewhat similar bodies that were set up there, and they very soon found that, even though they did appear, nothing came of it. After that had become manifest to those detained, there were no more appeals. I submit it would be just as well that the Minister would omit the Appeal Councils altogether from the Bill and not set up a pretence of a Council, which he is making plain will really have no effect.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Surely the Deputy remembers that I said I did not foresee or anticipate that a single recommendation of this Council would be ignored or overruled, and that it was merely a technical right that had to be preserved of deciding, in a matter of public safety, whether a prisoner would or would not be released.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I am pointing out that it will have no effect, and it will not be availed of, simply because the Minister has said, and is now saying, in effect, that he still retains the right, no matter what the Council decides, to keep the prisoners.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is an advisory body.

Mr. O'CONNELL: That is why I say it would be as well to leave the Councils out altogether.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: If the Deputy puts down an amendment to that effect, I will consider it.

Mr. O'CONNELL: It would be, to my mind at all events, a more honest dealing than setting up a Council which he makes by his statement nugatory.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I think this is a point that the Minister on behalf of the Executive cannot concede. I think the Minister is responsible to the Executive, the Executive is responsible to Parliament, Parliament is responsible to the people, and the people have the controlling power. If a certain case of individual hardship should by any possibility arise, it could be brought before the Dáil, and the fact concerning the prisoner's detention could be submitted.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: No.

Mr. McGOLDRICK: The Dáil could have submitted to it such particulars as may be required in any case in which there may be some doubt as to hardship imposed on a prisoner. This is not a tribunal that we can exactly describe as the tribunal to which Deputy FitzGibbon referred. Such a tribunal would be based upon juridical status, and would have all the rights to decide as to guilt or innocence. This is merely a tribunal that inquires into how far a person is reasonably suspected of being dangerous to the State. It is not concerned so much with the guilt or innocence of the prisoner as it is with his liability to be dangerous to the State. I think when the Minister has removed the first portion of it, to which I was myself opposed, the second part, in so far as it will not and cannot involve more than a slight percentage, if any percentage, of persons being detained after the Appeal Tribunal has decided that there was not sufficient evidence to justify them in saying there was reasonable ground for suspicion, is satisfactory. It may be there will be cases in which there are facts that cannot be brought forward. These things will arise. The Executive will feel some responsibility in the matter, and their responsibility is to the nation and to Parliament, and they cannot throw away their right to veto in a case of the kind, because some particular control must repose in some head or Executive with regard to special cases like those. Under the circumstances the tribunals are not judicial tribunals in any sense. They are merely inquiry tribunals, and their recommendations would be based on what is put before them, and it may not be possible to put all the facts before them at all. I think the amendment which the Minister has decided to accept will make the clause quite safe for its being accepted by this Dáil. The Dáil will be careful not to sanction anything that is unduly harsh or likely to create hardship on any individual. I am sure that is not the intention, and I am sure the Dáil will take proper steps that these things will be dragged forth.

Mr. JOHNSON: How?

Mr. McGOLDRICK: I am sure that the ordinary conditions that attach to all Parliaments will make it possible for any Deputy to have a case of hardship, if such come under his notice, brought here before this Dáil, the tribunal of the nation.

Mr. JOHNSON: How will we know about them?

Mr. McGOLDRICK: We can demand full particulars at any time by a combined desire on the part of the Oireachtas to inquire into any particular case of hardship that might arise, and inquire why a Minister should maintain a position which would seem impossible to be maintained. I think that is sufficient protection against hardship being inflicted. I think the Executive must hold a veto in this matter.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Deputy McGoldrick has brought up again the illusory prospect of eliciting facts which neither the Minister in charge of the Bill nor any other Minister is going to disclose to the Dáil any more than to the Appeal Council. Deputy Gavan Duffy dealt yesterday with the illusory nature of the bringing of a case before the Dáil.

Supposing the Appeal Council has advised the Minister that a certain prisoner should be released; that the Minister, for the reasons he has stated here several times this evening, has not put that Council in possession of all the information, or perhaps I should say all the suspicion, in his possession, and the Minister, in the face of the Council's recommendation, decides to keep the prisoner, Deputy McGoldrick then seems to think that it would be possible to bring up a case before the Dáil and to get much more satisfaction from the Minister in the Dáil than either the prisoner got when before the Council or than the Council itself got. That shows tremendous faith not only in the ability of the Dáil, but in the ease with which the Minister, or any Minister, will submit information at the request of the Dáil. Those of us who have had occasion from time to time to bring up the cases of prisoners in the Dáil have found that we have been able to get very little information indeed, except "that in the interests of public safety it was not considered advisable to release so-and-so." No more. But the Minister has said that he cannot foresee that these sub-sections which Deputy Johnson is seeking to amend will be applied in all their severity. But we have, none of us, any guarantee that that will be so. The Minister himself has no guarantee. He might have some guarantee, and the Dáil might have some guarantee if the Bill were to complete its course and expire before the General Election, but that is not likely. It may be that the present Ministry will become the new Ministry under the new Dáil. It may not be. It may be strengthened or weakened by combinations with somebody else. It may, on the other hand, even be in a minority, in the new Dáil. None of us know. Therefore, the promise from the Minister now, that certain things will not be done under this Bill, does not hold good, because he can give no promise for an Executive Council which comes in within the next few months. There is no really pertinent argument in turning round and telling Deputy O'Connell that if his opinion is that it would be much better that there was no Appeal Council than that their powers should be so little, he should move an amendment for the deletion of the provisions dealing with the Appeal Courts on the Report Stage. The amendment, as proposed by Deputy Johnson, is a serious amendment, an effort to establish certain principles, and to get practices corresponding to those principles in the administration of the Bill. To some extent the Minister has gone a little way to meet part of the intention. He has not gone the whole way. But I would urge on him and I would urge on the Dáil to consider, not only the case that has been made by the amendment as a whole, but particularly the need, as Deputy O'Connell has pointed out, for imbuing internees and prisoners with the idea that they are going to get at least a fair crack of the whip.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Mr. BLYTHE: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSON: I submit that that is out of order until the next Section.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: In the Six-Counties, as Deputy Johnson has said, there is no confidence whatever in the Appeal Council. In the Sankey Committee there was no confidence. If the powers of this Appeal Council are to be so limited as the Minister said, then there can be very little confidence, and there can be no inducement whatever to a prisoner to make an appeal to it. The Minister frankly and fearlessly admits that he may have up his sleeve, information which he cannot give to the Appeal Council. It may be a prisoner meets with the suggestion that he should take his case to one of these Councils. It is presumed that when that suggestion is made to him that he is told all about their powers. He may be told, or if he does not know, he ought to be told, that while they have a good deal of information about him, the Minister may have more information about him, and though even they decide he has made a good case, and recommend that he should be released, yet the Minister, either in virtue of the information which he has not disclosed, or for some other reason, can still decide to keep the prisoner in detention. Can anyone imagine that the bulk of the prisoners faced with a situation like that, could have any confidence whatever in the Appeal Council? No, they will simply say "It is bluff, they are pulling our legs, it is making a pretence of doing something for us without doing anything for us, the best thing for us to do is to ignore this Appeal Council altogether."

Mr. JOHNSON: I frankly say that it would be much better not to have Section 4 in the Bill at all in its present form. The Bill is far better without it. For one thing, the Section as it stands, unless it is amended in the form desired, simply suggests that the Minister wants an appearance of relieving himself of responsibility. He can at least appear to throw some responsibility for the non-release of prisoners who have appealed to the Committee. There is nothing to show what the report of the Council will be to the Minister, and at least there will be good grounds for thinking that the report was unsatisfactory, even though it may have been satisfactory. The prisoner is damnified having once gone before the Appeal Council, and not having been released the public will have a right to assume that there is more in the charge than they believe. Yet the Council may have said: "No, there is no evidence to connect this man with malpractices or any association with malpractices." The Minister reserves to himself the right to say, notwithstanding what the Advisory Committee may have said, notwithstanding what the Appeals Council may have said: "we are going to detain this man," and nothing more is to be known except the inference is to be drawn that they have something up their sleeve. I wonder whether, when defining the composition of these Councils, the Minister had in his mind the probability that eminent judicial gentlemen would not be likely to serve on Councils of this nature. All he asks is, that one of them is a person certified as having legal knowledge and experience. I take it that the Attorney-General will be expected to have proper consideration for his profession, and he will be sure that the person whom he nominates will be either a qualified solicitor or a practising barrister. He may only be a very minor one waiting for promotion, waiting for experience, and it may be that only minor ones will be willing to serve on a Council which has such limited power and authority, in which neither the public nor the prisoner nor the Minister himself has any confidence. The Minister confesses that, in paragraph (b) which he refuses to alter. I submit that to make this section of any value at all it requires amendment, such as that which is proposed. Not merely is that required to make the section of any value, but if something of that kind is not proposed the section itself would be very much better deleted, very much better for the prisoner and for the public. I think that it would ensure that the Ministers would have to bear the responsibility and not transfer it by inference to the Appeals Council. Deputy McGoldrick repeated his suggestion which he made one day recently, about the reliance upon the Ministry, the check the Dáil might have upon the Ministry, and the check the public will have upon the Dáil.

That is very pleasant, and I am sure that the Minister immediately reminded himself of his famous criticism that he is so used to in the Dáil, and he was eager to call upon Deputy McGoldrick not to deal with theories, but to deal with facts and common practices, facts of life round about us, and not to be thinking of the ultimate responsibility of the electorate for the conduct of their representatives, and of the representatives for the electorate, and the responsibility of the Ministry for their subordinate officials. Undoubtedly, the Minister said "That is a lovely theory, but, in practice, it does not happen," and I ask Deputy McGoldrick how he is going to bring the case of a prisoner, whose case had been heard before the Appeals Council, the Council's decision having been over-ruled by the Minister, before this Dáil? He would need to have access to the prisoner. He has not got that, but is seeking to get that. Only after the expiry of the Act, and the expiry of the period of detention would it be possible for Deputy McGoldrick to bring the case of that prisoner before the Ministry through the operations of the legislative chamber. Of course, it is always possible for a majority to turn out a Ministry. That is very little protection for the innocent prisoner whose innocence has been provable to the Appeals Council, and evidence of whose guilt is alleged to be contained in the archives of the Ministry. There is not much satisfaction to the prisoner in a vote of want of confidence in the Executive Council. One does not want to quote Dr. Stockman and speak of the "damned, compact majority," but one might well think of "the blessed compact majority" which believes that greater evil will result from the effect of want of confidence than from the continued detention of a prisoner. That is quite a reasonable proposition. We ought not to be weighing up the rights to detain a prisoner who may be innocent with the risk of throwing out the Executive Council, and that is the only check that Deputy McGoldrick says that we have. This Bill, when it passes, will not be the Bill or the Act of the Executive Council, but the Act of the Oireachtas. It is not enough for the Ministry to assure us what their intentions are. It is not enough to say, "we intend that such-and-such a thing shall take place." There is no need for a Bill to do that. They have power to release now. There is no need for a Bill to give them power to release. There is no need for Section 4 to set up an Advisory Committee to advise whether a person should be released or not, unless they bind themselves to take the decision of that Committee, and release the prisoner on receiving their judgment that there is no evidence of guilt. The Minister, all through this Bill, has based his case upon the contention that they must have the right to intern without trial. He claims that right, no matter whether there is prima facie evidence of a man's guilt or not. Even though the Advisory Council decides that there is not, still, he wants power to detain a man against whom there is no shadow of evidence. All power to the Ministry! All power to any Executive Minister! Talk about all power to Soviets! Talk about the dictatorship of the proletariat! That is the dictatorship of a single Minister, if you like. He asks the Dáil to agree to the setting up of an Appeals Council, an Advisory Committee. Having set it up, even though he declares there is not a particle of evidence to suspect the prisoner, he says, "I am going to have power to detain and intern that innocent man." This is supposed to be a transitory period between the period of revolution, of warfare, a period of armed rebellion, and a period of peace. It certainly would be much more frank and much more reasonable to come and ask for power to do anything with a citizen for at least six months, or for at most six months. If you intern a person who is, in effect, proved to be innocent, you may ask anything imaginable. Deputy O'Connell referred to Belfast, but I am pretty confident that they did not dare to go to the Belfast Parliament to ask for any such powers. They may take them. They may use them, but they would not dare to go even to the docile Parliament there to ask for those powers. The Minister has no hesitation, apparently, in coming to this Parliament to ask for those powers, because, feeling confidence in his own integrity, his own bona fides he thinks that is all that is at stake. It is conceivable that others may sit in those seats, and it is conceivable that, once this Oireachtas has embodied this kind of legislation in a Bill, a different Ministry, in a few years time, may say, "here is a precedent for us, and we may ask our docile majority to do the same." It is not wise for this Dáil to embody this kind of thing in legislation. It would be very much better for them to strike it out and say, "We will use the power that we have, and we will risk the consequences of the use of that power without trying to ride off under the cover of an Appeals Council."

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I had intended to wait until the Section itself was under discussion, and to say nothing upon this series of amendments, for reasons which will be sufficiently obvious to Deputies, but there is one point raised on a statement made by the Minister which should not go by default in connection with this particular amendment. The Minister seeks to justify the procedure of not undertaking to abide by the decision of an Appeal Tribunal, upon the grounds that there may be some confidential report dealing with the case of a prisoner, requiring that prisoner's incarceration, which the Executive Council would not feel justified in placing before an Appeal Council, everyone of whose members they will themselves have selected. I have not been present during the whole of the discussion, but, if I mistake not, the Minister himself accepted Amendment 22.

I think I am right in supposing that the Minister has accepted Amendment No. 22, and that amendment said that in an inquiry under Section 2 the Appeal Council shall—meaning must—be furnished with reports or certificates in virtue of which the person whose case is being inquired into is being detained. That can only mean that the Minister has agreed that all the grounds for detention of a person detained on suspicion without trial are to be laid before this Appeal Council. He would not be observing the terms of Amendment No. 22 if any material report—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I did not speak about report.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: The Minister used the word "report."

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I used the word "information."

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: But if he had only used the word "information," the position would be just the same, because the object of Amendment No. 22 is to secure that the Appeal Committee shall know why a man is interned. That is the only object of it—that in an inquiry under that Section the Appeal Council is to be furnished with the reasons for a man's internment. It is expressed in the words, "reports or certificates by virtue of which a person is interned." Surely the Minister for Home Affairs is not going to tell us that some private reason of State, over-riding other reasons, may exist and that he will be justified in the face of that amendment, which he has accepted, in withholding that private reason, and in putting before the Appeal Council reasons which are only partial, and which are not the full grounds upon which the Executive relies. My object in referring to this particular matter is that it seems to me, the Minister's statement is a negation and contradiction of the amendment which he himself accepted. I do not think that he can have it both ways. If it is right that the Appeal Council should be furnished with reasons let them be furnished with reasons and not partial reasons. I hope that the Minister on reflection will realise that the contradiction is quite apparent and quite indefensible.

Mr. GEORGE NICHOLLS at this stage took the Chair.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 15; Níl, 34.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Liam de Róiste.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Gearóid Mac Giubáin.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghéasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Uáille Mac Cumhaill.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mag Ualghair.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Sir Seamus Craig.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mag Aonghusa.

Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bultin.
Seamus Ó Dólaín.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Próinsias Mag Aonghusa.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Facite.

Amendment declared lost.

Amendment 27: "In sub-section (3), line 56, to delete the word 'either.'"

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I do not move amendment 27.

Mr. LYONS: On a point of order, is it necessary for a Deputy to get the sanction of the Dáil before he withdraws an amendment?

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I did not withdraw the Amendment. I did not move it.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Nicholls): The Deputy himself has answered the question. He has not moved the Amendment.

Mr. LYONS: If the Deputy in whose name the Amendment appears does not move it, can another Deputy move it?

ACTING CHAIRMAN: Not without authority from the Deputy concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON: That has not been the ruling.

Amendment not moved.

Amendment 28 "In sub-section (3) (a), lines 57 and 58, to delete the words 'such person has failed to show that' and to delete the word 'no,' line 58, and in line 61 to delete the word 'or.'"

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I beg to move Amendment 28. I have already said all I have to say in connection with this Amendment, and I understood the Minister to say that he was prepared to accept this Amendment, with the exception of the last three or four words. At least, he read out words that seemed to me to be identical with Amendment 28, and the Ceann Comhairle pointed out that the Amendment read out was identical with the terms of this Amendment, with the exception that the word "or" was not to be deleted. That would mean that the Amendment would read "in sub-section (3) (a), lines 57 and 58, to delete the words 'such person has failed to show that,' and to delete the word 'no,' line 58," and stop there.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I accept that.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the amendment as it stands is one that ought to be submitted to the Dáil. The sub-section, if this amendment were carried, would read:

"Whenever an Appeal Council has inquired into and reported on the case of any person under this Section and either:

(a) such Council has reported that there is reasonable ground for suspecting him of having committed or being engaged or concerned in the commission of any of the offences mentioned in the Schedule of this Act, or,

[Mr. Johnson.]

Then (b) would follow. The case made by the Deputy in the previous discussion seems to me to prove the necessity for having this amendment in the form in which it is, and with the deletion of the word "or" at the end of the paragraph retained. We have not yet come to the next paragraph and we have a right to assume that there is, at least, a chance, despite the opinion already expressed by the Minister, that (b) will not be pressed. If we retain the word "or" now it will assume that there is something following, whereas if the amendment in the form in which it is printed is carried, there is no conjunction and we will be grammatical, at any rate, when we exclude paragraph (b). I would urge that the amendment be put in the form in which it has been placed on the paper.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I would urge the Deputy not to press that. We have got a promise of something, and if the amendment goes to a vote I am afraid we might, while grasping at the shadow lose the substance.

Mr. LYONS: I am of the opinion that there is room in the amendment for improvement, as suggested by Deputy Johnson. I think Deputy FitzGibbon is of the opinion that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush." That might be his point of view. But I think the amendment ought to be put to the Dáil as suggested by Deputy Johnson. I do not see why the mover of the amendment should accept half the substance and throw the other half away.

Professor THRIFT: I rise to raise a question on a point of order. If this amendment is about to be put to the Dáil, would I be in order, supposing it were lost, in asking for your leave to move it without the last clause, deleting the word "no"? I think according to the Standing Orders the Ceann Comhairle can give leave for amendments to be moved which are not upon the Order Paper. I could put the matter in another way. Would I be in order now in moving with reference to this amendment the deletion of the last nine words?

ACTING CHAIRMAN: I said that I was taking the amendment as received, and in that I have the last nine words deleted, and that is the amendment now before the Dáil.

Professor THRIFT: That is all right.

Mr. JOHNSON: The amendment that was circulated, and which was discussed, was the amendment that was on the Order Paper, and I submit that we have to come to a decision on that amendment, otherwise—I draw your attention to the importance of this—it may be ruled that in consequence a succeeding amendment will not be in order. It is of the greatest importance that the motion shall be put in the form in which it was circulated, because there is a consequential amendment that has to be discussed, and if the amendment is to be in the form which you have now indicated, and different from the form in which it was circulated then, in consequence, it will not be possible to discuss the succeeding amendment.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: If it simplifies the matter I may state that I have no intention of moving the succeeding amendment.

Mr. HIGGINS: We might ease matters if I accepted the amendment on the Order Paper, and in the event of the succeeding amendment not being moved I would consent, on the Report Stage, that the word "or" between (a) and (b) should be deleted, because seeing that it governs the word "either" before (a), "or" is necessary and complementary on that if (b) survives. If (b) survives on the Report Stage I will have to add the word "or"; if (b) does not survive, then on the Report Stage I will have to move the deletion of the word "either" before (a). I would be quite willing to accept the amendment as it stands.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I do not move Amendment 29, A Chinn Chomhairle.

Mr. JOHNSON: With permission I beg to move Amendment No. 29:—"To delete Sub-section (3) (b), on page 4, lines 1 to 3."

Mr. BLYTHE: Chair.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Nicholls): There is no motion before the Dáil and Deputy Johnson is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am making a motion.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: Amendment 29 is not before the Dáil, and nobody has power to move that amendment without the sanction of the Deputy in whose name it stands.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to suggest that your ruling is different from that to which we have been accustomed from the Ceann Comhairle. It has been quite a common practice to accept amendments sent in in the names of certain Deputies and moved by other Deputies. Apart from that, it is quite in order to accept amendments on Committee, even though notice has not been given. I rely upon the practice that the Ceann Comhairle has allowed. It is quite common that a motion, of which notice has been given by one Deputy, and which that Deputy is not prepared to move, should be moved by another Deputy. It has been the practice ever since the Dáil began its sittings and I think it is a desirable practice, and I submit it is not reasonable to change the practice on this occasion.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: An amendment put in by one Deputy can be moved by another Deputy on his behalf at his request. The Deputy in whose name this amendment appears has refused to move it and therefore I think that Deputy Johnson cannot move it on his behalf.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I point out that this is not treating the Dáil fairly. I do not mean that your ruling is not doing so, but I mean this practice, if it became the procedure. If an amendment or a motion is put forward by a Deputy then it is before the Dáil. Notice of it has been given and it has either to be withdrawn by leave or it should be subjected to discussion and decision. I think that that is undoubtedly the practice that the Ceann Comhairle has allowed.

Mr. BLYTHE: Nonsense.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am prepared to abide by the decision of Acting Chairman as against the interjection of the Minister for Local Government.

Mr. D. MCCARTHY: Is it in order for a Deputy to question the ruling of the Chairman and to make two speeches on the ruling of the Chairman? We all know quite well that you must have the permission of the Deputy in whose name the amendment stands.

Mr. DAVIN: I wish to draw the attention of the Chairman to——

Mr. D. MCCARTHY: Chair.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: I gave certain latitude in this matter, but I gave my ruling and nothing that I have heard would make me divert from that ruling. It is quite clear, and has been the constant practice all along, that a Deputy, if absent, in whose name an amendment is down on the Order Paper, can get another Deputy to move it on his behalf, but in this case the Deputy in whose name the amendment stands is in the Dáil and does not move it. Therefore, there is nothing before the Dáil. Amendment 30.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I accept that amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: I submit that the amendment has not been moved.

Mr. EVERETT: I move that we delete the words "or outside" in Sub-section (3), lines 4 and 5.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment 31 by Messrs. DAY and COLOHAN: "To delete Sub-section (4)."

ACTING CHAIRMAN: That amendment falls consequential on Amendments 16 and 20 being lost. Amendment 32.

Mr. NAGLE: I desire to move Amendment 32: "To add at the end of Sub-section (5) the words:—Any such regulations shall be laid before each House of the Oireachtas as soon as may be after they are made, and if either House of the Oireachtas shall pass a resolution annulling or amending the regulations, the regulations shall be annulled or amended accordingly, but without prejudice to the validity of anything already done under them." I think it is obvious why this amendment is moved. It intends to give the Oireachtas an opportunity of discussing any regulations that the Executive Minister may make, and of amending these regulations if it is thought they are too drastic, or even if it is thought they are not drastic enough. I think the Minister should have no hesitation in accepting it.

[Mr. Nagle.]

Mr. O'BRIEN: I think it is very necessary that an amendment of this kind should be accepted in order that it might be seen whether or not the Appeal Council will be a real thing. It will not serve any useful purpose unless it be of such a character as to inspire those in custody with some confidence that they are going to get a square deal, and that the Appeal Council will have authority to give effect to its recommendations. This whole Bill is, quite obviously, founded on the Defence of the Realm Regulations, that many of the Deputies were unpleasantly familiar with in the early days of the European War, and some of the Ministers. The Minister in charge of the Bill, I think, had not the doubtful pleasure of making the acquaintance of the Advisory Committee set up under the jurisdiction of Judge Sankey. But you, Sir, and the Minister for Local Government, and, I think, the Minister for Defence could tell the Minister in charge some very racy stories as to the procedure adopted before Judge Sankey's Committee—which was called the Amusements Committee. I think you will agree it was not taken seriously, and it is possible that this Appeal Council proposed to be set up will not be taken very seriously by those on whose behalf it is to be set up. You will remember many of the prisoners were brought before Judge Sankey, a distance of a couple of hundred miles, to be asked trivial questions as to where they worked, and the number in their family, and so on, and this will turn out to be the same farce unless the people in custody have some idea they will get a square deal. I think it is necessary that these Regulations should be submitted here to see whether or not they faithfully carry out the intentions the Minister states is in his mind when he proposes to set up this tribunal.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It was rather difficult to come to a decision with regard to this amendment, and I will state quite frankly the arguments or considerations that would weigh towards the rejection. Those bodies that it is proposed to establish are not Courts, they are merely departmental advisory committees. I do not know whether there is any precedent for bringing before the Dáil, still less before both Houses, the instructions that would be given to committees of that kind, and a step such as is suggested in the amendment might give the appearance or suggestion that these were public tribunals. They are not. They are departmental committees. There are departmental committees sitting at the moment. There is, for instance, the Advisory Committee upon Personal Injuries, which is hearing cases and making recommendations to the Ministry of Finance. I am not aware that the instructions of that committee were laid before both Houses and discussed, still less amended, and yet if the Deputy and mover of the amendment were prepared to leave out some words in the amendment, I think we could strain a point and accept it. The words I would ask him to leave out would be the amending powers that are asked for. It is not without good reason I make that request. If these Regulations are to come before both Houses the amendment, as drafted, would leave it in the power of either House to put up and pass amendments. It might be amended differently in both Houses. There might even be conflicting amendments, and the question would arise as to which of these should prevail. If an amendment was passed in the Seanad which could not be reconciled with an amendment passed in the Dáil, what would happen? I would be prepared to accept the amendment minus these words that would involve that the Regulations for these Appeal Councils would be brought before both Houses and members would have an opportunity of discussing them. I have no doubt that, as a result of that discussion, if a strong view was shown to be held with regard to particular portions of the Regulations, the Minister in standing over them—whoever he might happen to be—would ask leave to withdraw them with a view to alteration, but I would ask the Deputy not to insist upon the power of amendment in either House. After all it is an Executive act. If it is wrong it is wrong, and should be rejected absolutely, but the Dáil should not seek itself to draw up these Regulations. Let it criticise them when drawn up. If they are wrong and there is a general feeling to that effect, no doubt the responsible Minister would withdraw them for alteration, but I think the Deputy would be unwise to insist on power of amendment for both Houses, and if he did so insist I would have no alternative but to oppose the amendment absolutely, withdrawing the concession I have offered.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think the statement of the Minister is fair. I believe that this amendment is based upon the practice already in operation, even with the portion which is to be amended. Nevertheless, I realise the force of the argument that there may be a difficulty if one House desires to amend in one direction and another House desires to amend in another direction, and that there might be considerable time lost in deciding which amendment shall be accepted. A discussion that would take place, if there was a resolution to annul, might well mean that the Minister responsible would prefer to withdraw the regulation and amend it according to the suggestion which takes place on the resolution for annulment. On these grounds, I think I would advise my colleagues to agree to the deletion of the words on line 3, "or amending the regulations," and the later words "or amended." That would probably meet the Minister's objection.

Mr. NAGLE: I am quite willing to have the amendment changed to suit the suggestion of the Minister.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I take it that the Deputy has no objection to an improvement in the drafting that would not alter the substance of the amendment? If we consider that the substance could be embodied in a better form of words I take it there would be no objection?

Mr. JOHNSON: Does the Minister make any suggestion as to an improved form of words?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I would not be prepared to make a suggestion. It only struck me that the draftsman might care to do a bit of touching up on the wording.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think this is taken verbatim from a previous Act. If the Minister finds it is not verbally accurate perhaps on the Report Stage he could suggest an amendment.

Amendment, as amended, put and agreed to.

Motion made and question proposed :—
"That Section 4 as amended stand part of the Bill."

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I am sorry this Section is going into the Bill. I am glad that there are amendments in it as far as they go, but as long as the Minister retains the power to override the decision of his own Appeal Council it is impossible for the appeal to be regarded as otherwise than as a delusion and a snare. I do not think it is sufficiently realised that the intense suspicion to which Deputy Johnson referred yesterday exists both in Executive quarters and among the prisoners. Consequently it is useless to provide an appeal of this kind unless in so doing you make it abundantly clear that the appeal will, in every way, be perfectly fair to the prisoner. You have to start with the fact that you are dealing with men who are naturally and reasonably suspicious of the Executive, and that you are dealing with an Executive that has shown itself to be exceedingly suspicious of those men and in many cases unnecessarily suspicious. If you start with that you will realise that a Section of this kind is really useless. I was struck by the drafting of this Section as it originally stood. I wonder whether the Dáil has realised that under the Section as originally drafted, and under that Section alone, the Executive has a right to order a specified period of detention for an internee, a period which, as I suggested yesterday, might have exceeded the period of the Bill. That, I hope I understood correctly, is to be taken out. But it was under this Section only that there was power given to the Executive to order detention for a specified period. Another curious thing was that in this Section only had you mention of the words "outside the Saorstát." So that it was a condition precedent to being deported to Saint Helena that you should appeal to the Appeal Council. You could not be deported unless you appealed to the Appeal Council to get out. Those being the facts can you blame men in prison that they are suspicious of this Appeal Council? Can any fair and reasonable man, however strongly he may feel against the men in prison, blame them for being suspicious when an Appeal Council of that kind is presented to them as a serious method of seeking release? I think that there is only one way in which an appeal of this kind can be effective and that is to insist that the persons who man the Appeal Councils shall be persons completely independent of the Executive and with legal training. I do not mind whether you call the Council a Court or not as long as you make quite certain in your Bill that the men who compose it will not be mere nominees of an Executive Minister, but will be independent men and men of legal training. That is not what is proposed. One of them is to be a man of legal training, nothing is said as to the others. I put it to the Dáil that it is futile to insert in a Bill provisions for an Appeal Council of this kind in the terms in which the provisions now appear. It has been a humiliating thing for many who believed in the Free State to see the Courts of Justice compelled to declare that there was a state of war in existence at the present moment, apparently basing themselves mainly upon the fact that the arms had not been surrendered, an argument which might apply equally well 12 months hence, if the arms are not surrendered in the meantime. That did not tend to encourage any respect for legal tribunals. How much less respect then will there be for a tribunal of this kind which is a non-legal tribunal and whose proceedings are to be conducted in secret? The Dáil will recollect that the Minister, after agreeing that the report on which a man is interned is to be placed before the Appeal Council, subsequently said that there might be cases where confidential reports would have to be withheld, notwithstanding the fact that there is now a Section in the Bill ordering the Minister to produce those reports to the Appeal Council. It has always been an honoured principle, and should continue to be even in a time like this, that if once a man gets out by order of a Court or a Tribunal established by the law of the day, nobody should have the right to question that decision. Unless that feature of the Appeal Council is removed, unless the feature whereby a Minister can override his own nominees for secret reasons is removed, unless it is made mandatory that the persons appointed shall be persons wholly independent of the Executive, it is much better not to have an Appeal Council at all, and so long as the Section remains in its present form I shall certainly vote against it.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

Mr. JOHNSON: I want to support the view Deputy Gavan Duffy has expressed, that the Section, by pretending to be something which would facilitate prisoners in their desire for release is really not going to do that with any effectiveness, but is rather going to do greater harm than any good there might be in the desire of the Minister. I do not believe that with the deletion of this Section there would be any less chance of prisoners being released. I believe the Executive Council can find ways and means of making inquiries into the case of a prisoner without the setting up under this Bill of an Appeal Council. It is quite within the province of the Minister even without this Section to call into his assistance three persons, or three times three persons, to advise him as to whether the evidence on which the person has been detained is of any value or not, to meet the prisoner and to examine him with a view to testing the evidence under which he was originally detained. It is better for the prisoner that he should know that the responsibility for his detention is without question in the hands of the Executive Council. The setting up of an Appeal Council, with such limited powers and low status as the Council provided for in this Section, would not be of any merit, and would, as a matter of fact, prejudice the prisoners, because they would feel that there was greater danger in making the appeal to a Council which had no authority to release. They would feel more confident if they were going to appeal to the men who put them in, and had power to retain them, rather than appealing to another Tribunal which had no power either to release or detain, but which would deceive them into thinking that there might be an extra chance of being released if their cases were considered by such an Appeal Council. It is quite illusory. It is no value in the Bill. There is nothing to prevent a Departmental Committee of the same kind being established without the authority of the Bill. Therefore, as I see it, the Bill would be less harmful with this Section deleted than with it in. It is like a false coin which would have the pretence of legitimacy but would not have the value of the real currency. It is better that people should not be deceived into thinking that the currency was valid, even though by chance an odd person were able to pass the false coin. I support the views expressed by Deputy Gavan Duffy against the acceptance of this Section, as I believe it is harmful, and not beneficial.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I should like to support Deputy Gavan Duffy in his view that this Section should not be retained in the Bill for the reasons stated both by him and by Deputy Johnson. The very title given to the Councils in the Bill is misleading. When the British set up a somewhat similar Committee they had at least the decency to declare that it was an Advisory Committee. The Ministry has not done that in this case, but has called these Councils Appeal Councils. In ordinary law and for ordinary offences when a prisoner is convicted by a lower Court he has a certain remedy and can appeal to other Courts. Citizens generally understand that they have such a right of appeal to other courts. So that the very title of the Bill itself, if not from the strict legal sense, at least in the ordinary accepted sense of the word, means that the body so designated can reverse or vary the decision of a body from which an appeal is made. That is not so in this case. The Minister has gone to great pains to show that in no sense of the word are these courts at all. They have no powers and no authority, beyond the power on the request of a prisoner to inquire, not so much I should say into the innocence of the prisoner, but into the reasons which seem good to the Executive why that prisoner should be detained. I submit that the whole thing is deceptive and that it will be fairer to the internees that the deception should not be practised, no matter how good the intention of the Ministry may be in practising that deception. Legal and other fictions have their use and their purpose. I suggest that this particular deception has no purpose except to mislead the prisoners, and not only the prisoners but the ordinary citizen outside, who may think from a surface view that there is something of real value to the internees in these Councils. We are not even informed, although the Minister has thrown some light on the work of the Councils, of their personnel, except that one shall be a qualified legal gentleman. We are not informed either by the Minister of the number that he proposes or suggests to set up. There are I suppose anything from 10,000 to 12,000 prisoners, who under the Bill have the right to request an investigation by one of these Councils, but we have no idea at all, and can form no idea, of the length of time any one of these Councils might reasonably give to the investigation of the case of a particular prisoner.

It is obvious that if you are to do anything to deal with ten thousand prisoners more than one Council will have to be set up. If more than one must be set up, then how many? And what are the regulations by which they should be conducted? If there are more than one it is a fair assumption, I think, to make, that the practice of one Council may differ very considerably from the practice of another Council. We know very little about them except what the Minister has told us, and what little we do know about them has not given us any confidence in them. On the contrary, it has made them appear naked and unashamed. For that reason I beg to support the attitude of Deputy Johnson and Deputy Gavan Duffy in opposition to this Section.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I intend to vote against this Section for the reasons that I have already indicated, speaking on an earlier amendment, namely, that I think the Bill would be quite better without this Section. There is no freedom to the prisoner in these appeals, and I think it would be fairer to the prisoner not to have these Appeal Councils which, in the circumstances and as outlined, could only be farcical in their operations. There are many men whose future position may be determined by the manner in which they are dealt with by these Appeal Councils. A man, for instance, may be in employment and may be interned, and his employer, not knowing these Appeal Councils as we know them, and thinking they are equivalent, in every way, to a regular Court of Inquiry will, and possibly quite naturally, form the opinion, that here you have a Court of Inquiry set up to try the prisoner. If the prisoner fails to appeal to that Court, as some of them will decide not to appeal, the employer may come to the conclusion that the man is, therefore, guilty and not worthy any longer to hold the position he has held, and he will be removed from that position. His guilt will be assumed, and he will be dismissed.

[Mr. O'Connell.]

In saying that I am not speaking altogether hypothetically. Deputy William O'Brien, and others, told us how farcical were appeals to the Sankey Commission under the British regime. I think I am right in saying that the Government at the time used that Committee or Commission, or whatever it was called, to remove Civil Servants from their positions. If I remember rightly, the position taken up by the then Government was that any prisoner who failed to appeal to the Sankey Commission, or any prisoner who appealed to the Sankey Commission and whose case was turned down, could not be restored to his position in the Civil Service. His guilt was assumed although, as Deputy O'Brien told us, some of these men, having gone three or four hundred miles to attend the Commission, were asked questions that had nothing to do with their internment or detention. That is the danger I see in these Appeal Councils. If all the amendments that had been moved to this Section were accepted, they might have been of some use, but as the Section now stands, even with some amendments in it, it is more of a danger than otherwise to the prisoner, and therefore I intend to vote against this Section.

Question put: "That Section 4, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Dáil divided: Tá, 40; Níl, 13.

Tá.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Uaitéar Mac Cumhaill.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Séamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Uaighaigh.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stainosa.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.
Eoin n'Altáin.
Sir Séamus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobáin.
Liam Thrift.

Eoin Mac Néill.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraig Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.
Piaras Béaslaí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dólaín.
Próinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Éamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAoláin.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnall.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.

Níl.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhlin.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghessa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Motion declared carried.

SECTION 5.

(1) Any person found guilty on indictment of any of the offences mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule to this Act may be sentenced to suffer death or penal servitude for any term not less than three years.

(2) Every person convicted by a Court of summary jurisdiction of any of the offences mentioned in Part II. of the Schedule to this Act shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment with hard labour for the term of twelve months, and to pay a fine of fifty pounds and, in default of payment of such fine within one month after conviction, to suffer imprisonment with hard labour for a further term of six months to be added to and commence on the expiration of the said term of twelve months.

(3) Every person found guilty on indictment of any of the offences mentioned in Part II. of the Schedule to this Act shall be sentenced either—

- (a) to suffer penal servitude for a term of three years and to pay a fine of not more than one hundred pounds nor less than fifty pounds and, in default of payment of such fine within one month after sentence, to suffer penal servitude for a further term of one year to be added to and commence on the expiration of the said term of three years ; or
- (b) to suffer imprisonment with hard labour for a term of not more than two years nor less than one year and to pay a fine of not more than one hundred pounds nor less than fifty pounds and, in default of payment of such fine within one month after sentence, to suffer imprisonment with hard labour for a further term of six months to be added to and commence on the expiration of the first mentioned term of imprisonment.

(4) Every male person who shall be convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction or found guilty on indictment of the offence of robbery under arms as defined at No. 6 in Part II. of the Schedule to this Act, or of the offence of arson as defined at No. 7 in Part II. of the said Schedule shall (unless the Court is of opinion that, owing to the state of health or advanced age of such person, corporal punishment could not be inflicted on him without permanent injury to his health), in addition to the punishment prescribed in the foregoing sub-sections, be sentenced to be once privately whipped subject to the following provisions :—

- (a) in the case of a person whose age does not exceed sixteen years, the number of strokes at such whipping shall not exceed twenty-five and the instrument used shall be a birch rod ;
- (b) in the case of any other person, the number of strokes at such whipping shall not exceed fifty ;
- (c) in each case the court in its sentence shall specify the number of strokes to be inflicted and the instrument to be used ;

(d) such whipping shall not take place after the expiration of six months from the passing of the sentence ;

(e) such whipping to be inflicted on any person sentenced to penal servitude shall be inflicted on him before he is removed to a convict prison with a view to his undergoing his sentence of penal servitude.

(5) The jurisdiction of a court of summary jurisdiction in respect of any of the offences mentioned in Part II. of the Schedule to this Act shall not be ousted by reason of the title to any corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments or any lands or premises being drawn into question.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I move amendment 33 on the Order Paper.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Nicholls): On the instructions of the Ceann-Comhairle, this amendment has been altered to read as follows :—

To insert before Section 5 a new Section as follows :—

“(1) From and after the passing of this Act it shall be the duty of every County Council within whose area persons shall be detained in custody without trial under this Act to appoint a Committee consisting of such number of persons of good standing in the locality as the Council shall deem necessary, having regard to the number of persons to be detained in custody without trial in such area.

(2) The members of every such Committee and each of them, shall from time to time and at frequent intervals visit every place of detention for which they are appointed and hear any complaints which may be made to them by persons confined therein, and, if asked, shall do so privately ; they shall report to the Minister for Home Affairs and to their Council upon any abuses which they may find and upon any matters of pressing necessity.

(3) Every member of such a Committee shall at all times have free access to every part of the place of detention for which he is appointed, and to every person detained in custody without trial therein, and free access to all the books of every such place of detention.

(4) In this Section the expression

[Mr. Nicholls.]
 'County Council' shall include the Corporation of a County Borough."

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I accept the Chairman's ruling with a good grace as always. A rose is as sweet by any other name. When we cannot call a place of internment a Bastille in an Act of Parliament, we certainly can call it so in our ordinary speech. I rather fancy that had this amendment been allowed to go to the Dáil in the original form in which I proposed it, with this naughty French word, that the insertion of that word, that name, would have commended itself to the Executive Council themselves, seeing that they have always told us that they believe in calling a spade a spade. The object of this amendment is a very simple one. It does not depend upon what we call places in our Acts, and I quite willingly omit the appellation from the Section. The object is to let in a little daylight in these places of internment, mainly in the interests of the prisoners, and also in the interests of the Free State. I received, and I suppose other Members have received a copy of a resolution passed on the 5th day of this month by the Waterford County Council. That County Council resolved:—

"That we cannot accept General Mulcahy's statement as sufficient answer to our demand for an independent inquiry into the conditions prevailing in the Free State prisons, and we reiterate our demands for an inquiry with special reference to suspected cases of ill-treatment of individual prisoners, and that copies of this Resolution be sent to the Members of Parliament for Southern Ireland, and to all County Councils."

Mr. WHELEHAN: On a point of Order, what is the Parliament of Southern Ireland? This is not the Parliament of Southern Ireland.

General MULCAHY: On a point of explanation, the statement of mine referred to in that resolution is the report of the Red Cross Committee that visited the different jails or prisons here.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: As to the point about Southern Ireland I am merely quoting what the resolution says.

As to what the Minister for Defence has stated I did not know what particular enquiry was referred to, and it is immaterial. The point is that a County Council in this country after twelve months of Civil War should pass a resolution of this kind. Deputies have also received the very unpleasant statement issued under the name of Alderman Murphy, containing allegations as to treatment of prisoners recently, after an attempted escape. For a long time past we have been accustomed to receiving various reports as to ill-treatment of prisoners in various places where they are held by the authorities. The immediate question is not whether these reports are true or false, whether they are well founded or utterly groundless. I have myself often refrained from giving publicity to reports of the kind because of the impossibility of verifying them. The important point is that it is very generally credited that prisoners have been subjected to ill-treatment and it is bound to be credited so long as your prisons are Bastilles—so long as your detention camps are kept in such a way that no human being who is not in the employment of the State or who does not receive special permission ad hoc can go inside. This amendment is intended to draw attention to the necessity of getting away from this appalling policy of secrecy which has been the mistake from the beginning in connection with these prisons. I should have thought it would have been obvious to the Ministry, and to those who support them, that a policy of that kind defeats itself and must defeat itself. One was glad to read the report of the Red Cross Committee or rather of the Red Cross delegate who visited the prisons and found them very satisfactory, and stated that allegations that had been brought to his notice were untrue; but, when one came to the paragraph in which the delegate stated that he had not been authorised to question prisoners, one saw at once that the effect and value of his report was thereby very materially decreased. Is there any outside authority whatsoever entitled or to be entitled under this Bill to inspect places of detention or to visit a prisoner there? Or is it the view of the Executive Council that no such thing can be tolerated, otherwise the safety of the State would be endangered?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: What do you mean by "outside authority"?

Mr. GERALD FITZGIBBON took the chair at this stage.

Mr. DUFFY: I had in mind the delegates from the County Council. I should be glad to know who, if anyone from outside, would have any right to inspect?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Does the Deputy mean from outside the country?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: No; some person outside the Executive and outside the prison; outside the present Government authority, some person such as visiting justices in the old times. I asked the other day that a Committee of Doctors should be allowed to inspect the prisons and prisoners. For technical reasons my amendment fell through, but not before the Minister had stated that this amounted to a vote of censure upon the Executive, and, therefore, should be resisted. That is not the spirit in which a matter of this kind should be approached. We are just as much entitled to believe that the interests of the State, to say nothing of the interests of the prisoners, require daylight as the Minister is to say that the interests of the State require that no persons of this kind should be allowed to visit the prisons. It cannot be to the interests of the State to have numerous stories spread about, and spread about simply because there is no means, when there is a real grievance, of testing it to the satisfaction of the public, and when there is a bogus grievance, there is no means of ascertaining that it is a bogus grievance. It cannot be satisfactory to this Dáil nor to the Executive itself. That is why I asked that a County Council, taking that as a normal representative body, should be authorised to appoint people for the express purpose of visiting the detention camps within the area of the Council. I asked that the Members or Delegates appointed by the Council shall be allowed to inspect and visit these bastiles frequently, and that they shall be entitled to see any person confined therein, and if asked to do so, to see any such person privately; that they shall report to the Minister for Home Affairs and to the Council that sent them, upon any abuses they shall find therein, or upon any matter of pressing necessity. This subsection is nothing new. This, and indeed the next sub-section are both modelled upon the Section giving express powers to visiting justices under the Prisons Act. The statute about visiting jails expressly says that prisons should be visited, and the prisoners shall be seen privately if that is asked for. It expressly says, as in the next sub-section, that there shall be free access to every part of the prison and to every person detained in the prison and to all the books in the prison. I want the Dáil to realise that this proposal is not revolutionary. If the Minister were to say that for some reason or another the County Council is not a proper body to appoint visiting justices, let us have the matter dealt with in some other way. In the interests of the Executive and the State, it is necessary that someone who is not an Executive servant, and some persons who are not under the authority of the Executive as their officials, and who would in their visits represent the public, should have the authority to visit prisons and prisoners.

I would ask the Deputies to remember that in passing this Bill Dáil Éireann is doing something of a very unprecedented character. You are going to sanction for six months, or perhaps longer, the internment, without any trial whatever, on mere suspicion, of thousands of people. A good many have been in prison for twelve, eleven, ten months, and so on, and I can understand, although I disagree with the Ministry's view, that, during the active period they could not permit people to visit and inspect prisons. I do not think that the same case can be made now for keeping the prisons secret. I want to say quite frankly that a great deal of propaganda has been carried on in connection with the prisons which was unfair, but, as long as prisons are kept secret, that will continue inevitably. At the same time, there have been abuses which the fact of secrecy has made it impossible to go into, and which would have been remedied had some such proposal as this been adopted. I trust, in passing this drastic measure, the Dáil will do itself the justice of insisting that some such proposal as this shall be inserted in order to have a little fresh air and daylight in connection with these detention places, when we all know that the opposite policy is an exceedingly bad one.

The PRESIDENT: The Deputy has spoken at some length upon a subject of which, as far as I know, he has no information, he has no experience, and he is not in a position to give to the Dáil anything but a very exaggerated account of the condition of affairs in these internment camps. I was looking around the Dáil to see some person who had had experience of imprisonment, and the Deputy that I had in mind has gone out. I have had some experience of imprisonment. I recollect on one occasion when there had been some relaxation in Lewes, in 1917. There were there, 120 prisoners, and I recollect a song being sung by one of them. The song was, I think, "The Felons of our Land." I have not much knowledge of poetry or music, but, if my recollection is correct, there was some reference in that song to "dungeons deep." All the prisoners there wore convict uniform, and their laughter was loud and derisive when that particular part of the song was reached. Whether that was the song or not, I do not know, but those particular words were used. If the Deputy were there a great deal of his hallucination would, I think, have been dispelled. That was the case when imprisonment was certainly more severe. There had been a relaxation after the prisoners were taken from Portland and Dartmoor to Lewes, and conditions in Lewes were very much better than what they were in the other two places. The Deputy need have no misgivings about the Executive Council. The Executive Council, with great respect to the Deputy, does not require any assistance from the Deputy in so far as the treatment of prisoners is concerned. I am quite sure he means well, but most of the members of the Executive Council have got intimate knowledge of imprisonment, intimate knowledge of the propaganda that is got out of imprisonment, and intimate knowledge of the false, malicious, unfounded and utterly unreliable propaganda that is made, certainly in this case, about the maltreatment of prisoners. I know Alderman Charles Murphy. I know him well, and have known him for many years. I know his family, and he might, at least, have written that complaint to me; and, if there was anything in it, it would have been investigated. He could have written to the Chief of Staff, who was his friend and who did business with him for a long time. Alderman Murphy is, I have no hesitation in saying, an honourable man, but, in internment camps and places like that, one's judgment is certainly not of a sane and sensible character, and it has not that flavour about it that it has when you are not in an internment camp.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I would ask the Minister whether he does not think that particular complaint ought to be investigated, even if Alderman Murphy did not write direct.

The PRESIDENT: I do not promise that I will undertake to investigate a complaint made in that way. First of all, I do not know that Alderman Murphy has made that complaint. I have not had any intimation from him. I saw it on a typewritten sheet, only when I went outside, from a source hostile, and from a source which has no appreciation good, bad or indifferent, of Irish honour. What are we asked to do in this case? Accommodation is to be provided for people who have made their best effort to ruin this country, not to ruin the Free State Government, but to ruin this country; not to ruin the Saorstát, but to drag in the mire the name of Ireland and make it a reproach amongst the nations, and hold up to the whole world a picture of infamy, such as no nation has yet had to hang its head in shame in order to witness. We are asked now to make comfortable happy homes for the people who have destroyed more homes in twelve months than have been destroyed in any other country, in the same period, by the same number, with the same resources as they had got, and who covered themselves with the flag or label that it was a military proposition. We have men serving in the Army of the Saorstát who fought with these men in the old days, who were associated with them in Councils, political organisations, Gaelic League classes, and in every other social, industrial and political movement which has been in operation in this country for a long time. We have ten thousand prisoners, or over that number—prisoners taken when the hot passions of men were aroused, when they saw great national heroes shot before their eyes, and they were the prisoners taken after that. There may have been excesses; I quite admit it. There are bound to be excesses. I have never yet heard of any country in which there were not excesses. I challenge any country to prove that there were less excesses anywhere than there were in this country by troops of the National Army, in any war, in any time, even in the time of the Crusaders.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): I am loath to interrupt any Deputy most of all, the President, but the question in this amendment is not the excesses alleged to be committed by the Army, but the propriety of having Councils to examine places of detention, and I think the President has wandered away from the subject matter of that amendment.

The PRESIDENT: I was seeking to prove that the people who are guarding the prisoners are soldiers, and that it is alleged against them that, in their sober moments when their passions are not aroused, they are guilty of certain acts calculated to make internment worse than imprisonment and calculated to bring discredit and dishonour on the Army and the Government of the country. I went on to show that even in cases where hot blood was aroused on the field of battle they did not commit these excesses and that in the ordinary course of their duties as soldiers at these places of internment it was asking too much to ask us to believe that in their capacity as jailers, or guards, they would commit the excesses which the Deputy says the representatives of the County Councils should investigate.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: On a point of personal explanation I was very far from making any such general charges against the Army as the President has suggested. I said that charges had been made about certain abuses in internment camps, but I made no such sweeping charges as those to which the President has referred.

The PRESIDENT: I was hoping that we were coming to a time in the public life of this country when Deputies, members of the Government, and other people in whom responsibility was reposed by the people would have sufficient moral courage to say "I do not mind that sort of twaddle; I am not going to listen to it." That is my attitude on the question of the prisoners. I have given my reasons for it. I have seen imprisonment. I know, even in the short experience I had, some of the sufferings endured by prisoners—very much greater sufferings than even those alleged by people who have made this propaganda. I know, furthermore, what is an outstanding thing with regard to these sufferings, that the men who went through them were never men to picture them and to draw the attention of the nation to the fact that they had undergone these sufferings. We have come in for considerable criticism by reason of the fact that some deaths occurred. I regret these deaths as much as anybody, as much as any member of any family of any person who has died, but, I submit with great respect, ten thousand men are not kept in any place, in any city, in which deaths do not occur. In the City of Dublin, Deputies know—there are two representatives of the City of Dublin here, an Alderman and a Councillor—what the death rate is in the city. And I know what the conditions are under which certain people in the City of Dublin are living. One person who is now suffering from the effects of imprisonment, and another person who was a prisoner and who is now dead, went with me through the city and visited the nightly lodging-houses, and saw the conditions under which ordinary free citizens live. I know full well that the care and attention which our prisoners are getting at present would be a sort of seventh heaven of delight to those unfortunate persons that I have seen housed under shocking conditions. The Deputy will have to recollect in these cases that the position of the Government is not to say "No," and not to say "Yes" arbitrarily. These unfortunate denizens of these nightly lodging houses have got to pay in their taxes for the upkeep of these prisoners. Yet we are asked to allow inspections by County Councils and County Borough Councils of our jails. I wonder if any of these County Councils or County Borough Councils would take the time to visit the places I mention, and observe the conditions under which free people live in their own bailiwicks and examine their consciences and see what they did to improve these conditions. I know some of them who have done much. I know in the City of Dublin great efforts have been made. I know, furthermore, while great interest has been aroused by propaganda regarding the conditions under which the prisoners are living, that a great many of these prisoners are not to be compared with that other order—I forget the name that Jack London called them, but I think it was the Submerged Tenth. Do these people ever consider that there was a very vast army of people who were unable to help themselves and who were going to be plunged below the submerged tenth down to the submerged twentieth by reason of their activities? I hesitate to believe for a moment that the men at present in the National Army would be guilty of any inhumanity towards prisoners, and I hesitate to believe that the Army Council, constituted as it is, would be guilty of such dereliction of their duty and I am not satisfied that the allegations such as have been made should be noticed to the extent of which they have been noticed. A report has been published from the Red Cross Organisation which makes a claim from their observations that the treatment of these people was all that could be desired. It makes it plain that they did not themselves appreciate their own duties as prisoners. The Deputy will recollect that facilities were afforded for personal cleanliness and that these facilities were not availed of. Is not that an incredible thing to say about idealists? Idealists there are amongst them but any idealists I ever came across were not willing to have posted on the hoardings of the city or published in the columns of the newspapers such slanders on their country, and libels on their own countrymen, to make life easy and comfortable, to make a nation upon which they did such severe wrong liable for making their existence, while in internment, comfortable and happy while they were there.

[The President.]

CATHAL O'SHANNON: With all due respect to the President I do not think he has given reasons why the Dáil should not adopt Deputy Gavan Duffy's amendment. Everybody, or almost everybody who has had prison experience, and a great many who have not had that experience will agree that imprisonment does lend itself to various forms of propaganda, and it is just to be expected that the friends of the prisoners of the President should improve if anything on the friends of the prisoners of the recent past. But is that any reason why, when a suggestion is made that the present Executive should re-adopt in another form, certain provisions of certain previous Acts relating to the visiting by authorised people of the prisons and places of detention under their care—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Authorised by whom?

CATHAL O'SHANNON: By responsible public authorities. All that the President says about the conduct and character of the Army and of that portion of the Army to which is entrusted the guarding of prisoners may be all very well true. I am not questioning it for a moment, but if it is all so true what is the reasonable objection then to the admission of a panel of visitors such as is provided for in this amendment? There is no objection that I can see to it, none whatever. As I remarked the other day, it is not necessarily a reflection either on the conduct or character of the Executive Council or the military authorities that such Visiting Committees should be set up. It is part of the ordinary procedure under the ordinary prison system before the present and recent strife in Ireland. At various times under the British and other Governments they themselves set up not only Committees something similar to those Committees, but actually ad hoc Commissions to inquire into the conduct of prisons when there were complaints that everything was not quite all that it might be in those prisons. None of them ever suggested, I think, that the making of this inquiry by someone independent of the Executive, not employed by the Executive, even if they reported unfavourably on the conditions of persons, really meant that there was a national or wholesale condemnation of that particular Government's conduct in its prison service. In all those things, of course, I quite admit time, circumstances and occasion must be taken into consideration, but I submit that if time, circumstances and occasion are taken into consideration in those matters now that the balance of argument will be in favour of something like what is provided for in the amendment. It is really perhaps only a reversion in another form to a practice elsewhere, and in other and quite recent times. The Executive Council should have nothing to fear from an investigation into these matters; on the contrary, it should have everything to hope from it. If the Executive is in a position, as it feels itself to be in a position, to pat itself on the back because certain visitors from the International Red Cross should visit certain prisoners and did not positively condemn the treatment of those prisoners, how much more to the credit of the Executive Council would it not be if such Committees as these were in the position that they would be allowed to go in and report that everything was good and things nice and proper so far as the Executive Council could make them so? Now, the President has touched all our hearts with his contrast between the conditions in the common lodging houses in Dublin and the prisons. When he referred to them he did not say anything that was new to some of the Deputies here, or anything new to people outside. While I admit he was one of those who did his little bit to help, I want him to remember that there are very many people even in the worst slums in Dublin, even in the worst conditions in Dublin — it is not creditable to Dublin or to Ireland that there should be such a thing; it is not creditable to civilisation anywhere that the prisons, the prison services, and the conditions in prisons in any country should be so far above the conditions which prevail amongst those who are referred to as the Submerged Tenth—who would prefer to die in starvation under the worst conditions rather than to live in comparative ease and comfort and plenitude without their liberty. The President and every other Deputy who has been in a prison knows that no comforts of prison were able to compensate him or anybody else for the loss of liberty, even if that loss of liberty were only for a time. It is not a good reason why he should not accept this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON: We have been urged to pass this Bill a dozen times by references to the desirability of passing from a state of disorder, of armed rebellion, a state of war, to a state of peace, and to make that transit as orderly as possible, and as easy as possible. I submit in accord with that desire that this motion should be supported. During the state of war it was considered necessary by the Executive Council that people should be imprisoned and that there should be no inspection; there should be no access to those prisoners by people outside the prisons, because of the state of war, because of the armed rebellion, because of the danger that would arise from the in-coming and the outgoing of civilians. And let us assume that the Ministry were justified in that contention, in the transit to a state of peace. It is asked that Committees equivalent to Committees which actually exist in time of peace should be established, that some body comparable with the Visiting Justices should be set up by the County Councils to visit internment camps and prisons. That I contend is consistent with the declared intention of the Minister in introducing the Bill to pass as gradually and as easily as possible to a state of normality. The President has emphasised the report of the Red Cross Committees Delegation. While that may be very satisfactory to the President, I really do not think it is a document that ought to give so much satisfaction to him. I would have been much better pleased, and I really expected a much more satisfactory document than that which the President has referred to us, in confirmation of the claim he has made as to the desirable condition of these camps. But really that is not the point. The camps may be perfect; there may not be the shadow of reason for a complaint about the conduct of the camps, but nevertheless it is desirable that the public should have some means of knowing whether that is true or not, even independent of the statement of the Minister. The Minister has just grounds for asking that the public should accept his word, but unfortunately in this imperfect world there is no man whose word is taken absolutely by every person, and in this country there is quite a large proportion of the population doubtful of the statements that have been made on behalf of the Ministry in regard to matters for which the Ministry is responsible. We are all apt to say that the things we are responsible for are all right, that they do not deserve criticism, but rightly or wrongly the public do not take us at our own valuation. And if the Minister wants to have his word in a matter of this kind accepted implicitly, the establishment of Committees of this kind, to confirm his claim, is the way to ensure that the public will have confidence in statements made on behalf of the Executive Council.

[Mr. Johnson.]

No doubt, as Deputy O'Shannon said, there are thousands of people who would be very glad of the accommodation, the attention, the food that is provided to the people in the internment camps, even without going to the people of the abyss, even without going to the Submerged Tenth. There are many people who are giving all their strength for wages, and who are not getting sufficient wages to feed themselves in the way that we are assured the prisoners are fed. But surely that is not the point, surely, it is a reasonable request that in a place where 1,000 prisoners are detained, or 2,000, or 5,000 that somebody representing the public, outside the Executive, should have access to those places, even if only to consider the sanitary conditions. That, too, has been denied, and yet we know that when attention was called here to a glaring case, immediately remedies were found, but they were found because there had been some publicity. It is with a view to securing and assuring that there shall be publicity of grievances, because then the remedy will speedily follow, that it is desirable to embody such a section in the Bill, so that the public, through their representatives, shall have some right of inspection, and that there shall be some contact between the prisoner and the public by means of which a grievance, if it is a well-founded grievance, can be made public. If it has in normal times been found necessary to appoint Justices to visit prisons, when there has been no overcrowding, when there has been no abnormal circumstances attending the imprisonment, surely it is not unreasonable to claim that in abnormal times when there has been admittedly overcrowding, that there should be some public right of supervision over the conditions under which untried prisoners, uncharged prisoners, innocent prisoners in many cases, have been interned.

That is not an extraordinary charge. It is not a want of confidence in the Ministry. It is a reasonable proposition, and it should commend itself to any Government or any assembly which desires to keep proper contact and proper control over matters under its authority and under its administration. The Dáil applauded Deputy McGoldrick to-day when he referred to his faith in the elected representatives of the people. Here is a chance for Deputy McGoldrick and those who support him in that view of proving their faith in the elected representatives of the people, because the County Councils are also the elected representatives of the people.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Elected for what?

Mr. JOHNSON: To look after the conditions of life within their area; to look after the sanitation within their area, to protect the public health within their area.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is well to know that.

Mr. JOHNSON: And in the case of the County Borough of Dublin to appoint prison visitors within their area. That is what they were elected for, and I ask the Minister to have faith in the elected representatives of the people.

The PRESIDENT: I would like to ask the Deputy, if he is aware of any action taken by any of those bodies recently on that particular subject—the election of representatives.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do now know what the President is referring to.

The PRESIDENT: I am referring to the appointment of Justices by local authorities. Is the Deputy aware that on a recent occasion a local authority refused to appoint those representatives?

Mr. JOHNSON: I am not aware of it.

The PRESIDENT: It would be well that the Deputy should know something about these bodies before he talks about them.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister is responsible for those bodies more than I am. The Minister has been a member of one of those bodies, and he knows more about them than I do.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister has not yet had the courage to come to the Dáil and say he is going to abolish all the local bodies. They are elected, and the Minister has brought before this Dáil a Franchise Bill which desires that the same people who elect the Members of the Dáil shall also elect members of the local bodies.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. Fitz-Gibbon): The question of the Franchise Bill cannot arise on this.

Mr. JOHNSON: I agree, but I think the Minister invited that retort.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: I am inclined to agree with you.

The PRESIDENT: It was very handy to put in that retort when there was no answer to my question.

Mr. COLOHAN: I desire to support this amendment to set up Committees to inquire into the state of the prisons and internment camps. I will cite a case that will prove the necessity of these Committees. On the 3rd May last I asked a question of the Minister for Defence about a young lad named Cardwell, 13½ years of age, who was taken out of Naas military barracks, and who was wounded in the neck. The answer I got to that question was:—

“Leo Cardwell was arrested by troops from Naas at his home early on the morning of the 24th April. At the house there were also taken six recently escaped internees, and firearms and ammunition. With the others Cardwell was brought to Naas military barracks at about 9 a.m. on the morning of his arrest. Because of his age, which he gave as 13½ years, it was not intended to detain him and he was kept apart from the others. It would appear that whilst in custody, and some time during the night of the 24th-25th April, he received a slight wound in the neck. In connection with the occurrence a member of the Army is now under arrest awaiting trial by court-martial, for the convening of which steps have already been taken. Pending the result of the trial it is not possible to make a statement as to the facts of the occurrence.”

I have received no information as to how the court-martial went. On the 6th of June I wrote “Will you please let me know the result of the court-martial which was held in connection with the wounding of the boy Leo Cardwell. Also if he has yet recovered from his wound, and if he is likely to be affected with a stiff neck, and if he is now at liberty.”

I got a formal acknowledgment on the following day, 7th June. I wrote on the 22nd June, and I got another formal acknowledgment on the 23rd.

Now what is the use of the Minister speaking about how the prisoners are treated when this young man could be taken out of the barracks at the dead of night and wounded in the neck by one of the military. Then he says there is no necessity for Committees to be appointed to see that everything is right in these internment camps and prisons. Is he afraid that these Committees will find out that what he is saying is not true? If everything is right I cannot see why he should object to these Committees being set up.

Mr. DAY: I also wish to support the amendment. Like other Deputies, I suppose, I am every week receiving what is commonly called propaganda. I do not know how much of it is true or how much of it lies, but I would like to know exactly how much of it is true. Some of this propaganda in connection with the Cork Courthouse came before the Public Health Committee in Cork, of which I am a member. There were very grave allegations made as to the conditions under which the prisoners existed. I am very glad to say—although it was not until after considerable trouble—the medical officer of health in Cork was given permission to visit the place and that he made a fairly satisfactory report as to the conditions. If the medical officer had not been allowed to visit the place and give that report every member of the Public Health Committee, and practically every citizen of Cork would believe that what was contained in that propaganda sheet was the truth. For that reason I say that it is the business of the Government to see that the representatives of the people get at the truth. We want to make the truth heard, and we want to know what amount of truth is contained in this propaganda. There is no member of the Dáil or no member of a County Borough or County Council, I believe, who wishes to know anything but the truth as to the conditions in those places. I myself have got several complaints and I have made application to the General Officer Commanding in Cork for permission to visit.

[Mr. Day.] those places to find out the truth for myself, as I thought it was my duty to do. That permission was refused to me on every occasion. Therefore I could only come to the conclusion that something was absolutely wrong there. The Corporation appointed a Deputation to visit the prison and when the application was made to the General Officer Commanding that permission was also refused. If there had been nothing to conceal why was this permission refused? As public representatives we simply want to know exactly what is going on inside there and what exactly is the position of the prisoners, and to find out for ourselves what amount of truth is contained in this propaganda that was sent out. I know that that is my position anyway. I simply want to know what is the truth and what is false—the statements made from the Ministerial Benches or the statements contained in these propaganda sheets. For that reason I support the amendment.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I would like also to support the amendment, and I regret that the Minister in charge, or the President, is not prepared to accept at least the principle underlying the suggestion, even if they were not prepared to accept the text itself. It may be quite true, of course, that a great many of the stories circulated with regard to the treatment of prisoners are propaganda, but I would be very slow to believe that a man like Alderman Charles Murphy would make the statement that is being circulated—if he has made it—unless there were good foundation for it. I do not pretend to know Alderman Murphy as well as the President or other Deputies do, but I know him moderately well for eight or ten years, and I have always looked on him as a most honourable and upright man who would be incapable of making a statement which he did not believe to be true. We have had other statements also for which there must be some foundation, and whatever justification the Ministry may have felt in the past for refusing visits when the country was in a state of war, conditions are now considerably changed for the better, and they could well afford to give way on that and allow some visiting committee to go in for the purpose of verifying that statement that the prisoners are well and reasonably treated. The President has referred, quite correctly, to the decision of the Dublin Corporation to defer the appointment of visiting justices. That is perfectly true, and if his objection, and the objection of the Minister in charge, is to the precise proposal that these visiting committees should be appointed by the county or borough councils, perhaps the Minister would agree to the principle of some visiting body, and, at a later stage, bring up a proposal that perhaps he himself would nominate a visiting committee, taking care to see that they were persons in whom the public would repose confidence. I would throw out that suggestion for consideration.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Section 13 of this Bill provides: "That an Executive Minister may make regulations prescribing the prisons, internment camps and other places in which persons detained in custody under this Act may be detained; providing for the efficient management control and guarding of such prisons, camps and other places; providing for the enforcement and preservation of discipline amongst the persons so detained; providing for the prevention of the escape of any such person, and prescribing or providing for any other matter or thing relating to the efficient detention of such persons under this Act." I take it that that Section places very definitely the duty upon an Executive Minister of providing for the general efficiency and management of these places of detention. He will be answerable for that duty here to the representatives of the people, not to the representatives of the people, elected for Local Government purposes, but to the representatives elected with a broad national mandate to deal with matters of this kind. Some interesting expressions were used in the debate. "Somebody representing the public," said Deputy Johnson, and then, noticing the start of surprise on this side, he said, "I mean representing the public, outside the Executive." There seemed certainly to be an undercurrent, or an implication, throughout this debate that everyone represented the public except the Executive Council; that a county council represented the public; that even a body whom the county council might nominate would more amply represent the public than the Executive Council of the State or than the Parliament of the State. That is wrong.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is it? Is it wrong?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is quite wrong. Responsible government consists in placing upon a Minister or Ministers primary responsibility for a certain thing, responsibility to the elected representatives of the people, sitting in their Parliament. They should answer for all matters committed to their care—answer fully. If they fail to answer to the satisfaction of the representatives of the people, then the duty of the representatives of the people is clear, but instead of having the fullest discussion and the fullest inquiry here—

Mr. JOHNSON: They never had the means of getting knowledge.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: When did you ever ask for information and not get it?

Mr. JOHNSON: How can we get the basis of our information without access to the prisons?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I do not quite follow the Deputy.

Mr. JOHNSON: The point is that the only kind of information you can get from prisons are these documents, which are alleged to be poisoned. We want to have a chance of getting truthful documents, and then if we find there are grievances we can raise them in the Dáil.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Did you send those documents to the Minister for Defence?

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): These comments back and forward are out of order. The Minister himself invites interruption by putting questions to Deputies.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The county councils and the local bodies generally, were elected for a specific purpose. I do not know what the general view of the Deputies or of the public is as to the manner in which these duties are being performed but, at any rate, their duties are specified and well defined, and personally, I question greatly the wisdom of adding to their duties what is really the proper function of a responsible Executive Government. Let us consider the county councils and ask ourselves, whether, in the existing conditions, they are proper bodies to entrust this function to. Five-sixths of the County Council of Kerry have been out in arms against the Executive Government of the State, elected by the people and responsible to the people, and they, forsooth, are to appoint a Committee of Inspection. If the county councils and the local bodies generally, concentrate on the particular duties for which they were elected I think that they will win general satisfaction and general approbation from the people. Deputy O'Brien asked for some acceptance of the principle that there should be inspection. Regulations will be made under Section 13. Personally, I see no objection to the principle of selected men, not in a paid capacity, being appointed by the Executive to visit places of this kind, but their appointment should be by the Executive and their reports to the Executive. This matter of the proper care and treatment of prisoners is Executive action, and such inspection of these places that takes place should be on behalf of the Executive. Deputies have insisted on talking as if the position here were what it was four or five years ago; they have persistently in their comments on this amendment, ignored the change; they have said "Whatever the British thought it right or expedient to do you should think it right or expedient to do."

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Not except it was right in itself.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It may have been right in the particular set of conditions then, and it need not be right now. It may have been necessary or advisable in a particular set of conditions, and not necessary or not advisable now. The whole Executive machinery of this country is responsible now to the people of the country, through the people's representatives. There is not a single phase or aspect of administration which you are not entitled to raise, question and criticise here. If the matter of conditions within detention camps were raised here—if it had been raised, say, any time this six months past—do Deputies really believe that the Minister for Defence would have withheld or refused the fullest of full reports thereon?

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Surely that is his particular function, amongst other functions for which he was appointed by this Dáil, and for which he is responsible to the Dáil. To suggest you should seek your information, not from him, but from some County Council, some local authority which is appointed, and select people at random from within these areas to visit a detention camp, well, that is simply a reversal of responsible Government, and simply consists in saying that local bodies elected for a very different purpose throughout the country shall, so to speak, be set to act as spies upon your Executive, and report to you as to the result. That is a position which I certainly will not accept in principle, or as it stands in the amendment. I do, as I say, accept this, that responsible citizens selected by the Executive, and not paid by the Executive, shall visit these places and report.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

Mr. O'BRIEN: May I ask the Minister would he limit the selection of such persons to supporters of the Government—that is to say would he propose to exclude from such Visiting Committees persons who might not be supporters of the Government?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I do not know what the Deputy means by "supporters of the Government." Supposing the duty of selection lay on me, I would not think of selecting people who approved of armed revolt against the Government, or of people who approved of outrages such as the burning of homes.

Mr. O'BRIEN: No; but, say, people who believed in the establishment of a Republic, and in whom prisoners have confidence, and who would not approve of the outrages or attacks. Would he approve of the appointment of a Labour member of the Dáil, for example?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I want to be quite frank with the Deputy. There are certain offences set out in the schedule of this Bill, and I would not dream of appointing any person who I thought had any sympathy whatever with these offences. It is not a political matter, but sympathy with any of these acts or these crimes would, to my mind, automatically exclude for selection any person. But, if the Deputy means this, and I think he does, that a decent law-abiding responsible citizen ought to be eligible for selection utterly regardless of his political views, then I think that that ought to be the case.

Mr. DAVIN: Deputy O'Brien has asked the Minister a very definite question as to whether or not he would exclude from such a Committee, a Labour member of the Dáil. That question has not been answered.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It could not be answered specifically. If persons were being selected they would not be selected qua a Labour member of the Dáil, but would be selected qua responsible law-abiding citizens.

Mr. DAVIN: The refusal of the Minister to answer that direct question could be taken that we would be regarded as sympathetic to armed revolt.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: As a matter of fact, this questioning backwards and forwards to the Minister is quite irregular. It does not arise on this amendment. The Minister, in replying on the motion for the amendment, said that when he came to Section 13 he was quite prepared to appoint a visiting committee. It is quite irregular to cross-examine him now as to what the constitution of that committee would be, and certainly nothing he said was capable of the interpretation that he regarded any Deputy or Deputies as sympathising with crime.

Mr. DAVIN: I take it that there is no difference of opinion as to whether or not any member of the Dáil could be regarded as other than a law-abiding citizen. I am one of those persons who have been in receipt of the propaganda referred to, but for obvious reasons I have never mentioned the matter in the Dáil before. The Minister asked did we send this particular class of propaganda to the Minister for Defence. Well, I took it for granted that the propaganda referred to was received by every member of the Dáil, and by the Minister for Defence himself.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I never saw it.

Mr. DAVIN: However, even though the propaganda has not been received by the Minister himself, I am sure that he would desire that every possible ground for the removal of such complaints should be put on the one side, and that any such complaint coming to his notice, or to the notice of the Minister for Defence, should be inquired into. It appears to be the case that as every member of the Government party seems to be satisfied with the Minister's explanation, they are in possession of other information, or have access to the places where these complaints are made, and in that way have some information at their disposal, or means of inquiry into these things, that we in these benches have not. We are, as far as I can see, here on sufferance, and can only get statements on these matters out of the Ministry by making a complaint, and in some cases do not succeed in getting the actual information looked for. That complaints are justified is, I think, beyond dispute. We had a case referred to here the other day by Deputy Everett, regarding the treatment of prisoners in Wicklow jail, and it was only as a result of that complaint, and not before, that the actual matter referred to was settled. I understand in that particular case the prisoners have since been removed to a place perhaps somewhat better than the place where they were complaining of their treatment. I would like to say that every reasonable ground for suspicion should be removed, but most of the clauses put a premium on suspicion. Many suggestions have been made in the various amendments for the purpose of having a better check over things such as have happened in the past, but every such suggestion has been turned down by the Ministry, and when made by us is taken as a vote of no confidence in the Executive Council.

Now I think that is not the right spirit in which an amendment with that intention should be received by the Minister. I say that because a case like the Wicklow case has only been dealt with after complaint. I think it is up to the Ministry to make a reasonable provision that such cases should not occur again and by accepting an amendment of this kind they would be making reasonable provision for such cases.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The Minister rather deprecated the appointment of these Committees by such bodies as County Councils rather than by bodies such as would be set up by the Dáil or the Executive Council. He dealt, rather sharply I think, with Deputy Johnson upon that. He does not think it right that the County Councils should be considered as proper bodies for selecting such Committees as this. He instanced a procession of circumstances in connection with County Councils and particularly he quoted the Kerry County Council. Now the Kerry County Council is not a fair case because, unless I am very much mistaken, the Kerry County Council is in suspense and is not functioning owing to the activities of certain of its members. But legally and according to regulations approved and passed by this Dáil the heirs to the Co. Council of Kerry would be empowered by this amendment, if adopted, to appoint such Committees. The same would apply to any other County Council or Borough Council that happened to be suspended by the operations of another Act of the Dáil. Now I suppose that the legitimate heirs to the Kerry County Council, and to other suspended County Councils, would be entitled to make these appointments. There may be some doubt about that, but, at any rate, the argument of the suspended County Councils does not apply at all by any means. It is quite true, as the Minister says, that the circumstances of the times might make it advisable at one time to do a certain thing that may not be possible under the regime to-day. Quite true. Some of us are of opinion that an Act which might have been inadvisable, unwise and not justified six or twelve months ago might be quite advisable and wise enough and, from the point of view of public policy, justified now. I suggest to the Minister that he should take that point into consideration.

MR. LYONS: I am sure that Ministers who supported the Minister for Home Affairs, and also the Deputies who supported him in asking for an all-night sitting did so in the interests of the passing of this Bill, and they now show that interest by absenting themselves from the Dáil during our discussions. Deputy O'Shannon's last speech on this Bill was not heard by any of the Ministers because they were absent, and was followed by very few Deputies on the Ministerial Benches. I am not going at this hour to criticise those who ask for an all-night sitting, but I want to point out a few facts in support of this amendment of Deputy Gavan Duffy. It is intended to give power to the County Councils so that the Minister may be able to take into his confidence the duly elected representatives of the people in the County Councils. If the Government are anxious to get the Bill through before morning one would imagine that the Government Benches would be packed with Deputies. We are here on these benches to a man ready to defend any amendment put forward by Deputy Gavan Duffy. Now with regard to the actual subject raised by this amendment the President declared that half the unfortunate people living outside in lodging houses were worse off than the prisoners interned.

[Mr. Lyons.]

Mr. DUGGAN: Are they not?

Mr. LYONS: There is a great deal of argument for and against. I think it is perfectly right, if Deputies hold that people outside are worse off than the prisoners, that this amendment should be accepted, and that their dwellings should also be inspected by Committees appointed by some such authority as the County Councils. This amendment does not suggest anything that the promoters of the Bill should fear; there should be nothing to fear from the people of the Saorstát if everything is as stated by the President, and by the Minister for Home Affairs. Why then not agree to this amendment? It would look as if there was something to fear, and that there was something wrong.

If the prisoners are treated as explained by the Ministers then there can be nothing to fear. So far as he is concerned he can allow any committee appointed by anybody to inquire into these matters. But we find that the Minister is up against allowing any committee to be appointed, or giving any Committee an opportunity of visiting the prisoners, and of seeing that doctors and sanitary officers and other officers requiring to visit these prisoners have the privilege of doing so.

Surely, the County Councils are bodies of men that could be trusted? If we can possibly get the Minister for Home Affairs to accept any amendment that will improve this Bill I am sure that our night's work here will not be in vain, but we find that the supporters of the Minister are just as hard and unreasonable as the Minister himself. It appears that the Minister will not accept the principle of this amendment unless he is able to assure himself that the persons who will be appointed under it are law-abiding citizens of the Saorstát. Furthermore he is so strongly against the appointment of these County Council Committees that I am of opinion he imagines that the County Councils want to make a job out of these Committees and appoint some people who will have to be paid. I hope that is really not the view of the Minister, and that he will give the members of the County Councils the right to appoint these Committees. I can assure Deputies on the benches opposite, that there are patriotic men among the County Councils of this country. The people selected the County Councillors as they did the members of this Dáil. The members of the Executive seem to think that they are the employers of the people, but they would soon find that the people are really their masters. The people are sovereign and the day will come when they will prove they are the masters of the members of the Executive Council as well as of the members of the Dáil. I support this amendment, because it gives a facility to the County Councils to see to the welfare of the prisoners, and because it classifies them as genuine citizens of the State. It gives them an opportunity to visit prisoners interned in their areas. The amendment provides that it shall be the duty of every County Council within whose area persons are detained in custody without trial under this Bill to appoint a Committee consisting of such number of persons of good standing in the locality as the Council shall deem necessary, etc.; it places a duty upon this Committee and it specifies that duty which amounts to this that it will advise the Minister for Home Affairs or the Minister for Local Government or some other members of the Executive Council with regard to the treatment of prisoners.

That does not in the least take the power out of the hands of the Executive Council. If we are going to classify, or if, in your opinion, you think this amendment ought to classify county councillors as law-abiding citizens, then if you did that you should certainly accept this amendment. In speaking of the County Councils I was going to say you have thirty-two. I am sorry we have only twenty-six, but we are looking forward to the time when we will have thirty-two and when we will be all together again. But out of twenty-six County Councils you mention one Council that seemed to have advised people to take up arms against the Government selected by the majority of the people of this Saorstát—

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): Deputy Lyons has now considerably exceeded his time allowance. He has spoken far beyond the time limit. I thought a little time ago he would finish his peroration.

Mr. MILROY: I want to congratulate the last speaker upon the brevity and lucidity of his speech—

Mr. LYONS: On a point of order I think I have the floor still.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: The Standing Order says "that in Committee no Deputy shall speak more than ten minutes at a time." You have spoken fifteen minutes.

Mr. LYONS: Well, I will allow Deputy Milroy to go on for the sole purpose of getting another ten minutes later on.

Mr. MILROY: I do not want to interrupt the proceedings, but I simply could not allow the occasion to pass without congratulating the last Deputy upon the brevity of his remarks, in view of the fact that it was he suggested that we should continue our discussion to a late hour to-morrow morning, when he said that the speeches on this side of the Dáil would not in any way impede the progress of legislation.

Mr. LYONS: Neither will they.

Mr. MILROY: I want also to compliment the Deputy upon the lucidity of his remarks. They are so lucid that when he sat down I think a few of us really understood what was the drift of his remarks.

Mr. O'BRIEN: I believe you.

Mr. MILROY: There is one other point I want to make, and it has not been made by anybody else—

Mr. JOHNSON: By anybody else?

Mr. MILROY: Wait until I make my point. The point I want to make is this:—that the Deputies on the other side of the Dáil seem to fail to realise that they are sitting in an Irish Parliament.

Mr. LYONS: So they might when you have Bills like this.

Mr. MILROY: They seem to think that they are sitting in the benches in the English House of Commons facing Sir Hamar Greenwood instead of facing an Irish Minister. The discussion to-night in regard to this measure, and this amendment, seems to be absolutely in a world apart from realities. The Minister who is in charge of this Bill has only one consideration, that is to preserve the security of life and liberty in this country. Every utterance from the other side of the Dáil seems to be based on the belief that he was concerned with assailing life and liberty in this country. The remarks from the other side of the Dáil would have been very pertinent to a discussion of this kind if they had been confronting the British Ministry in the English House of Commons. Let them remember that they are sitting in an Irish Parliament, and that those whom they are attacking and criticising are the custodians of order and government, of life and liberty in this country, and let them adapt their arguments and their criticism to that fundamental fact.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The Deputies on this side of the Dáil realise the fact quite as well as Deputy Milroy. If I may be allowed to say so they have been directing their criticism and their comments and their suggestions to the Bill before the Dáil, and not at all to the Minister, either as a person or as a Minister, except in so far as he happens to be a Minister who is in charge of the Bill during its course through the Dáil. It is ridiculous nonsense for any Deputy to suggest that we here forget that we are in an Irish Parliament, and that we are not facing the gentleman to whom he refers. But we are not prepared, and I hope that no party and no section that ever gains representation in the Dáil will ever be prepared, to neglect the first duty of public representatives, and that is to give close and careful examination to every measure that comes before the Dáil, and to assist, as we are endeavouring to assist the Ministry of the day, in producing a measure that will be satisfactory. The Deputy's remarks have not at all been addressed to the amendment before the Dáil. I am not going so far as to say that his remarks were quite out of order. But I can quite understand that he felt he had got something to say and he wanted to say it. Now we would have welcomed a reasoned and fair, or even a little beyond fair, criticism of any of the points that have been made on this side in support of the amendment, if that Deputy or any Deputy had made an effort to reply. But no, he did not do anything of the kind. He leaves it all to the Ministry. And then, because some of us have the damnable audacity to attempt to assist the Minister we are accused of something that in certain periods in Irish history were considered not very creditable to Irishmen..

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Mr. JOHNSON: Deputy Milroy has broken the spell. We have been accused on this side of doing something which was only worthy to be done in the British House of Commons, and he reminded us that we were not facing Sir Hamar Greenwood. Sir Hamar Greenwood even with all his enormities did not venture to introduce into the British House of Commons any Bill giving to the Executive, against the people, half of the power which is embodied in this Bill.

Mr. MILROY: Against the people.

Mr. JOHNSON: Against the people.

Mr. MILROY: This is for the protection of the people.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is the opinion of the Minister. I am quoting my own opinion—that the power that is given in this Bill to the Minister is against the people.

Mr. MILROY: What people?

Mr. JOHNSON: The Deputy has one notion of responsible government, and we have heard another theory of responsible government from the Minister, both of which are very interesting and very extraordinary. The Minister has only one consideration—to preserve the life and liberty of the people. Because of that, therefore, the Dáil must say, "ditto." The Dáil must not open its mouth. The Dáil must not utter one word of criticism, because the Minister in charge of the Bill has only one consideration—to preserve the life and liberty of the people.

Mr. MILROY: Hear, hear..

Mr. JOHNSON: It has often been said that the road to hell is paved with those good intentions. I venture to say that Deputies have in the past held the view that their business was to realise they had a responsibility to their constituents, and to express their views even though they were in criticism of the views of the Minister. Surely, we are not at that stage that because the Minister has good intentions, everything that these good intentions leads to must be wise and beneficent? It is an utterly false doctrine. We have a right to assume that the intentions of every member of the Dáil are good and just as well-intentioned as those of the Minister; but if we differ in the practical application of those good intentions, are we to be freed from criticism? The good intentions are not going to save the Minister from criticism, and good intentions are not going to save a Bill from being examined. Deputy Milroy should not pretend that he thinks because one Minister is sacrosanct, every other Deputy must bow down and worship.

Mr. MILROY: I do not think any Minister is sacrosanct.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am glad you agree with me in that.

Mr. MILROY: The Ministers are quite aware that I have no such delusions about their infallibility—

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): Or sacrosanctity.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is one thing Deputy Milroy and I can agree upon, and that is that one would hope to hear in this Assembly, the organ of public expression, that those views of Deputy Milroy would occasionally find expression. I want to deal seriously with the question raised by Deputy O'Brien. He suggested as a reasonable modification of this amendment that the Minister might himself nominate a committee of inspection which would have the confidence of the people generally, and the Minister agreed with the principle; he said that such a committee would be required to report to the Minister. I am not sure whether that was intended to be exclusive, or whether it was to be a report to the Minister as a matter of form and order, and that the report would in the normal course of affairs be made public. If the Minister grants that I would advise the Dáil to accept that suggestion, but if, on the contrary, it is not intended to publish these reports, then there is nothing gained. The whole point of this amendment is, as I understand it, to ensure that public confidence shall reside in the conduct of the servants of the State, and especially those who are in charge of the prison camps, and that public confidence can only be ensured when there is some supervision, and when the reports of such supervisors as may be appointed can be made public. I do not want to delay the Dáil by dealing to any extent with the County Councils; but one cannot refrain from asking Deputies when did they lose their faith in the County Councils? I think Deputy Milroy will remember, and surely the President will remember, that the County Councils were to be the units out of which were to be formed the National Council. It was to be the basis of the legislative authority. But now none so poor as do them reverence. I wonder what was the date of this loss of faith. Was it the date of the last election for which Deputies were so closely responsible when they knew from first-hand knowledge what they were doing? I want to say on this that I would not like it to appear even with any stretch of the imagination that there was any desire on these benches to act dilatorily or to delay the Dáil. We are honestly desirous of discussing this measure thoroughly and carefully, and to amend and improve it. The sooner that can be done the better we shall all be pleased, and I think, perhaps, the President can rely on the Deputies sitting on the opposite benches, judging by precedent, and I hope no Deputies sitting on these benches will even give an excuse for Deputies to think that they are acting in a dilatory fashion.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: Never, never.

Mr. JOHNSON: We do desire to amend this Bill. We have put down a series of amendments that have been carefully thought over, that are honestly intended to improve the measure, and I hope the Dáil will give thorough consideration to them. I trust it will not be thought that because Deputies here are obliged in the absence of any contrary argument to continue the discussion for the purpose of enlightening the Dáil, that there is any desire to obstruct the ordinary legislative machine.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Before the

Dáil votes on this matter, I should like very briefly to deal with two points made by the Minister for Home Affairs. I need not deal with what the President said because he was very completely disposed of by that other very great artist—Deputy Lyons. The Minister for Home Affairs deprecated the idea of allowing prisons to be visited by persons appointed by the Kerry County Council. This proposal does not speak of the Kerry County Council, but of the County Councils in whose areas these established internment camps are situated, such as Gormanstown, the Curragh, and so forth. My impression is that all these established camps are situated in areas where the Government is very thoroughly in control and in areas where nothing can be said against the County Council, such as has been said by the Minister against the Kerry County Council. The Minister before he volunteered to accept the proposal in principle to a certain degree argued that it was not necessary on the grounds that in this Dáil from the Ministers here we could get all the information necessary. The Minister is under a complete misapprehension if he thinks that the case given by the Labour Benches is unusual. I will give him another. Two or three weeks ago I wrote to the Minister for Defence in connection with the death in prison of a Doctor who was a member of the last Dáil. I wrote privately in order that it should not be said that this was a matter of making propaganda. The circumstances connected with the death as to the non-admission of the wife and relatives were circumstances which required explanation, and I wrote fully to the Minister. I had a very courteous reply to the effect that the matter would receive attention, but I had nothing more. Another Deputy asked a question on the subject in the Dáil a day or two ago, and got a very inadequate and unsatisfactory reply. That is just an instance to add to the other instances that have been given in order the Ministers may realise that if they think they are doing justice to complaints in connection with prisons and detention camps they are labouring under a delusion. Matters of that kind ought to be dealt with promptly. I am unable to get information which one would think would be volunteered very readily, and with all possible speed. The Minister gave an undertaking of a somewhat vague character. I do not profess to know how far he committed himself, but he did not altogether object to inspection from outside, and he contemplated persons who would have a right to go into the prison. If that is the Minister's frame of mind I would invite him to agree to get fit and proper persons to undertake that work. If the County Councils are not allowed to undertake it, it should be the members of this Dáil who are medical men. Yet can I be blamed if I have misunderstood the Minister's undertakings when I recollect that only yesterday a proposal to depute members of this Dáil and of the Seanád who are medical men, nearly all of whom are strong supporters of the Government, was vehemently objected to by some Ministers? If these are not proper persons to inspect, who are? If these are not proper people to allow to go into the detention camps, whom shall you consider proper persons? In these circumstances and owing to the vague manner in which the Minister dealt with questions from the Labour Benches as to the character of persons he would allow to inspect the prisons, I cannot accept the assurance he has given as being anything like satisfactory.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

The PRESIDENT: May I intervene to explain that there are few people in this Dáil or outside of it who have a longer experience of the business of local authorities than I have. I understood that my business in connection with local authorities was concerned with matters which affected local authorities. I would remind the Deputy who has just spoken and who is perhaps the greatest of all artists either in this or any other assembly, that the roads of this country are a very serious consideration for the County Councils and when they master that and if we are lax in our duties and responsibilities and in the particular things which concern us here—

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Do I understand the President to suggest that the prisoners will remain in prison until the roads are made right?

The PRESIDENT: I say if we are not capable of discharging the duties of our office it will be for the County Councils to take on the extra work and assume responsibility where we are deficient. Apart from the roads there is the question of rates, and apart from the rates in the County Council which the Deputy instanced there is a grave state of civil commotion. What have been the efforts of the particular County Council in question. Did they concern themselves with matters of vital importance to themselves? If any damage has been done there the County Council, or their successors, will have to levy rates but in the plenitude of their administrative capacity they find time to tell us how to do our work and correct the omissions and incapacity of the Ministry. We do not require it. I have a recollection, Sir, that on the last occasion when I was a member of a local authority a question arose as to the appointment of Visiting Justices—that is what they were called at the time—gentlemen who had taken the oath of allegiance to Deputy Gavan Duffy's friend.

Mr. JOHNSON: Name.

The PRESIDENT: And the late Minister for Finance, God rest his soul, sent down word that he did not see any objection to appointing them, but the Minister for Home Affairs sent down a message that we might not appoint them. The one, I expect, is reaping the result of his labours; the other is one of our guests; and if he did not consider that the prisoners held by the foreigner should be provided with visitors at that time, what right has he now, or anyone on his behalf, to ask us to appoint visitors to see how he is getting on wherever he is at this moment?

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 13; Níl, 42.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás MacEoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Séamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghair.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Deasamhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Maolmuire Mac Eochadha.
Earnán Altún.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hOgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.

Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bultin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Séamus de Burea.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.
Croistoir Ó Broin.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. WILLIAM O'BRIEN: I move to report progress.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am afraid I could not agree to that suggestion.

Mr. LYONS: I second that motion.

Motion made and question put to report progress.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 13; Níl, 42.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás MacEoin.
Maolmuire Mac Eochadha.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Séamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghair.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Deasamhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Aifric Ó Broin.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hOgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.

Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Croistoir Ó Broin.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bultin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Séamus de Burea.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.

Motion declared lost.

Amendment 34.—"In sub-section 1, line 18, to delete the words 'death or'"

CATHAL O SEANAIN: Ba mhaith liom iarraidh ar an Dáil glacadh leis an leas rún seo agus na focla "death or" a bhaint amach as. Baineann an rún leis an pionús atá ceapaithe i gcóir coirthe airithe. Is é mo thuairim nach cheart san am seo do'n lá an pionús seo a choimeád san roinn seo. Táim in aghaidh an phionús seo san áit seo, ar a lán cúiseanna. B'feidir go bhfuil gádh le pionús mar seo anois agus arís acht, mar sin féin, pionús barbarach atá ann. Ní feidir le duine ar bith a rádh gur cóir nó gur ceart duine a chur chun bháis no iarraidh ar dhuine eile duine a chur chun bháis. Tig beatha ó Dhia agus ní cheart do dhuine beatha a bhaint fhád's nach feidir leis í a chruthú. Mar sin fein, caithfidh mé admháil gur riachtnach, corr-uair, daoine a chur chun bháis. Acht do réir mo thuairime ní ceart an pionús mór seo a chur ar dhuine fhád agus tá pionús níos lúgha fóirstineach do'n choir. Is é mo thuairim gur maith an prinsiapiol é gan níos mó pionús a chur ar dhuine na an pionús atá fóirstineach do'n choir. Táim cinnte gur leór an pionús eile atá ins an roinn seo agus ar an adhbhar sin nach bhfuil gádh le pionús an bháis. Iarraim ar an Dáil na focla seo a bhaint as an Bhille.

In moving the deletion of the words "death or" in line 18 of sub-section 1, section 5, I am asking the Dáil to remove from the scale of penalties prescribed in the Bill the death penalty. The section, as a whole, lays down the punishment for offences in the Schedule. The first portion lays down the punishment of death or penal servitude for any term, not less than three years, for any person found guilty on indictment of any of the offences mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule. Now, while on principle opposed to the death penalty—the most terrible penalty that can be exacted by any State or community—I admit freely and frankly that there are occasions and there may be offences for which the commonsense or, perhaps, the sense of expediency of society, has found that the death penalty would be, if not the right penalty, at least the advisable penalty.

An LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage took the Chair.

* Mr. O'SHANNON: For all that, I think the penalty on the whole is a relic of barbarism. I am strongly convinced that it can be only justified if no alternative penalty is sufficient to meet the case. If there is an alternative penalty, then that alternative penalty should be applied and not this particular penalty. The same principle, I think, holds good for other penalties. The penalty should not be excessive for any offence. If there is any alternative to the penalty of penal servitude for a particular offence, and if it happens that the penalty of penal servitude is too heavy a penalty, then the lighter penalty is the one which should properly be imposed. Sub-section 1 prescribes the death penalty for the offences mentioned in Part I of the Schedule. They are all offences connected with armed revolt against the State. There are times when armed revolt against the State results in actions which take away the lives of citizens—perhaps of innocent non-combatant citizens, perhaps of combatant citizens, enrolled for the defence of the State.

There are other times when the offences mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule do not result, and perhaps may not be likely to result in the loss of life. There are known to history, and in the experience of States, insurrections and even rebellions that have not resulted in the loss of life. In such cases I hold that the death penalty should not be exacted. The Sub-section permits the exaction of the death penalty even where life has not been taken by revolvers against the State, and I think that is conceivable even where the loss of life is not threatened, or at all events not immediately or directly threatened by the revolt against the State. For that reason I think it is wrong in policy, and wrong in principle, to keep the death penalty in this Section. I think there is sufficient authority under other Statutes for the exaction of the death penalty when the death penalty is justified. I do not think as yet that it is justified in this particular Section, and I ask the Dáil to remove it from the Section.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I do not propose to accept the amendment which the Deputy has moved. Every State reserves to itself the power of life and death in such circumstances, and to deal with such occurrences as are mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule. It seems to me to be unnecessary to argue the matter. Deputies are aware that we, ourselves, at an early stage of our existence as a State have felt compelled to resort to the death penalty. I think we would be unwise to abandon that power. I merely draw Deputies' attention to the fact that the death penalty in this case is not mandatory but permissive; that on indictment a person found guilty of the offences mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule could be sentenced to death or to any lesser penalty.

MR. O'CONNELL: There is one point I would like to draw attention to, and it is that all the matters mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule are matters which arise out of, and are incidental to, a state of war existing in the country. This is a Bill giving powers to the civil authorities who will deal with its administration. Whatever argument may be put forward to justify the military authorities in the course of quelling an armed rebellion or an armed revolt in exacting the death penalty, no such argument, I maintain, holds good in this case. If the offences mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule are being committed, then it can be held that a state of war exists in the country, and the military authorities will be competent to deal with that state of war, and to take measures, even the extreme measure of exacting the death penalty, to deal with that particular situation. I think it is extremely objectionable that when the civil authorities come to deal with these cases that this power should be given to them in the Bill for the offences specified.

MR. FITZGIBBON: This section really adds nothing, or practically nothing, to the existing law. The death penalty is applied only to the three offences in Part I. of the Schedule. Every one of these offences is treason against the State, and that is a crime for which the death penalty has always been inflicted. There are no improper or irregular courts to try these cases, because this Clause provides that if any person found guilty on indictment—that means that he is indicted and tried by a jury of his fellow-countrymen—does not deserve the extreme penalty, then in that case if the Judge thinks fit that the extreme penalty ought to be inflicted, I do not know what other punishment we could really impose. If the person was tried, not by indictment for offences under this Bill, but tried on indictment for treason and found guilty of treason against the State, the judge would have no option but to order him to be hanged. But under this Bill you allow him to get off by a lesser penalty if it is thought that a lesser penalty would serve the case, and there is a provision to send a man to penal servitude for three years. It seems to me that this Clause is really an amelioration of the existing law so far as these three offences are concerned. It is to be remembered, too, that the prisoner will be tried by a jury of his own fellow-countrymen, and not by an extraordinary tribunal.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I am sorry I cannot agree with Deputy Fitz-Gibbon in his argument. The offences mentioned in Part I. of the Schedule are undoubtedly of the nature of treason against the State, but it is not, I believe, the fact that treason against the State is always punished by the death penalty. It may be that in many States persons found guilty on the charge of treason against the State are liable to the death penalty. No doubt the Section is permissive, as the Deputy points out, and is not mandatory. But, why then have it inserted in this particular Bill? Sufficient provision is already made elsewhere by other Statutes for the infliction of the death penalty, under Statutes that are in a way permanent Statutes. This Bill, if we accept all the statements of all the Ministers, and of those who support it, is temporary and transitory. Why then is it necessary that it should be provided for here? I do seriously submit that there are times and occasions when a verdict of guilty pronounced by a Judge on the finding of a jury in a case of treason against the State should not be punishable by the death penalty. If there is an alternative that will carry out the purpose of the State, and of the State authorities, I submit that that alternative ought to be adopted, and not the extreme penalty. The only argument in favour of such a penalty is the argument of necessity, and I submit that time, circumstances, and occasions are factors by which we must judge of the necessity. All through the discussions on this Bill I have maintained that if it is to serve any useful purpose whatever, that purpose is to make easy that passage from war, or a kind of war, to peace. For that reason I am strongly of opinion that nothing that is not intended to be done, and nothing that is superfluous or unnecessary, should be brought into the Bill at all, but that everything that is possible should be done to make the transition easier and to help to restore public confidence and public tranquility, and to remove suspicion and distrust. Now, the infliction of the death penalty can only be as a deterrent or as a punishment. I think we have had enough experience in this country to know that, on the whole, the death penalty as a deterrent, or as punishment, has not been a glorious success. It may be claimed that recent executions have crushed an insurrection. I beg still to doubt that. I believe that the insurrection has been crushed largely because of its own inherent wrongness, and not because a particular measure was adopted against certain of its adherents. It is a fact well known in the experience of States, and in political experience generally, that the infliction of the death penalty for political offences, so far from being a deterrent, has rather acted as an irritant, and has helped to continue and to perpetuate actions against States which might otherwise have not been taken. I do seriously submit that in this period, when to a considerable extent, if passions are not exactly dying down, violence against the State is dying down, that it is a wrong time to dangle before the minds of the people this particular penalty.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Mr. JOHNSON: I wish to draw the attention of the Dáil to what is embodied in this sub-section. "Any person found guilty on indictment of any of the offences may be sentenced to suffer 'death.'" Amongst the offences mentioned are attempting to threaten a person in furtherance of armed revolt. I think it is unwise to empower a Judge to inflict the death penalty for that offence, because it is so difficult to prove an attempt to threaten a person in furtherance of an armed revolt. It is almost impossible to prove an attempt to threaten. You might be able to prove the threatening, but to prove an attempt at threatening, I submit that is very difficult. It must be a hidden thing, if it is only an attempt to threaten, and that, I submit, is a matter which it would be difficult to prove.

There is also a penalty for attempting to remove any property in furtherance of such revolt. That is much easier to prove than an attempt to threaten, but I submit it is not a crime of such enormity as to warrant the infliction of the death penalty or, the power to inflict the death penalty. The range of offences even in the three paragraphs of Part I. of the Schedule, all of which offences may subject the offender to the death penalty, is so wide that I think the deletion of the two words proposed ought to be accepted. We are not dealing with the Schedule, but inasmuch as the paragraph sought to be amended directs attention to the Schedule and to all the offences in the Schedule, and as some of these offences are of a comparatively minor nature, I would ask the Minister to accept the amendment, and to remove the death penalty from this Bill.

Mr. DAVIN: This Bill, as has already been explained, makes provision for dealing with offences during the transition period, the period between the time when the people acted before they thought, and the period we are now passing through, when the people will think before they act again.

It is quite obvious from the action which the Government has taken during the latter stages of the recent trouble when a state of war might have been said to have been going on, and when the Government for any reasons did not carry out the execution policy in the case of some very responsible leaders who fell into their hands, that that was a proof at any rate that the policy of executions was not the best policy in the interests of the Government itself. I think that is one reason why for this short period, when there is some hope that the same thing will not happen again, this thing should not be dangled before the eyes of this country. The Clause is undoubtedly permissive. I think it is a very unwise policy now when we should have some hope of a brighter outlook that this thing should be brought up again. The Minister said it was unnecessary to argue the matter and that it would be unwise to abandon the power, which I take it is maintained in the existing law, in respect of any clause which may be inserted in the Bill which is only for a temporary period. The Minister should take into consideration that many of the things which are mentioned in the First Schedule and defined here are things which were encouraged by themselves during the last four of five years. I think that in the hurry of legislation, people who have done wrong and have admitted that they have done wrong, or whose leaders have admitted the unwisdom of the policy adopted, should be allowed some time to think before it will be assumed that they are going to act again in the same way that they have acted for the last 8 or 9 months. I think it is unwise in the present transition period and when things are said to be normal to bring forward a measure of this kind to deal with the situation when the necessity does not exist for the putting up of such legislation.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 13, Níl, 38.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás MacEoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Eabhróid.

Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac u' Bháird.
Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Staincas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Eamán Altún.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hOgáin.

Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Níoeuill.
Piaras Béasláí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Crundhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghlin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bullín.
Seamus Ó Dólaín.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Eamán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Maolmhuire Mac Eochadha.

Amendment declared lost.

(At this stage An Ceann Comhairle resumed the Chair).

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I beg to move "in subsection 2, line 22, to substitute the word 'may' for the word 'shall.'"

The subsection as it stands prescribes one single high water mark of punishment for all the crimes that are in Part II. and whether the person convicted is guilty of the extreme crime of having possession without lawful authority of firearms with intent to use them, arson, or the comparatively trivial offences of aiding and abetting in the sale of illicit liquor, he must get one cast-iron penalty of hard labour for 12 months or of a fine of £50 or in default of payment, hard labour for a further term of six months. It seems to me altogether beyond all reason to ladle out one common penalty which cannot be carried up or down for all the offences in this Schedule in Section 2, from the most guilty down to the most technical crime of aider or abetter. I think some discretion ought to be left to the Court of summary jurisdiction before whom the man is tried, that where they are satisfied the guilt is a technical one they ought not to be compelled to inflict this extreme penalty which they ought to be bound to inflict on the most guilty person or the most hardened criminal. I am sure what was in the mind of the framers of the Bill was a desire to relieve those Courts of Summary Jurisdiction from the responsibility of having to inflict heavy penalties and a desire to place that responsibility upon the shoulders of this Dáil by suggesting that we should state these were to be the penalties and the Judge would say "Then I have no option." It seems to me that that is likely now as in the past to defeat itself and that a man's mind whether he be judge or jury revolts against the penalty the law compels him to impose. He has to salve his conscience one way or the other. We find in the old days when a theft to the value of 5s. was a capital offence, jury after jury found a man guilty of stealing a silver teapot worth 4s. 11d. when everyone knew it was worth £5, £10 or £20. They had to put in that value against their conscience in order that the penalty might not be imposed. Here you will have people brought up and charged for aiding and betting in the same way. Judges before whom they come, if they are people who are so weak that they may not be trusted to give a proper penalty, would be quite weak enough to decline to convict in the case of grave crimes. This compulsory infliction of a grave punishment for light crimes seems to me to be based on a want of confidence in our own Judges. I think they ought to have sufficient confidence in themselves in selecting a man that was sent down to be a District Judge and sufficient confidence in the District Judges whom they send to be able to trust those men to give a proper penalty where the crime is clearly proved before them. I hope the Government will see their way to accept this amendment and if necessary to modify the clause later on. I suggest they ought not to enforce this hard and fast penalty for every crime, no matter how grave or little.

[Mr. FitzGibbon.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: What happened in regard to those offences is that the maximum was brought down and merged in what we believed ought to be the minimum. Deputies will agree that those offences, set out under the twelve heads in Part II. of the Schedule, embody largely the kind of crimes that are menacing the life and the future of the country—one no less than the other. There seems to be a tendency to pick out there, as a comparatively minor or trifling offence, the paragraph dealing with poteen. I think that Deputies who so pick out that section fail to appreciate the position that has been reached in certain parts of the country in regard to illicit distillation, and fail to appreciate its results. If you take up the paper any day and find some particularly hideous or revolting crime, you will almost invariably find that it has happened in the poteen area, where children going to and coming from school are reeling round the roads drunk with poteen. What chance have they of developing into decent, self-respecting citizens, when they degrade themselves so young? Man, we are told, is a rational animal. He is sometimes. He is not a rational animal when he gives himself up to the poteen craze. He divests himself of the only thing which distinguished him from the brute creation, and he becomes, in fact, a beast. Every unnatural crime, every bestial crime that is committed will be found within the zone of the illicit still. It does menace the life and the future of the country. No person who appreciates the extent of the evil, who appreciates its re-actions on a future generation, will think that it ought not to have been set out there amongst those other grave offences that are menacing peace and prosperity and stability here. So much for that.

This Bill has a lifetime of six months. We have felt that these coming months are likely to be particularly critical—critical intrinsically and critical in their re-action on the whole trend of affairs here in the future. We have said that that particular penalty ought to be imposed on a person found guilty of any of these crimes within the coming six months. The penalty was not fixed high. One could pick out offences from amongst these for which that particular penalty would be, fairly considered, a low penalty. But we brought down the maximum and merged it in what we believed was the minimum penalty that should be imposed by anyone with a proper sense of the gravity of these crimes, and their re-actions on the country. We made that mandatory rather than permissive. Because if, in the special circumstances, the Executive Council believed that particular crimes ought to be met with particular penalties, then they ought to say so. They ought to take upon themselves the responsibility of that conclusion. Having examined the position in the country, if they believe that particular offences stand out as particularly menacing to the Nation, and that certain penalties ought to be imposed, then they should say so in a mandatory fashion in their legislation, and not leave it simply to such accidental circumstances as the outlook of a magistrate here and a magistrate there to decide. There is something haphazard and casual and fortuitous in that. Deputies may put hypothetical cases and say that one could conceive cases in which these penalties would be harsh. Deputies may picture the case of a man coming home from the fair, perhaps having got a certain amount of stone beer, and finding his house burning. He gets information that it was "A.B." up the road who came down and scattered petrol around the floor, and set fire to the house. He goes up the road and burns "A.B.'s" house in intense provocation. Deputies might say that for this offence, in face of such great provocation, this penalty or the other penalty mentioned in the Bill, would be excessive. The penalty is the penalty which it is felt should normally attach to that particular crime. If a Judge or a Magistrate, having carried out the law by passing the sentence, thinks that it would be right for him to make representations to the Executive to the effect that there were in that particular case, which was heard by him, mitigating circumstances—circumstances that would call for the exercise of the prerogative of mercy—then, no doubt, the Judge or Magistrate will make such representations. But we wish to set out here clearly that these ten or twelve offences are offences which are menacing the very life and future of the country, and we do not discriminate between them. In their own way and in their own proportions they are all equally grave in their effects and in their prospects if they go on unchecked. We set out those and lay down for them one single penalty as mandatory within the six months which constitute the lifetime of the Bill. I think that is a sound thing to do. I think if the Executive Council, having surveyed the situation and examined reports, believes that certain offences do really gravely menace the future of the country, they should take the responsibility on themselves of assigning a penalty which will be at once the maximum and the minimum and leave it to the discretion of the judge or magistrate to make such representations as he thinks it necessary to make in a particular case.

Mr. JOHNSON: This is a most illuminating speech and it is a most extraordinary doctrine. We have a list of offences of varying enormity and the Executive is to say what the sentence shall be in every case where an offender is found guilty by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. The sentence is to be fixed before-hand for this long series of varying offences and the Minister cites what, I suppose, is the precedent of capital punishment being the inevitable end, so far as the Judge is concerned, of a verdict of guilty. These offences, by the way, are all supposed to be of equal demerit, requiring the same sentence, such sentence to be imposed before-hand by the Executive Council. One of the offences is the possession of any land mine, or other similar explosive machine within the six months. What has been said about the possession of land mines recently in this Chamber? It is not a case of the possession of a gun or revolver, not even the possession of a bomb, which might have been accidentally left, but the possession of a land mine, punishable even after this Bill becomes an Act, and is in operation, by death at the instigation of the army. But in the transfer—at least in the corresponding powers that the Civil Authority is to take—the possession of a land mine is to be of equal enormity, in the mind of the Executive, with the putting on of a uniform, or any part of a uniform, of a soldier or policeman or having possession of a soldier's cap. If found guilty, the same penalty must inevitably fall upon the offender as if he were found guilty of being in possession of a land mine. Notwithstanding all the Minister says about the evils of potence and illicit distillation, I do not believe the Dáil thinks for a moment, whatever way it may vote—and I believe in this case the Dáil is going to vote against its convictions, though I would like to be disillusioned—that a person having possession of any illicitly-distilled spirits is guilty of an equal offence with another person who is in possession of a land mine. Is there any Deputy will say that they are equally criminal?

The Minister for Agriculture is capable of a good deal, in this particular sphere, but I challenge him to say whether the possession of a land mine, within the next six months, is not a greater offence than the possession of illicitly-distilled spirits. The punishment that is to fit those crimes is to be the same in any case and there is to be no alternative except, if you please, the Judge who does as he is told may, if he thinks well, make representations to the Executive, say that the law they passed was a very unwise and a very foolish one and pass animadversions on the Dáil or Oireachtas. That of course would be quite outside his authority but he is invited to do it, or at all events invited to tell the Executive that they should not be so foolish as to introduce into the Bill such a Clause and ask them to reconsider it. That is what he is asked to do in the Courts of Summary Jurisdiction. I wonder what is the meaning of this—"the maximum shall be the minimum and the minimum shall be the maximum." Those that are up shall be down and those that are down shall be up. I wonder whether the Minister has considered the application of Article 72 of the Constitution to this sub-section. Should a minor offence be classed as one which should entail imprisonment for twelve months with hard labour or imprisonment for eighteen months, with hard labour, provided the man has not got fifty pounds to spare? Can an offence which is punishable by such a sentence be classed as a "minor" offence? I suppose the Minister will argue that if this Bill becomes law, then these will be minor offences which are triable by law, but in that case I hope the Bill that the Ministers are supposed to be preparing, dealing with the powers of the Courts and the jurisdiction of the Courts, will provide us with some guidance for the future as to what is a minor offence and what kind of punishment is applicable to minor offences and what kind of punishment is applicable to major offences. That by the way.

[Mr. Johnson.]

I hope the Dáil will be enlightened somewhat more fully than they have been as to the real meaning of this grouping of all these offences of such varying quality and providing that they shall each and all be punishable by the same sentence.

I think there must be some more reason in it than that told to us by the Minister. He must have forgotten the essential thing, or can it be that it was merely a sporting leap in the dark; that they had no real reason for it, but thought that perhaps it was an easy way of getting over a difficulty, or that they had not confidence in the Justices they have recently appointed; that these Justices have not experience enough, and that they might be afraid of making mistakes in the infliction of the punishment? Surely there must be some other reason than that vouchsafed to us.

Mr. HOGAN: Deputy Johnson is anxious for my opinion on the question as to whether the offence of having a land mine is an offence of equal gravity with having a bottle of poteen in one's possession. I can answer the question simply, and say that it is not. If you consider the two offences in normal circumstances, or in anything like normal circumstances—perhaps I am hardly right in saying normal circumstances, but even in present circumstances, the offence is not the same. Deputy Johnson has evaded, or missed, the real point of the speech of the Minister for Home Affairs if he were serious in putting that conundrum to me. The Minister for Home Affairs was careful to explain that we had tried to impose the minimum penalty. That may offend the Deputy's fine sense of justice, but I think it will not offend the sense of justice of any practical man who takes a look at the present situation, or at the very large number of crimes that have been committed and are being committed every day, and who realises that the Executive must deal with all these crimes as if they were interdependent and connected, as they are. Now, it is not the same offence, and Deputy Johnson can argue from that, even from our point of view, that we are imposing a lesser penalty on certain offences than we could impose, because we consider that twelve months' hard labour is no more than an adequate penalty for the keeping of poteen. He is welcome to all the consolation that he can get out of that. He wants to prove us illogical even from our own point of view. If he wants to prove us illogical in this matter he must show that we are not inflicting, or that we are not asking the magistrates to inflict, a sufficiently heavy penalty on certain offences, because that is what it comes to. If he once admits the contention of the Minister for Home Affairs that the penalty set out here is the minimum penalty for the smallest offences, then our only offence in the matter is this, that we have not inflicted a sufficiently high penalty for other offences. He is welcome to all the kudos and all the consolation he can get out of that, but before he comes to the conclusion that we have committed any great error I would ask him to realise two things. The first is that we have not inflicted the same penalty for all the offences set out in the Schedule.

Mr. JOHNSON: Nobody said that.

Mr. HOGAN: We have not, as I say, inflicted the same penalty for all the offences set out in the Schedule. The Deputy gave me at least the impression that we were inflicting the same penalty, but we are not. We are inflicting one penalty on anyone who is convicted, after summary trial, of any of the offences set out in the Schedule, and another penalty for anyone convicted on indictment. We draw the line there. We put the less serious offences on one side, and the more serious offences on the other, so that our regulations are not so sweeping as one would be led to believe if one came to the conclusion that we were inflicting the same penalty for all offences, whether tried summarily or by indictment. As the Minister for Home Affairs pointed out, it is open to the District Justice to make representations to the Executive to exercise the prerogative of mercy. If there are any cases where the offence is a purely technical offence, and I can readily conceive a man being innocently in possession of a bottle of poteen, and if in such a case a magistrate is of opinion that the offence is merely technical and that there is no moral guilt, he can point that out to the Executive who have undertaken a good many responsibilities and they will undertake this responsibility. There is the prerogative of mercy vested in someone, and it can be exercised. That is my answer to the question as to whether the possession of a bottle of poteen is the same offence as having possession of a land mine. There is another point that goes to the root of the whole thing. The Deputy may not agree with me, but I genuinely believe this, that men who were seizing other people's land, men who are enriching themselves quietly and privately under cover of the Irregulars when the Irregulars were burning houses and generally causing confusion, were just as bad as the Irregulars and morally were worse than them. He is a very poor type of criminal who will go out for no reason to burn his neighbour's house, but the man is as big a criminal morally who will go out while his neighbour's house is burning and steal a cup and saucer out of it. That sort of criminal takes advantage of the fact that some other criminal is burning the house, and while the house is burning he steals perhaps a loaf or a cup and saucer. No one pretends, other things being equal, that it is the same offence to steal a spoon or a cup and saucer as to burn a man's house, but though the law must make a distinction is there any difference, from any honourable or decent point of view, between the man who burns his neighbour's house and the man who takes advantage of the fact that another criminal is burning his neighbour's house to steal a spoon out of it? I put that conundrum to Deputy Johnson, and I invite him to answer it.

That is the kind of thing that is at the bottom of all this, and that is what is behind this Bill. I suggest that that goes to the root of the whole matter. Men who, during the last six or seven months went out, even in the smallest way, to take advantage of the people who were dishonouring themselves and their country, and who, even in a small way, went out to do themselves a good turn and to enrich themselves were, in my opinion, as big criminals as the men who were committing what would be considered far graver offences.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister has put several questions to me. He has stated frankly that the offence of being in possession of poteen is not as grievous an offence as being in possession of a land mine. Nevertheless, he defends the minimum punishment for one offence being the maximum for the other. But there is no discrimination allowed in this Sub-section whether it is a first, a second or a third offence. There is no discrimination allowed in this Sub-section, no matter what the circumstances may be surrounding the commission of the offence. They are all guilty, and being guilty—

Mr. HOGAN: The Deputy is hardly quoting me accurately.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not pretend to be quoting when I say that I am inferring what I read in the Bill. There is the definite proposition here that a person guilty of any of these offences no matter whether it is a first, a second or a third offence, or even a thirty-first offence, shall be sentenced to a definite term of imprisonment with hard labour for twelve months, and if he has not got £50 to spare he will have to spend an additional six months in gaol. I maintain that the circumstances connected with many of these offences may be of a kind which would warrant a very much smaller punishment than eighteen months' imprisonment with hard labour. Just to illustrate what I mean, I shall give a quotation from a speech delivered by the Attorney-General in the Belfast Parliament. He was defending a Bill much milder than this, and he said "There is no term of hard labour known to the law exceeding two years. Once you exceed two years you go into penal servitude. I have never suffered penal servitude or hard labour in this particular form, but I am told that two years' hard labour is much more severe than five years' penal servitude."

[Mr. Johnson.]

If that gentleman is to be believed, and I have no doubt he was quoting from those who were able to inform him with authority, the punishment that is to be inflicted, and regarding which there is to be no discrimination left to the Justice, on the possessor of illicit spirits or a soldier's cap, is to be greater, if this is true, than the punishment of a person found guilty on indictment who shall be sentenced to suffer penal servitude for a term of three years, and to pay a fine. I say that the whole conception of this Section is bad, because it does not allow any discrimination to the Justice as to the term of imprisonment and the severity of the sentences, even the maximum of which ranges over a variety of offences and puts them under what might be called a flat rate. The Minister has not helped to satisfy my mind about this, and I hope the Dáil will generally agree with the contention of Deputy FitzGibbon that the word 'shall' should be altered to read 'may.'

Mr. FITZGIBBON: In getting up a second time to speak I do not think anyone will say that I am doing so for the mere sake of obstruction. I make the Minister a present of the fact that for almost every offence set down in the Schedule I can conceive the penalty to be a very light one, but there are many of these offences for which I could almost equally conceive any penalty to be too great. Let it be granted that illicit drinking in any form is worthy of any punishment you please, but I am now going to take one case that has nothing to do with illicit drinking. It came within my own knowledge not many weeks ago. It was the case of four small boys who were brought up in the Dublin Police Courts for breaking some windows in a place of worship in York Street, almost opposite the College of Surgeons. That is an offence that would clearly come within Sub-section (8), which deals with unlawful injury and damage to property. I think it will be admitted that I regard any place of worship of any religious body, creed or sect, as a place which it is a sacrilege to touch. It was a grave crime with which these boys were charged, but, in my opinion, when these small boys were brought up in the Dublin Police Courts it would have been a far graver crime to have inflicted on them imprisonment with hard labour for twelve months, and then, in default of their parents being unable to pay £50, which I suppose they could get as easily as if the sum were £50,000, these boys would have to go back to gaol for another six months without any option being given to the magistrate to send them to a reformatory or to an industrial school. The magistrate would be bound to inflict the compulsory punishment that I have mentioned, and it is the gross iniquity of compulsory punishment of that kind that makes me press this amendment. I ask the Minister would he agree to say in this Section that a Court of Summary Jurisdiction "shall" for the offences numbered one to seven, and "may" for the offences eight to twelve, inflict these penalties? The offences numbered one to seven include all the graver crimes, and the offences numbered eight to twelve include pretty well all the crimes that are capable of modification. I do not move that amendment, but if the Minister would consider it between the time that his majority would have defeated this amendment and the time that we would come to the next stage of the Bill it would at least be some relief. The offences numbered one to seven are what would be called major crimes. These include the unlawful possession of lethal firearms, ammunition, bombs, land mines, wrongful possession of land, robbery under arms, arson, and masquerading as members of the Police Force, etc. The offences eight to twelve deal with the lesser crimes, involving unlawful destruction or damage to property. I quite agree that under them there might be crimes which would be lightly treated even with eighteen months' imprisonment, but on the other hand, for the offence of merely injuring property which might only mean the breaking of a window in an empty house, it seems to me to go beyond all reason that this compulsory penalty should be inflicted, and to leave to the chance of the magistrate making a report, and to the chance of the Minister for Home Affairs having sufficient information before him, to say that this is a case in which the prerogative of mercy should be exercised. All that, I say, seems to me to be going beyond all reason.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I will undertake to consider very carefully between now and the next stage of the Bill Deputy FitzGibbon's suggestion to make a discrimination between the last five and the first seven of these offences in the first part of the Schedule. The one that I would be most doubtful about is that dealing with illicit spirits. I think if we agree to treat that penalty as the maximum for that offence that we would also have to consider it advisable to insert a minimum penalty. As I say it is not so much the guilt of the individual here that has been the decisive factor as the absolute necessity of getting rid, once and for all, of these offences. I would not say there is one of them more than another menacing the life and prosperity of the country. If the country is to live, flourish and regain its prestige among the nations it is necessary that each one of the 12 offences set out there be stamped out.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I am not enough of a lawyer to tell off-hand whether the startling words in No. 10 in Part 2 of the Schedule mean a certain thing or mean some other thing, but I have been thinking of somewhat similar cases to those which Deputy Fitz-

Gibbon mentioned when he spoke last. While it was a hypothetical case it was suggested to me by something the Minister said earlier and it seems to me a great hardship. I refer to the case, for instance, of young people, boys or girls requested by parents or someone else to procure from some house illicitly distilled spirits. There will be means and measures taken by traffickers in illicitly distilled spirits to evade the provisions of any Act and the thing may be christened with some other name than that given to it in the country. It is possible, I think, for messengers quite innocently to carry such spirits. I should like to know whether in the opinion of the Minister a case of that kind would be covered by the words "would if in possession or control of any such things."

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I think that guilty knowledge is assumed. There can be no conveyance without such guilty knowledge.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Yes, that would go a considerable distance. It seems to me the case has been completely made out for a change. There is lack of proportion in the offences. I am sorry Deputy FitzGibbon is not here now. I intended to ask him, through you, Sir, to answer a question which arose in my mind when the Minister for Agriculture was speaking. It seemed to me he laid down a rather peculiar principle of jurisprudence. Deputy Johnson referred to it as the flat rate. It seems to me rather like a law of averages. It may be a common thing in law but it seems to me a peculiar and a remarkable thing. May I ask the Minister if we may take it as a rule that previous Statutes imposing penalties for the offences in this Bill will in effect be, if not repealed, in use during the period in which this Bill is in operation?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: During the lifetime of this Bill the provisions of the Bill will supersede the existing law.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 15; Níl, 38.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás MacEoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.

Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghoasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.
Earnán Altán.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin
Liam Thrift.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mag Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Staines.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mag Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hOgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Fáolacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.

Piarras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Croistoir Ó Broin.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigin.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dóláin.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seamus de Burca.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. DAY: I beg to move to Report Progress.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: A similar motion was made at 22 minutes past 12. I shall not take another motion yet.

Mr. MORRISSEY: I beg to move Amendment 36, in Sub-section (2), line 22, after the words "imprisonment with" to insert "or without." The section as it stands at present gives no discretion whatever to the Court. Hard labour is a very severe penalty, and the Court may not wish to impose a penalty on a prisoner who may be in a bad state of health, and there may be other extenuating circumstances. As the clause stands at present they have absolutely no discretion in any case. I think this is a very reasonable amendment, and one which the Minister ought to accept. There are cases such as I say where, owing to bad health or otherwise, it would be grave injustice to inflict hard labour.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Hard labour, the Deputy says, is a very severe sentence. Now, as far as I could ever find out the only difference between a hard labour sentence and any other sentence is that there is a fortnight at the beginning of the hard labour sentence in which the prisoner does not get a mattress. Having got over the fortnight the conditions are very much the same. I would accept the Deputy's amendment with regard to line 25, and in fact I was going to offer in connection with that an additional sentence of a fine or an alternative six months, to make that a permissive thing, so that the Sub-section would read: "that a person shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment with hard labour for the term of 12 months and in addition may be sentenced to pay a fine of £50 and in default of payment of such fine should suffer imprisonment with or without hard labour a further term of 12 months." I could not accept the Deputy's amendment with regard to the substantial portion of the sentence. That would be the 12 months.

Mr. JOHNSON: In view of the Minister's assurance that there is no difference except for the first fortnight where the prisoner has not a mattress, will he accept the word "without" instead of "with" in line 22 inasmuch as it would make no practical difference?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: There is this difference really that the hard labour sentence is rather to indicate the turpitude of the particular offences. There is very little practical difference within the prison in the conditions of a man sentenced to hard labour beyond the first fortnight, but the additional description of a sentence as a hard labour sentence indicates that a serious view was taken of the offence by the Court, and that it was the wish of the Court to brand it as a rather disgraceful type of crime.

Mr. JOHNSON: It seems to me that that would lead one to conclude that it was wise to put in the two possibilities "with or without." Then it will be clear that if hard labour is, in fact, imposed, it will be a clear expression of opinion by the Justice that he has taken a more serious view of the evidence, inasmuch as he had an option and decided to impose the greater penalty. Even though the greater penalty was only nominally greater, it was, at least, a sign of discrimination, whereas when a Justice is bound to impose hard labour, there is no expression of his discrimination as to the enormity of the offence. I suggest that, following the Minister's own contention, it would be wise to accept the amendment, inasmuch as that would allow that discrimination—though a nominal one—to be given expression to by the magistrate in imposing the sentence.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I would be inclined to accept that amendment. I am satisfied that there is no material difference in the conditions of a prisoner sentenced to hard labour and those of a prisoner not so sentenced, and I have no objection to accepting the amendment. I might as well make the offer I mentioned just now with regard to making the fine portion of the sentence permissive rather than mandatory. The words would then be: "may, in addition, be sentenced to pay a fine." Some discretion can be exercised, then, with regard to the circumstances of the prisoners and so forth.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The amended sub-section would then read, in part, "shall be sentenced to suffer imprisonment, with or without hard labour, for the term of 12 months."

Amendment put, and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is an amendment in line 23 to insert after the word "and" the words "may in addition be sentenced," so that the line would read "labour for the term of 12 months and may, in addition, be sentenced to pay a fine of fifty."

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Yes. As we are at it, we might accept that "with or without" again in line 25.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is an amendment to line 25 to delete the word "with" and to substitute the word "without." Will that be withdrawn?

Mr. DAY: No, because the circumstances would be different.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then we will take this amendment in line 23 to begin with. Who is moving the amendment in line 23?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: You can take me as moving it.

Amendment to insert in line 23, after the word "and" the words "may in addition be sentenced," put, and agreed to.

Amendment 37.—In sub-section (2), line 25, after word "conviction" to insert the words "the Court may, if it is of opinion that such default is due to contumacy and not to lack of means on the part of the person, further sentence him."

Mr. LYONS: I propose Amendment 37, and I do not think the Minister will have any difficulty in accepting it.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I wonder if the Deputy has observed that I agreed to make the fine portion of that Sub-section permissive, and the Sub-section would then read "and may in addition be sentenced to pay a fine of £50." That would leave it open to the magistrate to take into consideration the circumstances of a prisoner, which is practically what the Deputy asks in his amendment.

Mr. LYONS: After the explanation of the Minister that he proposes to embody the principle of this amendment in the section, I agree to accept it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is Amendment 37 withdrawn?

Mr. LYONS: Yes.

Amendment withdrawn.

Amendment 38:—"In Sub-section (2), line 25, to delete the word 'with' and to substitute therefor the word 'without.'"

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I accept this amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment 39: "In Sub-section (3), line 29, to substitute the word 'may' for the word 'shall.'"

Mr. JOHNSON: I have authority from Deputy FitzGibbon to move this amendment on his behalf—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am not quite clear as to whether the option rejected in Amendment 35 does not operate here.

Mr. JOHNSON: The option that was rejected in the last sub-section had to do with persons convicted by Courts of Summary Jurisdiction. It was decided by the majority of the Dáil that any such person convicted of offences in Part 2 of the Schedule by a Court of Summary Jurisdiction shall be sentenced to a certain term of imprisonment. Sub-section 3 deals with persons found guilty on indictment, and does not deal with persons found guilty by Courts of Summary Jurisdiction. In any such case the object of the amendment is to leave an option as to the extent of the severity of the sentence. In this case the prisoner will be tried by a jury. It has been pointed out very often that where there is the certainty of a particular sentence juries are all apt to decline to find a verdict in accordance with the evidence, because they know beforehand what the sentence is to be, and that the effect of a mandatory provision of this kind will be to defeat the intentions of the Bill. On that ground alone the amendment ought to be accepted. I think it is common ground amongst criminal lawyers, and I think it is even more generally accepted in this country, that juries, where there is no possibility of a small sentence—where, for instance, in a trial for murder the jury does not want to see the capital penalty inflicted—make up their minds to find the prisoner not guilty. Now, that is likely to be the case in any of those other offences.

There are other reasons which may not appeal so surely to the Minister's mentality but which, I think, are really more potent to the average member of the Dáil. The arguments that have been used in regard to the imposition of sentences without question under Sub-section No. 2 apply equally to this Sub-section No. 3. Every person found guilty on indictment of the various offences which we have been considering shall be sentenced to suffer penal servitude for a term of three years, and to pay a fine of not more than £100 nor less than £50, and if he is not able to pay the money he has to suffer imprisonment for another year, or (b) he may be sentenced to suffer imprisonment with hard labour for a term of not more than two years, nor less than one year. There is, as a matter of fact, more option given in this Sub-section than in the last, but I still consider that the advantages lie in every way with the amendment to substitute the word "may" for "shall" in line 2, Sub-section 3.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I ask Deputies to remember that in this Sub-section you are dealing with a particular class of case, a case of a man indicted and tried by a jury, a case which had attendant circumstances so grave that the magistrate considered that it was not a fit case for summary trial and sent it forward for indictment. There may be circumstances in connection, for instance, with the first offence mentioned in the Second Part of the Schedule that would render it extremely grave and bring it outside the scope of mere summary trial. I would be inclined to offer, in connection with this Sub-section, much the same as was offered above—namely to make the fine portion of the sentence a permissive one and to strike out the minimum of the fine so that (a) would read somewhat as follows "Shall be sentenced either to suffer penal servitude for a term of three years?"—I cannot find the right words at the moment, but the effect of it would be, in addition to the sentence, "a fine of not more than £100," leaving out the following words, "and in default of payment of such fine within one month after sentence to suffer penal servitude for a further term not exceeding one year." Similar changes would occur in "b." Without going over again the arguments with regard to "may" and "shall," I do think that there is less ground for objecting to it in this case than in the case of summary jurisdiction. You will have here a man tried before a jury and the offences set out in Part 2 of the Schedule were selected because it is considered that, in their own way they are all equally menacing to the future of the country.

Mr. JOHNSON: Does the Minister give no weight to the contention that the fact that the punishment is mandatory has an effect upon the jury's consideration of the case?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I gave to that point a certain amount of consideration. But that point did not cause me to change my view that there ought to be for these offences a mandatory penalty that would be the minimum.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 13; Níl, 42.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás MacEoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Eabhróid.

Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghoas.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súileabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Densinhuin Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Gearailh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Staineas.
Domhnall Mac Cíorthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hOgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máillo.
Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.

Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslaí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Croistoir Ó Broin.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dóláin.
Aindriú Ó Láimhín.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seamus de Burca.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.

Amendment declared lost.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then Amendment No. 40, which is to insert in Sub-section (3) (a), line 34, after the the word " sentence," the words " may if the Court is satisfied that such default is due to contumacy and not to lack of means, be further sentenced," and Amendment 41 to insert in Sub-section (b), (3), after the word "with," the word " without," and Amendment 42 in Sub-section (3) (b), line 42 after the word " sentence " to insert the words " may if the Court is satisfied that such default is due to contumacy and not to lack of means be further sentenced," and Amendment 43 in Sub-section (3) (b), line 43, to delete the word " with " and to substitute therefor the word " without," are similar to what we have have had before.

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes; assuming that the Minister's words are embodied as promised.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes; they are the same as we had before, and I was going to ask the Minister would he embody the words now or later on.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: What I propose in connection with this Section, if Deputies will observe, is that I am inclined to introduce amendments:

In Section 5, Sub-section (3) (a) to make the fine portion of the sentence permissive; to delete the words " not less than fifty pounds."

In line 35, to delete the word " of," and to insert " not exceeding," (b) to make the fine portion permissive.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

In lines 40 and 41, to delete the words "nor less than fifty pounds."

In line 43, to delete the word "with," and to substitute the word "without," and delete the word "of," and substitute the words "not exceeding."

Mr. JOHNSON: Would the Minister not accept an amendment which would add in paragraph (b) the words "with or without hard labour"?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Do you mean in the first paragraph (b)?

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: No, I could not accept that because these are particularly grave cases that will be sent on for indictment. They will be tried before a Judge and a jury, and if the jury finds a man guilty of the offences set out in the Schedule then a hard labour sentence is not excessive.

Mr. JOHNSON: But inasmuch as there is no material difference, except in the fact that it records the sense of discrimination, and the sense that a Judge has of the relative enormity of the crime, and that though there is no real difference the fact that the Judge can say that this deserves hard labour expresses his views of the relative enormity of the offence—as it stands there is no opportunity of that—and inasmuch as it makes no practical difference in the amount of physical suffering only, and the sense of the Judge's opinion as to the extent of the offence, the Minister might, I suggest, accept that amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am sorry, but I could not accept that amendment. A person found guilty on indictment of this offence ought to receive hard labour.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Then the Minister's own amendments are agreed to.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. DAY: I beg to move Amendment 41. In Sub-section (3) (b) after the word "with," to insert the words "or without."

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I could not accept that amendment.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 12; Níl, 41.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás MacEoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Connill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Séamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mag Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Staines.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mag Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hOgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.

Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Croistoir Ó Broin.
Risteárd Mac Liam.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Andriú Ó Láimhín.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Séamus de Burca.
Micheál Ó Dubhghaill.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. O'BRIEN: The next amendment which stands in my name is, I think, consequential on Amendment 40, and I desire to withdraw it.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I move: "In Sub-section (3) (b), line 43, to delete the word 'with' and to substitute therefor the word 'without.'" I think the Minister has said that he was accepting this amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I accept that.

Amendment agreed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I want to point out that the next amendment, No. 44, aims at deleting the whole of Sub-section (4). That is to say to delete the provisions which deal with whipping. Subsequent amendments deal with the endeavours to amend the sub-section should it not be deleted. In dealing with the amendments subsequent to Amendment 44 it will not be possible to enter into an argument for deleting the sub-section, and when we come to the question "that the section as amended stand part of the Bill" it will not be possible to enter into arguments for deleting Sub-section (4).

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to ask whether you would take a motion to report progress with a view to the exhibition to the Dáil of the various instruments that are possible to be used in this operation?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I will not.

Mr. JOHNSON: I want to ask the Dáil then to agree to this amendment which I propose, namely, "To delete Sub-section (4)." I asked the Dáil to pass this amendment upon the view that the punishment of whipping or flogging is degrading and dehumanising to the flogged and the flogger and to the people responsible for the operation of the flogging. It may interest the Dáil to know that this kind of punishment is confined in European countries to England and Turkey. It was in Russia, but I am not sure if it is now, and in the North African countries to Morocco. All other civilised countries in Europe have long since given up this operation of flogging. I am not going to ask for any leniency to the prisoners. I am not going to base my arguments against the institution of this method of punishment out of sympathy with the prisoners. I believe that even they are human and ought to be treated as human, but I am afraid that the history of the last few years has gone far to harden men's hearts and generally to think that it is quite an ennobling aspiration to treat violence with violence and meet torture with torture. I do base the contention that it is unwise to enter into this method of punishment because it is degrading to the persons engaged in the flogging, and it is a reversal of the process of civilisation and christianisation. We have been told on very good authority that it does not matter so much the distance that people progress so long as the direction of their progress is right. I think in this case it is distinctly retrogressive, and the institution of flogging, the reimposition of flogging, in Ireland will mean distinct retrogression, and is not called for by any of the facts that have been adduced in support of the provisions of this Bill. We have been told, of course, that certain classes of offences have, as a matter of fact, been reduced by the imposition of the lash. That is not proved. It is, in fact, denied on good authority—on the authority of the Judges of the British Courts. The classical case that has so often been mentioned—it was mentioned here on the Second Reading—of the decline in garrotting as a consequence of the lash is quite fallacious, although the Encyclopædia Britannica quotes it, but other encyclopædias point out more correctly that the decline had taken place six months before the Act was passed. The cases made for this system of punishment, is that it is confined to two classes of offences, and it is thought it would be a special deterrent for these two classes of offences. No reason was given why culprits of this kind will be deterred while other culprits, offenders in other directions, will not be deterred by flogging. It is rather strange, while one class of offence is chosen here in this Bill as a fit subject for the reintroduction of this same fiendish system of punishment, in other places and other times quite other classes of offences are quoted as justifying the reintroduction of flogging. There are two judges whose words I would like to quote—representing two different schools of thought, one might say—Mr. Justice Hawkins and Mr. Justice Matthews of the British Courts. Sir Henry Hawkins wrote in his memoirs,

[Mr. Johnson.]

“soon after I became a judge I abstained from applying it (the lash) and in all cases where my attention was directed to the special brutality of any particular case I felt that it was preferable to inflicting whipping to add a longer term of imprisonment.”

Mr. GEORGE NICHOLLS at this stage took the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSON: Mr. Justice Matthews said, in criticising the proposals of the Grand Jury at the Birmingham Assizes in 1890, to the effect that there should be an extension of flogging for assaults on women and children, “it would be inhuman to add the lash to the sentence of penal servitude and such savage sentences would tend to defeat their object by creating pity for the criminal.” I have no doubt that many judges can be quoted on the other side who are in conflict upon this subject, as they are upon many subjects. Some judges are very fond of heavy sentences for certain classes of crime, while others are favourable to light sentences, and they vary exceedingly in respect of the merits or demerits of the lash as a form of punishment. The contention is, however, that flogging is a deterrent, that it will deter in a special manner Irishmen who are guilty, at this stage in history, of the offences of arson, or Irishmen who are guilty, at this stage of history, of robbery under arms.

I want to ask whether it is intended to impose a flogging sentence out of vengeance upon a person guilty of either of these crimes? Is it intended that because the individual has offended violently and grievously against the State, the State must use its strong arm to violently afflict that person's flesh with a lash? Is it vengeance that it is sought to expend upon the prisoner? If that is the case the Dáil will make, then I have no reply to it except to regret that Deputies are so lost to all that has been taught them from their childhood, as to fall back upon the primal instincts. “An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth,” has a long history as a method of administering justice, but it is not consistent with the Christian Doctrine that Deputies generally have been taught and believe. So I will assume that this punishment is not intended to be imposed as an act of vengeance.

It is presumably claimed that the fear of the lash will deter those who may be tempted to commit those crimes. I think that that is the fairest statement of the case in favour of the imposition of the lash. It is hoped that it will not be necessary to impose it. It is, perhaps, believed that it will not be necessary to inflict whipping penalties, but that the very fear that such a penalty may be inflicted will deter the kind of criminal or potential criminal who might be tempted to commit any of these offences. If that is a fair statement, I want to ask whether it is a right thing to put a person who is not sufficiently brutalised to have no regard for the probable whipping, to put that person, who has at least some remains of a sensitive nature, some remains of a moral sense, to undergo the very degrading punishment that the lash involves? If it is argued that the offender is already brutalised, and that an appeal to that person's social sense is useless, that there is only one way to deter him or to deter others like him, and that is to punish him so viciously, so severely, by physical pain, that the fear will be too great, that he is, in fact, a brute, that he is already dehumanised, and that therefore the only way to treat him is as a brute, as something that is not human—if that be the argument, even then I contend it is better to impose a long period of imprisonment. It is a much more effective safeguard to the public than to allow that brutalised person to be free after a period of imprisonment, and to allow his brutalised nature to have full fling upon the body politic. If, on the other hand, this kind of person is one whose moral sense has not been utterly destroyed, that there is something of humanity left, then I say that the process of whipping is going to lower that man to a level much nearer the brute and to take from him much, if not all, of the human feeling that we are crediting him with.

I do not know whether the Minister has—as I think was his duty before suggesting the imposition of this penalty—made himself acquainted with the procedure connected with whipping under British law in the past. The procedure under this Bill will be that the instrument is to be decided by the Court, and I presume not merely the instrument but the manner of the use of that instrument. No doubt precedent will be quoted, and some reference will be made to the practices in the past, and perhaps the jails which have used the lash for offences against warders—disciplinary offences—may still have within their walls the whips and triangles and the like. I take it that the Minister will have made himself thoroughly acquainted with the procedure. I am going to ask the Dáil to listen to a statement that was made in an earlier discussion upon this question in the British House of Commons. It will be remembered that the Irish representatives of that day did a great deal toward the abolition of the use of the lash in the British Navy and the British Army. It is related in a history of the Irish Parliamentary Party that one terrible day in the House Alexander McDonald, who, by the way, was the first of the Labour members, told the story of his father's cruel shame. He had been a sailor on a ship of war. Some trifling quarrel with a superior had brought him to the court-martial, and the sentence of 50 lashes of the cat-o'-nine-tails at the hands of the burly boatswain's mates was imposed. Cut to the bone, to the ribs, McDonald's father bore the scars to his dying day.

"I worked as a lad with my father many a day in the pits," McDonald told the House, "and well I remember that no matter what the heat and sweat of work my father always kept wearing a bit of a shirt about his chest and sides. He would not let a fellow workman see the scars of the wounds. I had my personal experience too of those soldier-tragedies. My soldier-nurse, my father's batman, had been a few months before the smartest soldier in the Fifth. A glass of drink, a word, a blow, a mad struggle with the picket. The court was merciful. The ruined man got 'only' 25 lashes! Poor brave McMullan, from the County Down! Shamed to the very death, he drooped and shrank from that awful day. His captain, who liked and respected him, did all he could to hearten and console him. In vain. Before three years were passed from the hour they loosed him from the black triangle, the broken soldier was in his grave."

I do not really want to stress the physical point, but I do want to appeal to the Dáil to realise that there is a moral degradation, a brutalising of the man who has been lashed by another man, and that that brutalising seriously and rapidly tends to make that criminal a much less desirable citizen when he returns to civil life than he was before he went in. You have put him at enmity with the State and with Society, because you have degraded him. You have put him in the position of a slave, of a man whose physical being has been scarified and scored by another and who has been actually put into physical torment at the hands of the State.

I say that the inevitable effect—and it is easily proveable in history—of that kind of torture is to put that man at enmity with the State and with society when he comes out, as you contemplate he will do, because his mind has been brutalised and he has lost real contact with the higher things, by virtue of that real degradation of spirit, and you have actually put him into a wrong relationship if your intention was preservative and beneficent and if you are not, as I hope you are not, out for vengeance. The history of civilisation will surely remind Deputies that the countries and the times in which crime was most prevalent were the countries and the times when flogging was most general. Flogging was general for the minor offences both of men and women, and it was only with the development of a real sense of humanity that crime diminished. When flogging ceased there was a rapid diminution of crime. The history of the British Navy and the British Army in regard to flogging gives ample evidence of that. Everybody who has had experience admits that since the abolition of flogging the general sense of discipline and of good conduct of our crews and of soldiers has been improved to an extraordinary degree, and that since the flogging process was wisely put aside the effects have been immeasurable upon those who were in the habit of committing offences. I would ask the Dáil, and I would appeal to the Minister as seriously and as earnestly as it is possible to do, to withdraw these penalties from this Bill and not let it be said that we are instituting or reviving the system of flogging. I would remind the Dáil that it has been noted with satisfaction that in the past flogging has been very, very lightly indulged in in Ireland and in Scotland, if at all. Now we are asked to institute it in this Bill and to impose it upon certain criminals—to enter, as I think, into a competition with criminality, a competition between the State and the criminal as to who is the most capable of inflicting violence. We have said, and the Minister has said, that recent years have dulled the sense of morality of many people in the country, and that what was looked upon as a terrible thing five years ago is lightly regarded now.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Flogging is merely an institution. The institution of flogging will merely be one other step in the contest of brutality. The criminal is doing an evil thing, a violent thing, and a very disastrous thing to the common well-being, and the State is asked to respond to that by inflicting physical pain with a lash. We are not asked to adopt other methods which are known to history of inflicting pain, but we are asked to strip a man and to use upon that man's body the whipcord, a knotted cord or, perhaps, some other instrument of torture in the form of a lash, and to prescribe that as a cure for the offence of arson. I think it will not be a cure. The utmost that is to be hoped is, if this Bill becomes law with this flogging clause, that there will be no offences of arson, and it may be claimed to the credit of the Bill, if that is the desirable story that can be told at the end of six months. But we will have had placed upon the Statute Book this punishment of flogging, and that in itself will be something to be sorry for in the future. I hope it will be possible for the Minister to say that he is willing to wait at least until he sees that there is an actual increase or a great increase in these two offences and that there is no way of putting them down without corporal punishment. If he comes to the conclusion, after trying other methods, that there is no way of putting them down without threatening corporal punishment, then let him come again to the Dáil and ask for permission to add this penalty to the other penalties; but I would earnestly ask that, until other methods have been tried, and until an extension in the number and ferocity of these offences is revived and continued, that we should not be asked to accept Section 5 in this Bill.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Deputy Johnson has put calmly and rationally one aspect of this question. I wish I could feel that I could put nearly as well the contrary case. This Bill has been nicknamed. The official title has been ignored and it has become known as the Flogging Bill. I think that people would have been wiser to have adhered to the original title, because it is certainly in that spirit of protecting the clean decent people of this country that the Bill was conceived, and it was above and beyond all for the public safety that it was framed. Within the last year Ministers, Deputies, Senators and representative people have had to be guarded, and to be specially guarded. None of them, I take it, liked that, but it was considered necessary. I ask Deputies to remember that the ordinary man and woman in this country have no guard, if the law and the sanctions of the law are not a sufficient protection for them. Time was in this country when a man could leave his door on the latch during the day or the night. That day has passed, and within recent months, within the last eight or ten months, all sense of appreciation of the sanctity of the home, all restraints of human respect, restraints of respect for the moral law, restraints of respect for the law of man, have gone whistling down the wind, because the worst instincts of man have been summoned up, deliberately summoned up in this country, because that criminality which is latent in man everywhere, which is part of his baser nature, has been called up here. The poet Virgil makes one of his characters say "If Heaven denies me, then I'll call on hell." That seems to be very much the stand taken up a year ago by certain people here who professed to be standing for the higher political ideals, who professed to be themselves high-souled patriotic men with no thought of self, ready to sacrifice themselves and all they hold dear on the altar of their country's good. But they said "If heaven fails me I will call on hell; if I fail to get a response from the people of this country to the intrinsic nobility of my cause, then I will turn deliberately and call forth in this country the worst instincts of man; I will play deliberately to their basest passions, and I will tell them the country is theirs for the taking; I will ask them to go out with a gun to rob their neighbours; I will offer them land for nothing; I will tell them they will never have to pay any debts, rent, rates or taxes, and that the millennium is coming for the man with the gun." It was a pleasant call, and it tickled many ears, and met with a surprisingly general response. Men who had never felt themselves called upon to face the British administration, who had never felt themselves called upon to make any particular sacrifice to achieve the object of getting the British out of Ireland, when the British were got out of Ireland turned on the first native administration here with a ferocity and wantonness that was surprising, and the country has had its year of hell in consequence, the hell of what, for want of a better name, we call civil war. It was not civil war, because there was only the irreducible minimum of fighting. For the most part, when the troops came within range, it was easy talk to the men who professed to die rather than go into the British Empire and all that kind of talk. They conducted a very wanton campaign against the unarmed citizens of the country, and against the economic life of the country. They wrecked and burned and robbed from end to end of Ireland in the name of Irish freedom, and in the name of a political ideal. Irish freedom! Two things stood out, and these were these two offences that have been singled out in this Bill, the crime of arson and the crime of robbery, the robbery of the unarmed man by the man with the gun. The cry was "What is yours is mine, because I have a gun and you have not; your savings, the fruits of your thrift or enterprise, must be handed over to me by virtue of my gun."

Arson is an offence at which the human mind stands appalled, and in men's minds, back to the earliest days, the home and all it stood for, the household goods, have been cherished things, things ranking amongst the most sacred in life. I feel that if the seeds that have been sown in the last year are to perish and die that we must take steps to strip the thin little rag of idealism from these two crimes, the thin little vestige or scrap of that that they may have, because people professing idealism urged their followers to resort to such methods. Deputy Johnson says that this penalty is degrading. It may be necessary to show how degrading these two offences are to attach this penalty, this humiliating penalty. It may be necessary to mark our horror of these two offences and to mark the strength of our convictions that either they or the nation must perish, to attach very signal and very severe penalties to them. I think it is so necessary. I think that the ordinary penalty of imprisonment has its edge blunted for the people who resort to these two crimes, and if I believed that by any other means than the means proposed in this Bill these offences could be checked and stamped out I would not have inserted this penalty of flogging. But I do not believe that you will adequately grapple with and stamp out these offences by imprisonment. This has been called a reversal of progress. Deputy Johnson used another word which I marked. He called it a reversal of Christianisation.

Now, in all reverence let me say that the Lord Himself in righteous anger scourged with a whip of cords the people whom He found desecrating the holy places. The people who have been violating Irish homes in the name of Irish liberty, who have been robbing Irish citizens by virtue of their guns, will not stand checked by the normal sanctions of the law and they will not stand in fear of imprisonment. I say that believing it to be absolutely true, and I say that if any member of the Executive Council believed that imprisonment would be a sufficient deterrent we would not resort to any other method. The situation in the country is known to every Deputy and scarcely needs to be stressed. You have this combination: that you have summoned up here the worst instincts of man, and you have together with that the lethal weapons secreted from one end of Ireland to the other. These two factors will fuse and will produce both of these crimes. The criminal instinct will find the lethal weapon, and people will try to live by their guns in the future as they have lived for the last year. They have got out of the way of work, and out of the wholesome mentality that work develops and preserves in man, and have got into the way of living by crime. Men go on from year to year, very often living humdrum, routine and moderately respectable kind of lives. Some day the bond snaps. There are many bonds, moral bonds, and bonds that could not exactly be described as belonging to the supernatural sphere, bonds of human respect and also the bond of ordinary decency, the kind of decency that a pagan might have. These bonds, I say, go and the man stands a predatory savage prepared to prey on his fellow-man for his living.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

That is the kind of problem we have to face here in this insula sanctorum et doctorum. I do not say for a moment that such problems would not arise to the same extent, or to a greater extent, in other countries. They could. I never believed in the theory of the double dose of original sin for Irishmen. I think that probably in other countries similarly situated, much the same might have happened as has happened here. I would be even prepared to concede that much worse things might have happened than have happened here. But we are dealing with a situation that has developed here, and I tell Deputies, solemnly speaking with a more intimate knowledge than most Deputies could have, speaking with a knowledge of police reports from the various counties and statistics in my mind which I do not propose to state to the Dáil, for the obvious reason that they would be distorted and used by political enemies to the discredit of the country, but speaking with these things well in my mind, I say that if these two offences are to be stamped out sufficiently quickly you must have resort to very special and very stringent methods, and the credit of the country demands that they be stamped out in the shortest possible space of time. When I say the credit of the country, I say it in a two-fold sense. The financial credit of the country demands that these crimes be ended at once, and the good name and prestige of the country demand that they be ended. I can almost hear Deputy Johnson making a mental comment that the country's prestige will not be improved by resort to the penalties mentioned here in Sub-section (4), and that whatever we gained by checking or diminishing those crimes, we will lose by the fact that we resorted to those penalties. I know that that is his outlook. I have appreciated it from the start in connection with this Bill—that he thinks and he feels that we are wrong, and he believes that he is right. I do not think, however, that it will be held to the discredit of this Government either here or elsewhere that it placed the protection of the decencies of life, the preservation of the decencies of life, and the protection of the plain decent citizens of the country beyond and above the sensibilities of the robber and the man who resorted to arson. It is the duty of a Government to govern. It is the duty of a Government to protect, to give the utmost possible protection to, citizens. The citizens of this country have a right not to be robbed, not to have their houses and property burned, and they have a right to demand from their Executive that ample measures be taken to check those offences. They must not be left at the mercy of the criminal who has lost all sense of right and wrong because he was taught crime as a means of forwarding a political ideal, because crime was introduced to him wrapt round with the trappings of idealism. The responsibility for that lies on the people who resorted to it, but we must deal with the consequences. We must make it very clear to everyone here that the man who robs and the man who burns is not a hero, but a most cowardly coward, that he is not an idealist yielding to an amiable eccentricity, but that he is the lowest form of criminal. On the Second Reading of this Bill a metaphor was used which I did not like. I did not think that it was a good metaphor, but it was said that every sore back in the country would be a monument of our inability to govern. If the sore backs are to be monuments let us inquire closely what they will be monuments of. I differ from the Deputy. I think they will be thought to be monuments to the fact that we appreciate the necessity of ending these two crimes in the shortest possible space of time, monuments to our determination to end them even at the cost of the finer feelings of the robber and the burner, even, mayhap, at the sacrifice of some finer feelings of our own. You see we have had to outrage in the execution of our responsibility certain of our feelings. Deputies know that.

They know we have had to arrest and imprison and even execute people who were our friends and who were our comrades, and Deputies do know, even though at times they talk as if they did not, that that was not a pleasant task for us. Deputies do know that that was undertaken and carried through by us only because we were supported by the feeling that these things were necessary in the proper discharge of our stewardship to the people of Ireland. Deputies get worked up occasionally and they get up and talk as if they believed that members of the Executive Council, or members of the Army Council were blood-thirsty ruffians or flinty-hearted persons devoid of all human feelings. I know that they do not believe that. I know that in calmer moments it has been necessary for us, or we, at least, have considered it necessary to sink and control the natural promptings of our hearts because we consider that those conflict with the due discharge of our responsibilities. It is so in this Bill and so in fact throughout the Bill, and so in truth with regard to this Section. No one likes to have to resort to the penalty of flogging, and, going a step further, no one likes to have it known elsewhere that it was necessary to have to resort to that penalty in this country in order to check certain crimes. We would much sooner it was not necessary; but we do consider it necessary and we do consider it is our duty to tell the Dáil that we believe that the combination of hidden arms and a rather general tendency to crime and to give free play to the lowest instincts will create here these two offences on a scale which the normal sanction of the law would not be sufficient to check. We come here and say that there has been a retrogression from the standards to which civilisation and society had attained and to meet that retrogression you must take a step back also in your penalty and go back to those penalties of corporal punishment which every man would be glad to have laid aside if certain circumstances permitted that they could be laid aside. But it is surely my duty, and it is surely our duty, if we considered that those penalties, and those penalties only, will check these offences, to come here and say that in an open, responsible, straight-forward spirit. Deputies must choose deliberately. I say if you rely on the sanction of mere imprisonment to deal with these two offences you will not stamp them out as quickly as they ought to be if this country is to live and flourish and go forward in peace, progress and reconstruction. Deputies must choose whether they prefer to respect the finer feelings of the criminal and to have robbery and arson rife in this country from end to end, or whether they will figuratively grit their teeth and go through with this thing for six months in the hope that at the end of six months they will have shown adequately that neither of these two crimes is heroic, that they are in fact ignominious offences demanding an ignominious penalty.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The facts as to the late prevalence of arson and robbery under arms, and the likelihood that there will be, perhaps, on an extensive enough scale, a repetition of these offences are all quite admitted, but I respectfully suggest that after he had retold for us the story of all that, the Minister very largely begged the question before us. He gives it as his considered opinion, and the considered opinion of the Executive Council, that the employment of this particular form of punishment is going to achieve the end which he wants to achieve, namely, the suppression of these two offences and the putting of criminals of this kind into a class apart from all other criminals. Now, he has brought no evidence and nothing to show that that opinion of his and of the Executive Council is well founded. Such opinion, at least, the majority of opinion that has been expressed in other countries as to the efficacy of flogging or whipping, or indeed of any form of torture, has been dead against torture because it is torture, and it is just because it is torture that it is objectionable. It is not out of any great consideration for the finer feelings of criminals that one opposes a measure like this. It is out of consideration for the finer feelings of human beings of the whole nation and of civilised beings in general. The Minister made a false analogy when he referred, as a kind of parallel, to the driving of the money-changers out of the Temple, but will the Minister say that that particular kind of whipping is the whipping that is going to be inflicted under this Bill? No, it is not. The whipping provisions under this Bill are taken from the ordinary British whipping provisions which are torture. Now, the light use of ordinary whips on animals is not, as far as I know, an offence in law, but the searing of the flesh of animals and the breaking of the skins of animals by excessive beating, is a crime known to the law, and is a punishable offence under the law. There is no analogy at all in what the Minister has said. It is a good many years since one of the most distinguished of Irishmen, a man who would have had no hesitation in punishing in the most drastic way, consonant with humanity and morality, Parnell, said that "flogging is an evil and has been used at all times by tyrants for purposes of their own, and so long as it remains it will continue to be used in an unlawful and cruel manner." Again he denied that even people guilty of the crime of garroting ought to be flogged, for it was a disgusting and inhuman punishment. I agree. There is one, and only one, argument that any Government can produce to justify flogging. It cannot produce the argument that it has been effective, for it has not been effective. At different places and at different times it has been adopted to deal with particular crimes, but the advocates of its use for that class of criminals have always said that it is not necessary to use it for other crimes, but that it is necessary for this particular one or two crimes. It is the same here. The only argument that can be used in justification is that it is one of the instruments of torture necessary to impress the community with the power of the State. I submit that in this case, as in most cases, the use of torture shows and reveals in a Government the very essence of despotism. It is no argument in reply to say that the majority either of this Dáil or the majority of this people approve of a particular measure. That makes it no less despotism, because no Legislature and no Government is invested, or can be invested, with such power and such authority that every act it performs or gives sanction to is therefore a rightful act. Now, the Minister speaks of the decencies of life. We are all agreed with him on that, but we think that the adoption of this measure is a violation of the decencies of life. He thinks—I believe he is mistaken—that these scourged backs will be a monument to the ability and sense of duty of the Government. Well, if it is mere monuments like that that he wants he is welcome to them, but if it is monuments he wants he can have even more effective monuments to show to the people. He might, for instance, brand people convicted of arson with the letter A on their foreheads. That kind of thing has been done on exactly the same argument as the Minister brings forward here. He could brand the robber with the letter R on his forehead, so that everybody might see it.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. George Nicholls): The Deputy has exceeded the ten minutes allowed.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I regret having done so.

Mr. LYONS: In support of the amendment to delete Sub-section (4) I wish to say that I think this amendment should get the sympathy of every member of the Dáil. When we take into account the class of prisoners who will be entitled according to this Bill to receive this punishment I am sure that neither Deputy Johnson nor any Deputy on these benches will have any sympathy. We have no sympathy, for instance, with the man who goes out for the sole purpose of robbing his neighbour by the aid of a revolver or the man who may go out with the full intention in his mind to set fire to his neighbour's dwelling or the man who may lie in wait watching his opportunity to take the life of his fellow-citizen. A certain class of prisoner, however, under this Bill when it becomes law can be sentenced by the Judge to the punishment mentioned. Any prisoner for the slightest offence which he may commit against this Act will be or can be sentenced by the Judge to flogging. Now I do not think that at our time of life in this twentieth century we are going to go back to the year '33, when flogging was first introduced. Surely we are advancing, but if we happen to be more or less of a "Paddy-go-easy" style of people whose desires are to follow in the footsteps of our great-grand or trebly-grand ancestors, and if the promoter of this Bill belongs to that class, I am sure the Saorstát is not going to advance. I think in fact we are taking three steps backwards. Now this Section specifies that in the case of a boy under 16 years of age the Judge can order a whipping to the extent of 25 strokes, but in the case of a person over 16 years of age the number of strokes specified shall be 50. I am sure that the Minister really means that the Judge shall specify 50 strokes.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: The Bill says (b) in the case of any other person the number of strokes at such whipping shall not exceed 50.

Mr. LYONS: I was taking it for granted that the Justices appointed under the Minister for Home Affairs would inflict the heaviest penalty.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: The Deputy is not entitled to make such an assumption as that.

Mr. LYONS: It lies with the Judge to specify the number of strokes. In the case of persons whose age does not exceed 16 the number of strokes does not exceed twenty-five, and in the case of other persons the number of strokes specified is between twenty-five and fifty. It is for the Judge to specify the number of strokes between twenty-five and fifty. We realise to the fullest extent the punishment that is to be inflicted under this Bill and the powers which you give to the Judge. To my mind flogging is the most horrible act that can be introduced for any civilised people. If you take a man out to flog him you have to strip him. You are not going to flog him with a top coat on, especially if it is made of a shoddy material that is being worn by some portions of the Army at the present time. Having stripped a man you tie him to a post, then you get one or two strong men whom may be chosen by the Judge to use an instrument specified by the Judge. It does not say whether it is to be a cat-o'-nine-tails or a birch, and you cut the flesh off the man's bones, he is, of course, helpless, being tied to a stake. I notice that the Minister for Defence shakes his head, which leads me to think that he believes the flesh shall not be cut off a man's bones, but how can you flog a man and give him fifty strokes without cutting him? I can assure this Dáil that I want to see criminals who stoop so low as to rob for their own personal ends, or who burn the homes of their neighbours, punished. But there are other means of punishment than flogging. Flogging is too old a punishment to be adopted by a nation in its infancy as we are.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: The Deputy has now exceeded his ten minutes.

MINISTER for EDUCATION (Professor Eoin MacNeill): It is, of course, pleasant for certain Deputies here to assume the role of defenders and champions of human feelings and by their criticism directed against this Bill, especially against this particular provision, to convey the idea that members of the Government are lost to a proper sense of humanity and that they are not able to appreciate, as some Deputies can appreciate, all that has been said with regard to this aspect. I think there are two aspects put before us of this punishment of flogging. One aspect is that the punishment itself is degrading to those who receive it, and the other is that it is revolting to the minds of other persons. Now I do not know whether it is necessary for the members of the Government to proclaim that they are made of much the same clay as other people. They have probably quite as much of the average tenderness of feeling about matters of this kind as other people. It is really not a question of susceptibilities or sensibilities. If people allow themselves to be ruled by appeals of this kind it is not only in the treatment of prisoners and of the baser sort of criminals but in the treatment of innocent persons that they would wish to interfere and to impose limits. The surgeon daily in his ordinary operations has to do things which would be revolting to many hundreds and thousands of people if they were spectators of these things. I remember it was put forward at a previous stage that if this punishment were a justifiable one to be inflicted in prisons for these crimes why then should it not be performed in public? That was the test—the ordinary operations of the surgeon. We were asked to consent to have this flogging in public. If the surgeon were asked to perform his operations in public they would shock the natural feeling, not only of some persons but a very large number of persons, and very probably the majority of persons. The case that we have to deal with is far more grave than the relief of the ailments of individuals.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage took the Chair.

Professor MacNEILL: It is a disease, but a disease of the body politic, a disease of the community, and, just as we are supposed to be unfeeling and inhuman in these matters, so it has been suggested that in bringing forward this Bill we have been acting at one time in [Professor MacNeill.] opposition to the spirit of the Constitution which we have adopted here and at another time in a manner dangerous to the liberty of private citizens. The fact is, and I think the vast majority of the public at all events already recognise it, that the object of this Bill and the object of the severities proposed under it is to make the Constitution possible, to prevent it from being rendered impossible and to bring it into existence. At present it exists as an embryo, and the operation of bringing an embryo into existence and into full life is very often attended with pain and very often attended with circumstances which make people probably regard it as painful to their finer nature. It is the same with regard to the liberty of the individual. It is to make liberty possible for the individual in this country that this measure is proposed, because it is not only for the particular individuals who are threatened by arson or threatened by robbery, but because if these threats are in any measure successful they strike at the liberty of every person in the country without exception. The measures proposed here in this Bill are designed to give effect to the Constitution and to give it reality, to allow the Constitution to get life and breath and to give liberty to every individual. We have had numerous and oft-repeated statements in regard to this particular punishment of flogging. We have been challenged to point out whether we have reasonable ground for supposing that this punishment will act as a deterrent. We have reasonable ground. One of the Deputies who spoke instanced the action of Parnell. Parnell, we know, abolished flogging as a disciplinary measure in the British Army. As we know, Parnell was instrumental in procuring its abolition, I do not remember—I presume the Deputy has taken the trouble to verify what he has said—that Parnell objected also to flogging as a punishment for the crime of garrotting, but I do remember that that punishment was effective in stamping out the crime of garrotting; that, I think, is a fact well known to a very large number of the public.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: It is a fiction.

Professor MacNEILL: It may be denied, I do not know how much the denial amounts to. It was also put forward that the object of this penalty was to create terror in order to give the notion of the power of the State.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

I must remind the Minister for Education that his ten minutes has expired.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I suppose it is in order for me to continue my speech, and that it will be in order for the Minister who has just sat down to resume his speech after I finish. The Minister for Education, I think, is in error like a good many other people, in pleading that flogging had the effect of putting down the prevalence or checking the prevalence of garrotting, particularly in London. It is a fiction that has existed for a good many years and even well recognised authorities have given some colour to it. But it does not happen so far as my information goes—my information may be at fault—to correspond with the fact, because the garrotting outbreak in England was effectively suppressed before certain Acts, particularly the Act of 1863, reintroduced the punishment of flogging unless I am very much mistaken, and one of the authorities testifying to the suppression of garrotting before the 1863 Act was Mr. H. H. Asquith. I am handed here extracts from a speech delivered by two British Home Secretaries in the House of Commons in March, 1900. Mr. Asquith was Home Secretary from 1892 to 1895, and in 1900 he made this statement:—

“As to garrotting, that crime had been brought to an end as a serious danger before the House, in a fit of panic, due to one of its own members having been garrotted, resorted to legislation. Garrotting was put down without resort to the lash, by a fearless but, I agree, a severe administration of the criminal law.”

On the other side of the House there was Lord Ridley, who had been Home Secretary from 1895 to 1900, and he said:—“Reference had been made to the Garrotting Act. He agreed with the history of that Act, at all events so far as London was concerned, given by the Right Hon. Gentleman, Mr. Asquith, and that the rapid and severe action which put down garrotting took place before the passing of the Act of 1863.”

As a matter of fact, many of the legal text books and other books of information have put down the particular Act referred to as 1861; it was 1863 as a matter of fact, but I repeat that there is no evidence as to the efficacy of flogging for any of the crimes for which at various stages it has been specifically prescribed, and that most of the evidence is against it as an efficacious method. Reference has been made to what is in fact the Mosaic Law, but we should have kept at this time of day, far away from the Mosaic Law, even though we had as bad a period in the last twelve months as any period in history. One of the great dangers to the State, and to the community, in the introduction of flogging, is that the idea of flogging gets hold of men's minds and is extended from one offence to another, and to many offences. To-day it is advocated for one thing, to-morrow it is advocated for another; its failure in each does not prevent it from being defended, and it is always prescribed for something else when it has failed previously. There were many people who adopted the most severe provisions of the Mosaic Law. English people in America have adopted many of them at various stages in their history, and they have adopted whipping and have extended whipping to many things that no one here at the moment would suggest they should be extended to. They have even gone so far as to prescribe whipping for a breach of the Sabbath, for abusive language, for defamation of character, and so on. Sometime or other it will be quite within the competence of the Government here in Ireland, if we allow these things to be done now, to say that some particular offence, which at the time seemed not particularly odious, should be punished under this measure. I repeat that flogging is torture, and nothing but torture, and it is because it is torture that I object most strongly to it. It would be no use in any sense of the word if it was not for the infliction of physical suffering and the infliction of actual physical suffering must be torture. Now, we know the effect that that will have in two or three directions in Ireland and elsewhere. We remember the effects that were produced by torture on Tom Hales and we know the effect it had upon his comrades. We do not want anything of that kind in Ireland. You have got, or you ought to have got, numerous measures that you could use. From the time flogging is adopted, and from the time it will be adopted, its adoption will be advocated on the very argument and on the very ground that the Ministry here and now are advocating it.

Professor MacNEILL: The Deputy has undertaken to correct me. He spoke about garrotting having been suppressed before the Act of 1863, and brought forward evidence of two members of the British Legislature on that point. Am I to understand that the Deputy supposes there was no garrotting, no outbreak of garrotting in Britain after that?

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Not at all.

Professor MacNEILL: There was an outbreak of garrotting after that time. It was not in London; it was in Liverpool long after that time, and at a time sufficiently recent for myself to remember it being a matter of conversation, and if I am not mistaken, it certainly was publicly believed at the time—I am not furnished with books of reference on these points—that outbreak of garrotting in Liverpool was put down by flogging.

Now, if corporal punishment inflicting pain be torture, I wonder how many Deputies here have grown up without coming through some experience of it. Of course it belongs to the old world, and it is fashionable for some people to say, nowadays, we have hospitals for dogs and people dying without hospitals. It is fashionable for a certain number of sentimentalists, nowadays, to say that corporal punishment ought to be abolished altogether. If it were in order I would like very much to call for a show of hands here among Deputies to testify, each for himself, who has not been corporally punished over and over again.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: On a point of information, may I ask Deputy McNeill if the whipping provided for in the Bill corresponds any way closely to the corporal punishment administered by a school teacher or parent?

Professor MacNEILL: I understand the Deputy to say flogging is essentially a torture. If it is so, then the flogging of smalls boys is essentially torture.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: As prescribed in the Bill.

Professor MacNEILL: I have corrected the point with regard to garrotting being suppressed before 1863. It broke out afterwards. My information is that when it broke out afterwards it was corrected by the punishment of flogging.

Mr. JOHNSON: Not so repeatedly.

Professor MacNEILL: As to the argument that this punishment, if adopted, could be extended to other things and, therefore, should not be resorted to, if we adopt that argument we will stop anything. We will fall back on the Tolstoi system of punishing nobody. That is not our system. What we are proposing here is that for crimes of a certain origin, which have become a mental disease, a very severe and marked deterrent shall be adopted, not to magnify the notion at all of the power of the State. I am certainly not out to magnify the power of the State, but to magnify the rights of the individual Irishman and Irishwoman.

Mr. JOHNSON: Deputy MacNeill has referred to the recrudescence of the flogging campaign following upon the suppressing of garrotting in London. I think it is undoubtedly true, and I am sure the statements by two Home Secretaries quoted by Deputy O'Shanon will be accepted as a fairly good evidence that at any rate London garrotting was receding if it had not been suppressed before the Garrotting Act was passed. Nobody claims, I think, that robbery with violence has ever been put down by any form of punishment. Nobody claims or has claimed here that arson will be put down by flogging. The utmost that has been claimed by the flagellants is that the epidemic of garrotting or the epidemic of robbery by violence in Liverpool which was followed by the campaign of Mr. Justice Day was put down by flogging. That is the case made by the Minister for Education. He says this is a disease which has broken out and the argument runs that in the same way as the hooligan epidemic in Liverpool which was treated by Mr. Justice Day by the lash was thereby cured, so will the fire and robbery epidemic that has been existing in Ireland recently be put down by this remedy of flogging. It is a very difficult question to decide whether the hooliganism which was attacked by Mr. Justice Day in Liverpool by the lash was as a matter of fact suppressed by the use of the lash. Mr. Justice Hopwood, the Recorder at the same time as Mr. Justice Day was carrying out his campaign, had quite the opposite view. He was the Recorder of Liverpool and took a different view of the effect of the lash. So different was it that his contention was that following the flogging the campaign actually extended for a longer period than normal outbreaks of that kind had been extended by the very use of the lash. People came back and back again for the same offence having had the lash. It is recorded that people asked for the lash rather than be sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. The evidence is not so convincing as the Minister for Education would think. On the contrary it is very unconvincing, and different judges have different notions of the effect of the lash upon crime of this kind. If there is any doubt about the effect in curing a particular form of disease—the Minister has spoken of it as a disease and I agree with that definition—you are not going to check the disease of the mind by application of the lash to the body. I submit that here we have no evidence whatever of the increasing prevalence of those offences, and therefore there is no need adduced which at all convinces one of the necessity of pushing forward extraordinary methods of punishment. The whole case that is made in favour of this is that there may be thrown out into the country men who have been mentally affected, and who will resort to this method of crime. Can we not wait until we see whether that prophecy shows any signs of coming true? It is put forward here as a measure to stop this epidemic of crime from developing, but undoubtedly the crime, though it has been rife, has receded. The President and Ministers tell us that is so. Then, why should we introduce this extraordinary method of treating a disease which is already in the process of being cured? The Minister says you must get your medicine ready for the possibilities of a new outbreak. But I say if that medicine is only a doubtful cure, if it has been ineffective in similar classes of crime, then we should hesitate before prescribing that medicine for a disease already receding. Let us make more inquiry. Let us prepare the Civil Code after inquiry. It is clear that Ministers have not thoroughly examined evidence for and against the revival of this flogging system of punishment. The instrument has not yet been decided upon. It has not been decided whether it is to be a lash which will cut with one stroke, that will wound or hack, or that will only slightly mark the back. No decision has been come to. The Minister has not examined yet into the merits or demerits of this instrument for the purpose of curing this disease. Is it intended to be a whip with thongs? It is not stated; it is left to the discretion of the Judge. Is it intended that it shall be a whip that will take out the flesh, such as the Russian knout? It is not stated. I submit there is not any case being made for urgency for this. The disease is receding. We have no assurance, no reason to believe, that it will necessarily become rife within the next few weeks. Let us wait, and in the meantime make a thorough inquiry as to whether the application of this kind of punishment is likely to be effective, judging by precedent. I am assuming that you are willing, for the sake of immediate gain, to do what I believe to be an irrevocable wrong. We do not believe, as the Minister thought, that he and his colleagues are any less sensitive to human pain and suffering, or have any less humanitarian feeling. It is, in my belief, the fact that Ministers have allowed themselves to suppress those feelings at the call of the intellect. They believe it is desirable to suppress those feelings, to go ahead with the work of punishment and repression, and not to allow their humanitarian feelings to have any play upon what they conceive to be their duty as judged merely by reason. I suggest it is not good politics, let alone sociology or morality, utterly to suppress human feeling.

Mr. DESMOND FITZGERALD:

There seems to be a great deal of doubt as to the effectiveness of this measure. One opponent suggests that it is abhorrent. Another suggests that the prisoners like it. Reference was made to garrotting. We need not go back to the Garrotting Act to see the effectiveness of this measure. It still exists in the Prison Code for assaulting warders. I have seen prisoners who assaulted warders who after receiving punishment were so cowed they would not answer me when I spoke to them. Its effectiveness is beyond doubt in the prisoner of to-day, and when a man suggests that a prisoner asks for it in preference to imprisonment I do not believe it.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: That is corporal punishment. The Minister for Education spoke of flogging.

The PRESIDENT: There is a great deal of sympathy and sentiment expressed by gentlemen on the other side for people who had very little sympathy with others themselves. They started out to show humanity that no matter what laws have been passed or what things have been done, all must be tempered with a superabundance of humanitarian motives. We were told here when we had to take very strong and very severe measures against the Irregulars in the early days that we were going to breed more Irregularism. It has not bred, it has not spread Irregularism. We are dealing with what one might call dying phases of Irregularism, fading to this extent that people are hesitating as to whether they will operate their terror still further by robberies or by burnings or by any other destructive experiments upon a people whose hearts they believe are filled with human kindness, thinking it was all over and that it is moral suasion that has won and not the strong arm of the State asserting authority in spite of their damned stubbornness. We have broken their stubbornness by strength. The best man amongst them admitted first that he never thought they would be executed, and secondly, that he never thought they would be sentenced to death. But he had to deal not with his friends, but with men who realised they had a great deal of responsibility and knew there were times when one must regulate his sentiment and sympathy with his duty. Even if the case were as stated that this particular form of punishment did not stop garrotting there is no use in telling me it will not stop it here. I am perfectly satisfied that it will. I have experience where the sternest and strictest measures brought home to people what we might call the sanity of the situation without eradicating the disease. I have seen people ruined with this particular form of disease. I have known them to have been in such a condition that it was as regular to them as taking their meals that they had to participate in something against society. There are several young men at present in jail. Personally, I do not think they will start this game of burning or robbery

[The President.] under arms. I do think if there is one thing more than another that will lead them to it it is the fact that we are getting more sentimental, that we are getting more sympathy with those poor sufferers who have led themselves into this. In my experience I have had to examine various orders of society. My experience invariably has been that the robber or person out to destroy is an absolute coward. When he came up against his own strength he quailed before it. When he came up against authority that was determined to exercise that authority when that authority was just, he would have had, if he could, his revenge, but he generally realised where the real strength lay, and the real strength in this physiological problem is to be shown in an utter indifference to those people's shrieks. I would like the gentlemen opposite who are as much interested in the stability of the State as we are to realise that those robbers are even more dangerous from the point of view of business and employment than any sort of political disturbance. If they doubt me in that I invite their attention to the balance sheet of the banks.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is no doubt of that. The only doubt is whether this is efficacious.

The PRESIDENT: Very good. We are on absolutely different lines with regard to that. Particular instances are quoted where Mr. Parnell got credit for abolishing that punishment in the Army. Is that a fair comparison? In one case it was a disciplinary torture that was removed from the Code regulating the British Army or Navy. But in our case what are we dealing with? Is it ordinary crime? is it something that can be explained or excused? It is not, and Deputies know that. The use of the gun has become rather too common, very much too common. I may tell Deputies that at a time when we had very great difficulty in maintaining the struggle against the British this was one of the methods adopted to correct people who committed crimes. I do not know that it was effective. I have no returns to show for it, but I have not heard of a single case of a person who got a corrective of that kind who again came before one of the Courts functioning under the Dáil during the War. I have never heard of a case.

I did know of one case of a man who so suffered, and who if he had the opportunity I am perfectly convinced he would not commit the same crime again. Afterwards he called on me. He was a young man who was misled. He was not a coward. He was ordered out of the country, and he came to me to have him allowed back. We feel as much as you do. I will not forget easily the effect of the particular incident described by the Minister for External Affairs. It has been the experience in those cases that a person once corrected in that manner does not commit an offence punishable by the same corrective.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: All that the President says may be true but it does not follow from that that this is the only method of correcting a particular kind of disease or removing a particular kind of disorder. I should really like to put the question to the two Ministers who have spoken in connection with a certain prison incident whether their object in making this provision is to prevent offenders who commit one offence from repeating that offence or whether their object is to prevent the prevalence of the disease as a social disease and not merely in an individual? The very fact that so recently as 1916 or 1917 a particular punishment was inflicted as a disciplinary measure in a prison goes to show that despite all that has been inflicted again and again in prisons for attacks on warders, violent and presumably murderous attacks, these attacks occur in those prisons again and again. It may be that a particular prisoner who has been flogged once for making an attack on a warder will not repeat that offence. A good deal depends on the quality of the prisoner just as a good deal depends on the quality and character of the young man whom the President cites as coming to him. I have met prisoners in prisons who suffered disciplinary measures of a much less severe kind for lesser offences and they did not repeat the particular offences. Some time again they might. It is arguing a bit out of the way I think to say that because in certain cases a certain effect was produced that the effect is going to be general. The weight of evidence, as I think we have clearly shown here this morning, is against all that and the very tone of the President's speech shows what I commented on a while ago, that the whole idea behind the thing is terrorism—meeting one ferocious act by an act still more ferocious, so much so that I would be inclined to paraphrase a learned Deputy of the Dáil, who said, in giving his objections to a certain Bill, that the provisions of the Bill were largely an interference with property of a certain kind. This Bill is an interference with persons of a certain kind. That Deputy said he thought that that particular Bill ought to be called a Bill for the outlawry of certain debtors, and the ferocious destruction of the same. This Bill is alternatively popularly titled a Flogging Bill, and might be entitled a Bill for the ferocious punishment of certain offenders.

The PRESIDENT: The Deputy asked me if I believed that any person who had been flogged would not offend again. My answer was given in reply to Deputy Johnson, who stated that there were cases in which people asked for flogging instead of some other punishment. I believe that the very fact that this Bill is passed will limit very much the particular activities that we mean to limit and that it is a deterrent rather than a punishment for particular people.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 12; Níl, 37.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

1.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Séamus Breathnach.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Deasamhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stainias.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Liam Thrift.
Gearóid Mac Giobáin.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hOgáin.

Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.
Scoilse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaich.
Croistoir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dólaín.
Aindriú Ó Laimhín.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faioite.
Séamus de Burea.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move Amendment 45, to delete in Sub-section (4), lines 46 and 47, the words "convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction or."

The effect of the amendment is that the Sub-section shall not apply to cases in which the persons are tried before a court of summary jurisdiction; in other words that the Sub-section will only apply in cases where people are found guilty on indictment, that is where they are tried before a Judge and jury.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

MOTION TO REPORT PROGRESS.

Mr. EVERETT: I beg to move that the Committee do now Report Progress, and ask leave to sit again to-morrow.

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: I second the motion.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: We cannot accept that motion. I will move to Report Progress when I finish the Section.

Question put: "That the Committee Report Progress, and ask leave to sit again to-morrow."

The Dáil divided: Tá, 12; Níl, 36.

Tá.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Séamus Breathnach.
Deasmhúmhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stainneas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Liam Thrift.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mag Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hOgáin.
Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.

Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaóich.
Croistóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Aindriú Ó Laimhín.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Proinsias Mag Aonghusa.
Earnon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Séamus de Burea.

Motion declared lost.

Mr. GERALD FITZGIBBON took the Chair at this stage.

[DEBATE RESUMED.]

Mr. NAGLE: I beg to move Amendment 46, to substitute in Sub-section (4), line 50, the word "may" for the word "shall." The object of the amendment is to leave to the Court to determine whether corporal punishment shall be inflicted or not. It does not make it obligatory on the Court to decide what corporal punishment, if any, shall be inflicted. I would ask the Minister to accept the amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I have given a good deal of consideration to this amendment. The farthest I could go in trying to meet the views of the Deputy as embodied in the amendment is to agree to insert in the sub-section some words such as these. After the word "Schedule" on line 50, to insert the words "shall, unless the Court is satisfied that there are special circumstances in the case which constitute a mitigation of the offence or," and then the section would read on. That is the limit of the concession that I could make to meet this amendment, and I trust it will be accepted by the Deputy.

Mr. NAGLE: I am willing to withdraw the amendment on the understanding that the words mentioned by the Minister will be inserted in the sub-section.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. NAGLE: I propose to move the following amendment:—"In Sub-section (4), line 53, after the words "in addition to" to insert "or in substitution for."

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I could not accept that amendment nor make any concession that would at all meet the point of view embodied. The substantial sentence is a sentence of imprisonment, and I could not agree to make the whipping sentence a substitute for that or even to leave that to the discretion of the Court.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister says that the substantial sentence is a sentence of imprisonment. The sentence which he relies upon, as they put it in the Courts, is the sentence of flogging. One would like to hear some justification for them both. If there is to be a sentence, if imprisonment is to be the substantial one, in the case of a person found guilty on indictment and sentenced to, say, three years' penal servitude plus flogging, the flogging may deter him from committing robbery by violence certainly for three years, but so will the penal servitude. The argument runs that it will deter other people if he is sentenced to be flogged. Does the Minister consider that the mere pronouncement of a sentence is a thing that will deter other people or is it not contended that it is that on coming back into society the impression that flogging has made on that prisoner will be related to those around him, the pain that he suffered, the indignity he suffered—is it not those things being told to his friends and associates in crime that are to be the deterrent? Is not that the argument? One cannot understand how the detention for three years plus punishment with the lash is going to be a deterrent to other people unless the prisoner is able to show the scars of his wound stripes or, at least, to tell the stories of the pain that was inflicted. The reliance upon flogging as a remedy for this social disease, this disease of crime, surely makes it unnecessary that there should be a three years' detention as well. Is it necessary that there should be three years' penal servitude, or any other period of punishment, plus flogging if flogging is the cure? The Minister for Education must be mistaken. Does the President rely on flogging as a cure for this disease? If so, why also ask for imprisonment? If it is to be applied as a cure for a disease even, if it is to be applied for the purpose of deterring the prisoner from doing the same thing again, if flogging is to be the deterrent there is no need to pile on the agony and give any imprisonment in addition. Or is it to glut the ire of the flagellants that they must have imprisonment for fear flogging is not a corrective remedy or must they have flogging for fear imprisonment is no use? The case made on behalf of flogging as a method of punishment surely justifies the Dáil in thinking that that will be enough. If all that is claimed for it is justly claimed then there is no need for further punishment unless it is intended merely to punish out of vengeance. Now I ask the Minister to tell us his mind on this matter, whether he is relying upon the flogging to prevent the development of this crime or the recurrence of this crime or whether he is relying upon imprisonment to prevent an individual committing the crime anew in case flogging was not satisfactory as a deterrent? I ask the Minister to let us know upon which method of punishment he relies.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am surprised that Deputy Johnson, if he really believes all he has said with regard to the effect of flogging upon an individual, should be so anxious to have the individual suffering from its effects turned loose on the community immediately after the operation. As to which of these I rely on, I rely on the cumulative effect of both. I think, as I have said, that imprisonment alone would not be a deterrent sufficient to check the particular tendency there is in the country, and there is likely to be in the country, towards these two crimes which strike at the very root of society. I think that the flogging plus the incarceration, which gives a person time to think things over, will have a good effect. I rely not on one alone, but on the effect of both.

Mr. JOHNSON: You are backing for a win and a place?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Yes.

Mr. LYONS: I think the word used by the Minister—the word “operation”—is the proper interpretation of this Bill. He used that word when he asked whether Deputy Johnson wanted to have a person who was flogged turned out amongst the public the day after the operation. Like Deputy Johnson, I am surprised that the Minister wants to detain prisoners for three years after being flogged. If flogging is the remedy you say it is why do you try to detain people for three years afterwards? I fail to see why the Minister objects to this amendment. It is a very slight one and it is not going greatly to facilitate the unfortunate wretch who falls into your clutches, but it saves him a little pain and anxiety. I ask the Minister to make some little concession at least and accept a trivial amendment such as this.

Mr. JOHNSON: I find another English Judge, the one originally quoted, Mr. Justice Matthew, actually dealing with this specific case in Birmingham in 1898. There, of course, the flogging remedy was peculiarly adapted, in the minds of the advocates, for crimes upon women and children. Mr. Justice Matthew pointed out “it would be inhuman to add the lash to a sentence of penal servitude, for such a savage sentence would defeat its own ends. I believe that if a man had any good in him and is punished with the cat he is for the rest of his days either a broken-hearted man or becomes a reckless criminal." Mr. Justice Hawkins said, "You make a perfect devil of the man you flog," and when questioned as to the supposed efficacy of flogging in the case of garrotters he said, "I do not believe it ever did any good. In my opinion the cat and the birch do not substantially operate as powerful and permanent deterrents from the crimes for which they are applied either as respects the criminals themselves, upon whom they are inflicted or as effective warnings to others minded to commit similar offences. Those who commit serious crime for the sake of plunder are oftentimes in a state of excitement which deprives them of the power of reflection and renders them reckless of the consequences." The man who had actually flogged two hundred offenders wrote that he had made a very careful and unbiassed study of the effect of the whipping posts and had come to the conclusion that it was all bad. "It brings out of any man the spirit of revenge; it is hurtful and he ranks himself against law, order, and society." A recent Prime Minister of England, Mr. Asquith, when Home Secretary, said—

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. BLYTHE: On a point of order I think the Deputy is really repeating the arguments that he used on amendment 44.

Mr. JOHNSON: I admit I am repeating arguments, but I am repeating them in reference to this amendment. They had not the effect I desired on the other amendment but they may have on this.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): The Deputy is not, I think, entitled to debate the question whether flogging should be inflicted. The only point on this amendment is whether it should be in addition to or in substitution for another punishment.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is what I am directing my thoughts to—that in view of the effect of flogging it should be at least an alternative and not an additional punishment. The case that is being made by all who have spoken is that flogging was essentially a form of punishment for an exceptional form of crime in exceptional circumstances. The people had lost their balance, they had become moral wrecks and were apt to follow out this special course of crime, robbery under arms, and arson, and it was required in these special circumstances that there should be a form of punishment specially adopted in this Bill. Now, the argument was clearly made in defence of the section that the lashing, scourging, whipping, or flogging or whatever name may be given to it, was peculiarly adaptable to remedying this disease. No case was made that it should be merely an accompaniment of the ordinary method of punishment and, on the contrary, the case was made that it was to act as a deterrent. I think we are entitled to know how it is going to deter.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): The Deputy is going beyond the ruling. It has been decided that flogging may be inflicted and the only question is whether it should be inflicted in addition to or in substitution for the other remedy.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think I am in order in arguing that the deterrent effect did not depend upon there being imprisonment accompanying it. It cannot deter other people, except the prisoners, unless those other people are made aware in some way of the effect of the flogging upon the person who is punished, and they cannot be made aware of that if the person is detained for three years in a prison. The case for double punishment ought to be made before we are asked to agree that there will be this double punishment. The amendment is that either one or the other may be inflicted, but not both, and I think the Dáil is entitled to have some reason given to it as to why, when flogging has been imposed as a penalty, a prisoner should have three years to get over it.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 12; Níl, 35.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás MacEoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Séamus Breathnach.
Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Staineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.

Piaras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoch.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Séamus Ó Murchadha.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Séamus de Burca.
Croistoir Ó Broin.
Aindriú Ó Laimhin.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move Amendment 48:—In Sub-section (4) to delete the word "privately" and to substitute therefor the word "publicly." I am moving this amendment with the object of getting from the Minister some explanation as to the reason why this operation of flogging should be performed in private. I am really anxious to know—

Mr. D. MCCARTHY: I wish to ask is this amendment in order?

Mr. O'CALLAGHAN: Yes.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): Order, order. When Deputy O'Callaghan is selected to fill this place in the Chair he can give his decision. At present the matter is in my hands. The amendment is in order. Whipping was inflicted publicly up to a comparatively recent time, and it is in order to propose that it should be done in public again.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to have heard any reasons or suggestion why it was not in order or whether it was indecent to think that flogging should be conducted publicly. If the amendment suggested indecency or obscenity I could understand its being out of order. I am sure the Minister is not going to defend this operation being done in private on the ground that it is quite clean and decent if done privately, but obscene and indecent when done publicly. I am quite anxious to hear from the Minister his justification for the provision that this whipping shall be private. I think there is a good deal of risk entailed upon the public in providing that it should be a public punishment. I realise that the whole system is rather calculated to excite morbid feelings, and generally to inflame those feelings that ought to be suppressed, and I think it is likely that the public operation of flogging would be damaging in that regard, but notwithstanding that risk I am inclined to think that on balance it is rather better that if the operation is to be performed at all it should be done publicly rather than privately for several reasons. First, it would be known to the public indirectly, if not directly, what kind of an instrument had been ordered to be used by the Magistrate or the Judge who imposed the sentence; it would be possible to make public what the effects on the culprit, on the prisoner who is flogged, entailed in the first instance. But there is also the very grave consideration that there might then be a doctor available to ensure that the flogging did not entail capital punishment. It is necessary that a doctor should be at hand. One eminent medical man, Dr. Marshall Hall, says: "If the surgeon wishes to appreciate the effects of flogging on the culprit let him not stand far off and look on, but let him draw near and keep his finger on the patient's pulse. At each lash he will find that pulse falter. The man may brave it out, may suppress all expression of pain under this modern torture; but his heart, both physically and psychically, quails under it, and the pulse tells the tale; the heart sometimes so quails as to refuse to perform its pump-like office, and the silent patient turns pale and faints away. I assert from positive knowledge that each lash goes literally to the very heart, paralysing or enfeebling its action."

[Mr. Johnson.]

Now, the public infliction of this pain would at least make it possible for a surgeon or a doctor to be at hand to deal with the patient if the effect was greater than the Minister had contemplated. The gain, I suggest, is rather more than the loss, and I think that that is because the people who have not given way to morbid feelings would be made aware of the effects and then there would be some change made in the system. The privacy of flogging entails risks that I think we should not run. No doubt in the regulations that the Minister will make he will lay down that a certain number of doctors will be at hand, and that these doctors shall have certain wound dressings, and that all the requisites of the laboratory or of the dissecting table should be available. But they are not laid down in the Bill, and we have to trust to the good feeling of the Minister in that respect. I think, while I am somewhat doubtful, and have admitted my hesitation as to the relative merits of private as against public flogging, or the relative demerits of private as against public flogging, I am open to be convinced by the Minister that the privacy in this matter is of more value in preventing the development of the crime than public flogging, and that private flogging does not entail greater risk of inhumanity than public flogging. Perhaps he will also be able to convince me that publicity would, as a matter of fact, lead to the kind of morbid excitement that used to follow public hangings and that, on the whole, the kind of excitement that is created by gloating over pain inflicted upon a fellow mortal is not healthy. If that was the Minister's reason for ensuring that this flogging shall be privately done, or if he has any other reasons equally strong, I am quite prepared to be convinced, and I think it would be quite easy to convince me that publicity is not desirable in this matter.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am not accepting this amendment.

Mr. LYONS: After hearing that answer of the Minister to Deputy Johnson it makes one imagine that all the time taken up by the promoters of the Bill, and all the time the Deputies have given to criticism of the Bill have been absolutely wasted. If this amendment cannot be accepted by the Minister, and if he is quite genuine in his belief that this torture cannot be administered publicly, then I fail to see the necessity for having such a clause at all. Take, for example, the case of an offender flogged inside the prison. You give him from 25 to 50 lashes with whatever instrument may be recommended by the judge. Now, that will certainly have the effect in some slight way upon that offender, and if the Minister thinks that this clause in his Bill is going to do the wonderful miracles he has in mind, it would be much more proper as far as that is concerned, to have this offender taken through the streets, stripped and flogged as he passes along. The example to the remainder of the citizens of the Saorstát, the people who are to be saved by this clause in the Bill, would be very great indeed. To my mind the Minister wants to go back to the days of Jeanne d' Arc; he wants to go back to the time when the Christians were burned at the stake, and I think if the Minister did really bring forward such a Bill it certainly would be opposed from these benches, but it would be supported by Deputies on the benches on the other side of the House.

If a punishment is to be inflicted, or if you are to torture a citizen of the Saorstát, who may fall into your clutches, and if, through his torture, you want to show a good example to the citizens of the Saorstát, then let the victim be tortured in public. Why is it that he will not be tortured in public? Simply because the Minister and his supporters are ashamed of having their acts made public. That is why the Minister will not accept this amendment. I am sure it would look very degrading to the Government to have a man taken through the streets and brought probably to some public building, and to see two or three men scourging him with a lash until he had received from 25 to 50 strokes in front of all his fellow-citizens. Think what an effect that would have on those people who lived to see the day that their Government inflicted punishment of a kind that foreign Governments had abolished. It may have an effect, but why fight shy of it? The members of the Government are fighting shy of it, the Minister in charge of the Bill fights shy of it. He does not want to come out publicly; he does not want cries to be heard from a person whose flesh is being cut off his bones. He is prepared to do it behind prison walls in order, as he tells us, to safeguard the interest of the citizens of the Saorstát. If flogging will be instrumental in preventing crime, and in the opinion of the author of the Bill it will, then why not do it in public? There is no use in cloaking your tactics if they are to be instrumental in preventing crime such as robbery and arson. You will not take these prisoners out and flog them publicly, because you know that you yourselves would have to pay the penalty.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I would like to have heard from the Minister why exactly he does not accept this amendment. A certain Irishman has said that if flogging does all that is claimed for it and is really in a sense a messenger of light, why hide your birch under a bushel? The Minister does not say, and no supporter of the Minister says. I suggest that one of the reasons is that for once the sense of decency and humanity of Ministers has come out. They felt that the spectacle and the effect on public feeling and on the public mind would be such that there would be no public opinion behind such an institution except such public opinion as individual Deputies might give expression in the Dáil. I have here a description of one or two floggings of comparatively recent date, indicating the method by which the thing is done, and I suggest that if the Minister really wants to show all the citizens how much in earnest they are in carrying out the duties that are imposed on them—duties which they claim cannot be fulfilled in respect of certain offences except by flogging—it would be not exactly edifying, but at all events educa-tive to a certain degree for the citizens to know exactly how the thing is done. If that is so it might well be done in public and not in private. One description I have says:—

“The prisoner is fastened to a triangle with something somewhat resembling stocks so that he could not move hand or foot. The back is bared; the man who wields the cat shakes out its nine thongs, raises it aloft with both hands, and deals the criminal the first blow across the shoulders. A red streak appears on the white skin. Again the thongs are shaken out, again the hands rise, again the whips are brought down with full force, and the streak on the skin grows redder and broader. A turn-key gives out the number as each stroke falls, and the silence is only broken by his voice, by the descent of each successive blow, and by the cries or groans of the sufferer. But though there are instances in which the ruffian proves himself a coward, and yells with the very anticipation of pain before he has even been struck, there seems, for the most part, to be the same spirit in the flogging room which the highwaymen formerly displayed on the gallows. The man who has been guilty of the most atrocious cruelty will do his best to conceal the smart which he is made to feel himself, and if any sound is heard from him at all it proceeds from an involuntary action of his vocal organs, which he strives his utmost to check. After twenty lashes, he will retain a look of defiance, though almost fainting and barely able to walk to his cell.”

I quote the following remarks made by an English legislator, Mr. J. M. Henderson, in the British House of Commons, in November, 1912. He says:—

“On the invitation of the Home Secretary I went to see the lash. It consists of nine thonged whip-cords thirty-three inches long. The Home Secretary tells me that it does not draw blood. I am not a strong man, but I will undertake, if the Home Secretary will allow me to practise on him, to draw blood in several places at the first blow. Of course, if you brought the swish down lightly, you would not hurt anybody; you would not twist the cord; but if you use the wrist, as you must do, you are bound to cut the flesh. I care not what any constable says, I will undertake what every stroke of the thong will cut the flesh. If that is not torture, then I do not know what is torture."

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Another instance:—

"The prisoner is strapped down in a half-kneeling, half-lying position, with the head over the end of a wooden frame following the curves of the body, called in humorous prison parlance the 'pony,' whipped as a schoolboy is whipped, but with a strong rod pickled in brine, and with so much severity experts inform us that the flesh is more or less raw, like raw beef. The face is very much contorted, and the mouth open and inclined to gasp, with an inclination to tears. A man would flinch back with his whole body, and then, unless very tightly strapped, if the birch catches him in the act of flinching too soon his heels fly up as if by galvanism."

So that there is not very much difference between the infliction of the punishment by the birch or the cat. I put it to the Dáil that if the purpose of the provisions of this Bill is to be deterrent and an example, then if it is to achieve its purpose at all except upon the particular individual, it should be done in the presence of a collection of individuals, so that nobody can mistake its purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON: In view of the eloquent defence made for private flogging, and from the defence made by Deputies in favour of the Bill as it stands, I am prepared to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. NAGLE: I move Amendment No. 49, as follows: "In Sub-section (4), line 56, to delete the word 'sixteen' and to substitute therefor the words 'twenty-one.'" This amendment merely tends to increase the age from sixteen to twenty-one, the age under which a person would be liable to twenty-five strokes.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I will meet Deputies later on the matter of strokes for persons over and under the age of sixteen, but I am not inclined to agree to an alteration in the age set out here. It is the age marking distinctions in any previous legislation where a penalty of flogging was imposed, and I think it is a sensible section, and see no cause for changing it. The man of seventeen or eighteen years of age who goes out to rob, can take a man's penalty for it. The age of sixteen is, as I say, the age mentioned in previous legislation. I have no doubt it was arrived at for good and sufficient reasons, and I am not prepared to agree to the alterations.

Mr. COLOHAN: Paragraph A says that the instrument used shall be a birch rod. I would like the Dáil to understand that it is not the innocent instrument it seems to be in the paragraph. The birch rod, when used by a practised flogger, can do almost as much execution upon the back as a cat-o'-nine-tails. The birching of young sailors in the Royal Navy, rated as boys, but in reality almost men, was practised up to 1906, and the published descriptions of the punishment as then inflicted hold good in all essential points of the present use of the birch upon prisoners. I quote from one of these accounts. "The most degrading and truly demoralising chastisement is the birch. The offender is strapped hand and foot. With each stroke the flesh is seen to turn red, blue, and black."

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Is this relevant? Is not this a question of flogging in the British Navy

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): The question raised by the amendment is whether the age at which whipping should be inflicted is to be sixteen or twenty-one. The question of the instrument does not arise.

Mr. COLOHAN: I am showing why the age should be increased, that if flogging with the birch is so severe the age should be increased to twenty-one.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): The effect of your remarks seems to be that a severer penalty ought to be imposed on people between the age of sixteen and twenty-one.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think that is not the implication at all. It is acknowledged by the Minister, notwithstanding what Deputy Colohan may say or suggest—I do not think he has suggested it—that the cat or the lash is a more severe instrument than the birch, and if the birch is to be the instrument to be used on young persons I submit that it is in order to say what would be the effect of the punishment of the birch upon these young persons.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): Not I think on the question of between sixteen and twenty-one. If it were to provide that those under sixteen were not to be flogged I could understand it. This deals with the raising of the age, and Deputy Colohan is reading passages to show that the birch is very severe.

Mr. COLOHAN: I am trying to prove that the punishment is so severe that the age should be raised in order that the person flogged should be able to bear it.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): The amendment would not have the effect of exempting anybody from the infliction of punishment by the birch.

Mr. JOHNSON: Is it not a good reason for raising the age from childhood to manhood to show the effect of punishment on children by a particular instrument? It is common ground, I think, that a child is not able to bear the same pain as a man. If it can be shown that the birch causes severe pain it follows that it is not fit punishment for a person under twenty-one.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): The argument Deputy Colohan was putting forward was that the birch was too severe to be used at all.

Mr. NAGLE: I think that the Deputy's argument was, that the birch being so severe and limited to boys of sixteen years of age, the other instrument used on boys would be even more severe than the birch and that the birch should be confined to persons over twenty-one.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): That would have been a legitimate argument, but that was not the argument Deputy Colohan was putting forward.

Mr. COLOHAN: I think the age should be raised to twenty-one. The birch can be used by a practised flogger to do considerable damage to a man's back and leave the bones bare.

Mr. LYONS: Surely a child of sixteen is really too young to receive the birch. A boy is not fully developed until he is twenty-one. To vary an old axiom "blessed is he who expects little for he shall receive less." That is what we have received in this amendment. If it is a thing that the Minister is under the opinion that a boy of sixteen years of age could possibly be guilty of committing such a crime, which would entitle the judge to pronounce such a sentence as inflicting so many strokes of the birch, I am sure that the Minister for Home Affairs, or any of his supporters on the Government benches have not yet succeeded in procuring that treasure of a son at the age of sixteen. I ask any father of a son of sixteen would he like to see his child taken out, because it was imagined that somebody told somebody else that his son committed a certain act, and given so many strokes of the birch. I certainly would not, and I would use every means in my power to compel the prosecuting solicitor to prove that my boy was guilty, and I am sure that every Deputy would want to do the same thing. A child's back must be naturally tender and soft.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): The only question is whether the age should be sixteen or twenty-one.

Mr. LYONS: I am trying to do my best to prove that the age limit should be extended from sixteen to twenty-one. Certainly a child of sixteen must have a soft and tender back.

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): Deputy Lyons is out of order. Boys under sixteen may be whipped under this Bill. Sixteen is not the age below which any whipping can be inflicted.

Mr. LYONS: I ask the Minister to accept at least some portion of this amendment in order to bring the age up. Do not make enemies, try and make friends. For goodness' sake chuck out the Flogging Bill holus bolus.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 12; Níl, 82.

Tá.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás MacEoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Deasmhúmhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stainiosa.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.

Piaras Béaslaí.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bullín.
Séamus Ó Dólaín.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Séamus de Burca.
Cristóir Ó Coin.
Andriú Ó Laimhín.

Amendment declared lost.

At this stage An Ceann Comhairle resumed the Chair.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I beg to move Amendment No. 50, to delete in Sub-section (4), line 56, the word "sixteen," and to substitute therefor the word "eighteen." It is with considerable reluctance that I move this amendment. I had hoped that the Minister would have accepted the last amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I was so much impressed by Deputy Lyons' argument in favour of the last amendment that while I could not accept it, I decided to accept this one.

Amendment put and agreed to.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: As regards Amendment No. 51, standing in my name, I ask leave of the Dáil to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON: As regards the next two amendments, 52 and 53, I understood that the Minister was going to make some concessions regarding the number of lashes to be given.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am accepting Amendments 52 and 53.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That means that in Amendment 52 it is agreed to delete the words in Sub-section (4), line 58, "twenty-five," and to substitute therefor the word "twenty," and in Amendment 53, Sub-section 4, line 61, to delete the word "fifty," and to substitute therefor the words "twenty-five."

Amendments 52 and 53 put and agreed to.

Mr. LYONS: I am not moving Amendment 54, which proposed to delete in Sub-section (4), line 61, the word "fifty," and to substitute therefor the words "thirty-five."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I beg to move Amendment 55, to delete Sub-section (5).

In moving this amendment I desire to say that I understand, that under the procedure of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, if certain cases come before that Court and a question of title is involved, it is not competent for the Court to deal with these cases until the question of title has been settled. As I understand the matter, this Sub-section in effect gives power to a Court of Summary Jurisdiction to deal with such cases, and if a question of title is pleaded it will not, I understand, hold good. Under this Bill a Court of Summary Jurisdiction would have power to deal with certain offences set out in Part II of the Schedule. It is proposed, for instance, to give power to the Court to deal with such offences as wrongful entry on, and the retention of the possession of land, and the "interfering with, or preventing without lawful authority, the lawful occupation, use or enjoyment of any land or premises." Cases may occur in which a person enters on the possession of land, and then there is the question whether or not he has the right to enter on the land. A case might also occur where a person would dispute the right to a certain passage, and in furtherance of that right force a gate or door. If this Section is inserted in the Bill it will, to my mind, prevent a question of title being settled by a Court competent to settle such a question, and while a man may possibly have a right, still he is not entitled to plead that right to possession, or a title to the land by the insertion of this Sub-section. It seems to me to deprive a man of such a right, and I, therefore, move the deletion of the Sub-section.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy is right in stating that in the old Petty Sessions Courts questions of title to land, and questions of title generally, were not decided. The Deputy will remember that the magistrates at the time were not lawyers, and there was a sound reason for excluding questions of title. He must know, also because of that exclusion, that it was a common thing to drag in a question of title in order to bar a case being heard before these Courts. The District Justices at present functioning throughout the country are lawyers, either Solicitors or Barristers, and in fact the Judiciary Committee has recommended that title jurisdiction be extended to them. There seems, then, no reason for continuing the bar that prevailed when local lay magistrates sat in the old Petty Sessions Courts. I am not prepared to accept the Deputy's amendment.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Do I understand that the position taken up by the insertion of this Sub-section is really an advance portion of the Judiciary Bill? That seems to be the effect of the Minister's statement, that you are going to give certain powers under this Bill which, apparently, are recommended under another Bill that we have not yet seen, and that you are going to change and increase the powers of the District Justices. They have not that power at the present time, and it seems you are going to give it to them now.

It seems to me that is a matter which should be reserved until the Bill, dealing with the whole judicial system, is introduced. I do not see what object is to be gained by inserting in this Bill a part of the legislation that, apparently, is to be provided under the Bill dealing with the Judicial system. I think it is wrong that this Sub-section, enlarging the powers of the District Justices, should be introduced in this Bill. The matter, I submit, is one that should form portion of the Bill which will come up when the whole judicial system is being settled.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The effect of the Sub-section is simply to ensure that, if any of the offences mentioned in the Schedules are committed then the District Justices shall have power to try and to deal with these offences, and that a person cannot debar the Summary Court from hearing and trying his case simply by raising a point about title. This Sub-section is not an encroachment on the Judiciary Bill. It is simply a common sense recognition of the fact that there is not now the same reason that there was in the past for excluding cases from a Summary Court, simply because some question of title was dragged in. As I have pointed out already, these questions generally were dragged in with a view to barring jurisdiction.

Mr. JOHNSON: I confess I am not very familiar with the meaning of this Sub-section. Offence Number 5 in the Schedule, dealing with property, states "Wrongful entry on and retention of possession of land without colour or pretence of title or authority." A man may contend that he has a title to the property, and his case may be mixed up with several other cases. It is not uncommon that a person who has a grievance is apt to think of the alleged offender as being liable, not to civil proceedings, but to criminal proceedings, and would take action if only for the purpose of frightening him off, take action which would bring the alleged offender to the criminal courts. From the reading of the Sub-section, and from the discussion that has taken place and the statements of Deputy O'Connell and the Minister, it seems to me that a dispute as to a right of possession, a dispute as to title which ought to be dealt with by the Superior Courts, would now be dealt with by Courts of Summary jurisdiction simply on the ground that the alleged offence had been committed, whereas the civil case between two parties which may be in process of preparation may be brought to the court as a civil claim. One party to the dispute may say, "I will have a better chance against my opponent if I can charge him before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, as such a charge will enable me to stave off the civil cases," and under this Sub-Section that shall be done. It rather occurs to me that some such development might arise from the passing of this Sub-Section, and I wonder if that is so.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I do not think that can arise, and in fact I am sure it could not arise. The District Justice, if he were satisfied that any real substantial question of title was involved in the case, would send it on for trial, but Deputies must know that a case of that kind was barred in the old Petty Sessions Court, and that all kinds of questions about title were raised simply to bar jurisdiction. The moment, practically, that the word title was mentioned in the old Petty Sessions Courts, the case was dropped, and it had to be dropped instantly. It is ridiculous that such a bar to jurisdiction over matters of that kind should be continued at a time when lawyers constitute these Courts. If a serious intricate question of title were found to be involved, no District Justice would proceed to deal with that case summarily. I think the Deputy ought not to feel any uneasiness on that score.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I wish to point out that under this Bill, and under this sub-section, the offences to which I have called attention are to be dealt with very severely, and special punishments are being attached which I think I may reasonably say would not be attached in ordinary cases, or under the operation of the ordinary civil law, to such offences. That is all the more reason, I think, why a departure should not be made from the ordinary procedure. The Minister said that immediately the word "title" was mentioned in the old Petty Sessions Courts, that without practically any examination of whether a question of title was involved or not, the magistrates had no more to do with the case. I can quite conceive that solicitors would drag in the word simply to frighten magistrates off from having anything to do with the case. I do not know what are the exact regulations of the law on this matter, but I take it, it would be only reasonable to expect that the District Justice should be satisfied that there was, in fact, a question of title involved. If that is the present regulation, litigants must reasonably satisfy the District Justice that a question of title is involved. I am quite certain that the District Justices will be in a far better position to weigh up the frightening arguments of solicitors, and to know exactly what the word "title" means. They will be in a far better position to do that than the old J.P.'s, and if they find that the matter is frivolous and that no question of title was involved they will be competent to deal with that. If the District Justice is satisfied that a question of title is involved and finds that he will not be in a position to deal with it, it seems to me, from reading the Sub-Section that, even though he is satisfied that a question of title is involved, he will still feel that the insertion of this Sub-Section empowers him to deal with it. That is my difficulty. I am quite willing to agree with what the Minister says that this question of title should not be dragged in by the way. What I wish to ensure is that when a question of title is really involved, it will debar the District Justices from deciding on the matter.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I can go no further than the assurance that I have given the Deputy. The District Justice would not attempt to deal with any case in which a substantial question of title is found to be involved. I cannot meet the Deputy on the amendment.

Mr. O'CONNELL: On what does the Minister base his statement that the District Justice would not deal with a case where a substantial question of title was involved? My point is that the District Justice might reasonably think that this sub-section empowered him to deal with such a case.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: In the very wording of the section the jurisdiction of a Court of Summary Jurisdiction in respect to any of the offences mentioned in Part 2 of the Schedule to this Act shall not be ousted by reason of title being drawn into the question. The mere frightening mention of "title" would not debar the District Justice from dealing summarily with the offences mentioned in the Schedule. The Courts of Summary Jurisdiction are for a particular purpose. The Justice would not proceed, but would send on to a higher Court, cases in which a serious substantial question of title was involved. I want to refer to one argument that was raised. It was almost suggested that the proper course for a person to assert his legal right was to do some wrongful act, some act of violence. Of course, that is not the position.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 12; Níl, 34.

Tá.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Tomás MacFoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.

Séamus Éabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhin.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirghessa.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Níl.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Gearóid Ó Súilleabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Séamus Broathnach.
Deasmhughain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Staineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Liam Thrift.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraic Ó Máille.

Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Piaras Béaslai.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dóláin.
Seán Mac Eoin.
Proinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faioite.
Séamus de Burea.

Amendment declared lost.

[DAIL RESUMES.]

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Committee in accordance with the Resolution will now Report Progress, and sit again to-day. The Dáil is, accordingly, adjourned in accordance with the Standing Orders until 12 o'clock to-day.

The Dáil adjourned at 8 o'clock a.m. on Friday, July 13th, to 12 o'clock noon on same day.

DAIL EIREANN.

DE HAOINE, 13ADH IÚL, 1923.

(Friday, 13th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar a 12.8 p.m.
Bhí an Ceann Comhairle, Mícheál
O hAodha, 'sa Chathaoir.

CEISTEANNA—QUESTIONS.

[ORAL ANSWERS.]

EX-MEMBERS OF R.I.C.

SEAN Mac GARAIDH and SEAN O MAOLRUADH asked the President whether he is aware of the great financial distress prevailing amongst ex-members of the Royal Irish Constabulary who resigned or were dismissed on political grounds; whether he will undertake to introduce during the present Session a Bill to provide for those whose claims were passed by the Committee of Enquiry into the resignations and dismissals from that force during the British regime.

The PRESIDENT: I have nothing to add to the reply given on 26th ultimo to a similar question asked by Deputy de Nogla, which was:—Legislation to provide for ex-members of the R.I.C. whose resignations or dismissals were caused by their national sympathies will be introduced as soon as the pressure of Parliamentary and Departmental business permits.

Mr. JOHNSON: Can the Minister give us any idea when that is likely to be? Will it be within the next fortnight, the next month, or the next three months?

The PRESIDENT: It is possible that we will be able to introduce it within a fortnight, but I cannot promise unless we get some sort of facilities such as were afforded last night. With the mass of business that we have to put before the Dáil, we will require longer sittings, and perhaps a greater number of sittings than we are having.

Mr. JOHNSON: May I point out to the President that it might be advantageous to adopt the policy that has already been suggested, but hitherto not considered desirable—that is, to refer measures to Special Committees to consider them. That would probably facilitate the business of the Dáil. We could have two Committees going at the same time. Perhaps it could be arranged to introduce some of these measures into the Seanad, and let them get on with the work there as well as here?

The PRESIDENT: I have been considering that, and I brought the matter before the Executive Council yesterday. It is under consideration at the present moment.

RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT COMMISSION.

TOMAS Mac EOIN asked the Minister for Local Government whether the Government have yet given any consideration to the Interim Report of the Commission on Reconstruction and Development dealing with roads; whether it has yet been decided to take any action on the lines recommended in the Report; and if not, whether, in view of the urgency of the matter both in respect of the condition of roads and in respect of the need of relieving unemployment, that he can undertake that a decision will be arrived at speedily.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. E. Blythe): The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. The Deputy may feel assured that the present condition of the roads and the extent of existing unemployment are fully realised.

Any action on the lines of the Interim Report would necessarily be conditioned by the extent to which the large sums of money proposed for expenditure would be available. The Report is also being considered by the Minister for Finance.

Mr. JOHNSON: Can the Minister tell us when the Report, which was promised to be circulated, is likely to be circulated to Deputies?

Mr. BLYTHE: I am afraid I have nothing to do with that. The Reconstruction Committee acts under the Minister for Industry and Commerce, and a copy of the Report is forwarded to me. I do not think I have anything to do with the actual publication of it, and it is a matter for the Ministry of Industry and Commerce that the Report be sent to the Deputies.

Mr. JOHNSON: I realise that, but the President, as Minister for Finance, promised that it would be circulated—that copies of a paper which had, as a matter of fact, been printed would be circulated. It has not yet been circulated.

Mr. BLYTHE: I presume that will be done.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS.

SEUMAS O DOLAIN (for Sean O Maolruadh), asked the Minister for Industry and Commerce if he will state the money value in percentage of all contracts placed by the Government Contracts Committee since the 1st March, 1923—(a) within Saorstát Éireann; (b) without Saorstát Éireann; further, if the Minister will state whether there be any foundation for the rumour circulated by a letter in the Press that on order for 40,000 suits of clothing was being placed by the Government Purchasing Department outside Saorstát Éireann.

ASSISTANT MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. Whelehan): The contracts placed in the Saorstát for the period from the 1st March, 1923, to the 30th June, 1923, are of the total money value of 93 per cent. within the Saorstát and 7 per cent. without the Saorstát. With regard to the rumour to which the Deputy alludes, I am not aware that there is any foundation for the rumour mentioned. Perhaps, for the Deputy's fuller information, I may add that the returns from the 1st to 25th March are, for Saorstát goods, 85 per cent. of the total money value. From the 25th March to 31st May the Saorstát goods were 94.6 per cent. total money value. That is to say, that percentage of the goods were of Saorstát origin. From the 1st June to 30th June the total money value of the goods of Saorstát origin was 99.36 per cent. With regard to the rumour which appeared in the Press, I should like to add that, so far from the rumour having any foundation in fact, the fact is that tenders have been invited for 20,000 suits of clothing from manufacturers within the Saorstát, and those tenders are under consideration. That will show the Deputy how little he may be disturbed by rumours appearing in the Press.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will the Minister supplement that information by saying in regard to clothes, for instance, that the tenders that have been invited for clothes to be manufactured in the Saorstát will include that the cloth is also to be manufactured in the Saorstát; and when he speaks of Saorstát origin of contracts placed within the Saorstát, does that mean for goods mainly manufactured, or that a definite percentage of the final value has been created in the Saorstát?

Mr. WHELEHAN: Speaking of the 20,000 suits, I mean that the cloth of which the suits will be made will be of Saorstát origin, will be manufactured in the Saorstát. In every case, when I speak of goods of Saorstát origin, I mean that as far as possible these goods have been made from raw material produced within the Saorstát.

[WRITTEN ANSWERS.]

POSTAL FACILITIES IN ATHLONE.

SEAN O LAIDHIN asked the Postmaster-General whether he is aware of the delay in the delivery of the morning mail to the residents of Athlone; whether, in some cases, four hours have elapsed from the time of the arrival of the mails, at 9.15 a.m., until delivery, and to ask that delivery be expedited.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. J. J. Walsh): The first delivery in Athlone commences at 7 a.m. and the second delivery at 11 a.m. The second delivery in most parts of the town is completed at 1 p.m., and as the return mail is not despatched until after 4 p.m., there is ample time for reply.

The service afforded is satisfactory and compares favourably with the Postal arrangements of other towns like Athlone. It may be possible to commence the second delivery slightly earlier, and I will look into this.

THREATENED PORT STRIKE IN DUBLIN.

Mr. ALFRED BYRNE: Before we go into the ordinary business of the day, might I be permitted to ask the Minister for Industry and Commerce whether it is, or was, the Government's intention to continue to bring about a settlement of the trouble at the Dublin Ports, or whether it means that a deadlock has arrived that will mean the closing down of the Dublin Ports on Monday?

Mr. WHELEHAN: Yesterday a conference, which lasted for several hours, took place in the Ministry. I regret that at that conference the parties failed to come to an agreement. Before leaving, both parties were assured that the best services of the Ministry would be at their disposal whenever they would feel that they might be helpful. The Ministry will certainly use its very best endeavours to see that the dispute in question is settled with as little delay as possible. As we wish to be helpful, I think that that is about as far as I can make any statement at the present moment.

[DAIL IN COMMITTEE.]

PUBLIC SAFETY (EMERGENCY POWERS) BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

SECTION 5—Continued.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move amendment 56: "To add at the end of the Section a new Sub-Section, as follows:—

"This Section shall not apply to any offence committed before the passing of this Act."

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I desire to say that I think this amendment is much better drafted than the next one, and I quite accept it.

Mr. JOHNSON: I was hopeful that we would have had from the Minister in charge of the Bill a statement that he was prepared to accept this amendment, because I would respectfully commend it to the Dáil. I hope I am not wrong in reading it as, in effect, an Amnesty Bill.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS: (Mr. O'Higgins): This amendment was, of course, accepted.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think it makes of the Bill an Amnesty Bill in so far as Section 5 is concerned, and in so far as any persons at present in the custody of the military authorities, or any person who may be charged with offences which might have brought him into the custody of the military authorities, is concerned. The effect of the amendment, as I understand it, is that any person who may have been guilty in the past of any of these many offences, can be brought before the Court and tried for those offences. The Minister shakes his head, and indicates that is not the effect of the amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: They will be tried of course, under the law as it existed previous to the passing of this Act. It is not an amnesty for crime committed up to the date of this Act, even for the crimes mentioned in the Schedule of this Act. The amendment, of course, is accepted.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am glad to hear the amendment is accepted. Then are we to understand there will, for six months, be two codes in existence? I would rather gather that for that period of six months this Bill when it becomes an Act will be the operative law.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: This Bill will be the effective law with regard to crimes mentioned in its Schedule and committed after the date on which it becomes law.

Mr. JOHNSON: Then I understand from the Minister that as from the date of the passing of this Act, we shall have two codes in existence for a period of six months. Any person who may have committed an offence which comes within Part 2 of the Schedule before the date of the passing of the Act will be triable by the Courts which have hitherto operated, or under the code that has hitherto been in operation, and any person who may commit any of these offences subsequent to the passing of the Act will be liable to the new penalties. The amnesty does not go so far as I had thought.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: It is not an amnesty.

Mr. JOHNSON: Nevertheless, the amendment will, I think, have some of the effect of an amnesty, and I think to the extent that it does relieve the persons who may be found guilty of any of these offences in the future, it is worthy of acceptance, and I am glad the Minister has accepted it. I would like much more to have heard him say it did have the effect of relieving those who have been in internment for some time of the risk that they may, at some future date, be brought before a Court and tried. I think that having had a person for two or three months in imprisonment, without trial, it would be reasonable to say that that internment would satisfy the needs of justice and the needs of such protection, without holding over those untried prisoners the possibility that they may be at some future date tried for an offence which they have committed twelve months ago. I am sorry that interpretation is not found fitting, but for the benefit that the amendment does bring, we have to be thankful.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Amendment:—To add at the end of the section a new sub-section as follows:

“No part of this section shall be interpreted retrospectively, so as to authorise, in the case of an offence committed before the passing of this Act, the infliction of a penalty or sentence which could not lawfully have been inflicted by a District Justice for such offence at the time when the offence was committed.”—(Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.) Not moved.

Motion made and question put: “That Section 5, as amended, stand part of the Bill.”

Mr. JOHNSON: On this motion you ruled that it was not competent for us to discuss the merits, if there are any, of flogging, and I do not wish to contravene that ruling. I want to record a word of protest generally against Section 5 as a whole. It introduces new penalties of a very much more severe character than anything that has been known for offences of a large range. The death penalty or penal servitude referred to for the offences mentioned in Part 1 of the Act includes, as we have already tried to show, the death penalty for comparatively minor offences, even though the offences may be in furtherance of an armed revolt. The liberty that is given to a Court to sentence to death is too great, and it is, as a matter of fact, an invitation to one Court to sentence to death for a comparatively trivial offence, while another Court may offer very much milder penalties. Now, to incur the death penalty I have always thought that the intention was to make punishment follow certain crimes as certainly as the law could make it; but here we are asked to legislate in a way which leaves the death penalty covering a very wide range of offences, and leaves a very large element of gamble as to which Court and which Judge a person may have the good or ill fortune to be brought before. The other penalties that are imposed in the later sections, though I gladly acknowledge there have been some modification as compared with the original terroristic threats, are still excessive, and the method of punishment is the kind which ought not to find expression in an Act of this Legislature. There is no need to go into details. The matter has been fairly discussed, I think, and not extravagantly discussed. We would like to have had more assistance from Deputies in the discussion and consideration of these various penalties, but it does not seem fitting to the majority of Deputies that they should be considered and discussed. Nevertheless, we have done our best to find out what the penalties involve, and why they should be imposed for these various offences. Notwithstanding the improvements or the amendments that have been made in the section as originally submitted, the section is not one that the Dáil should accept, and I would ask the Dáil to vote against the acceptance of it.

Mr. O'CONNELL: My great difficulty with regard to this section is that I have not been convinced, and nothing that has been stated on the other side has convinced me, of the necessity for the introduction and the inclusion of a section of this kind in the Bill. This section is the backbone of the Bill. To justify the Government in coming to Parliament and asking for the extraordinary powers that are in this section, makes it appear that the country is at the present moment in a very bad state indeed, so far as these particular crimes which are specified in the Schedule are concerned. To outsiders who do not know the country, and who have not travelled in the country, I am quite sure the impression is conveyed that it is absolutely unsafe to travel in the country, or for any person to go about his ordinary business. Are these the facts? It may be that Ministers have knowledge that the ordinary man in the street has not an opportunity of obtaining; but crimes of arson and robbery under arms do not happen usually without being reported in the Press. To an ordinary observer who took up the daily Press during the last two months it would not appear that the wave of crime which has been referred to, and on account of which the special powers in this section are asked, is such as to warrant the introduction of these special powers. Reference has been made repeatedly to the condition of things in this

[Mr. O'Connell.] country for the last eight or ten months. They were bad—as bad as they could be; but the effect is that these crimes were regarded, rightly or wrongly—wrongly, in our opinion, undoubtedly—by those who were engaged in them, only as a method of carrying on a system of warfare. We do not agree with that. None of us in the Dáil agrees with it. But we cannot get behind the fact that they in their blindness—if you like to put it that way—did believe that the campaign of destruction and burning and robbery under arms was a method of carrying on a so-called war. The facts are that two or three months ago these people who are responsible for this campaign felt that the game was not worth the candle any longer—

Professor MacNEILL: Torch.

Mr. O'CONNELL:—and we are getting back to ordinary normal times. I hold that we should wait until we are convinced that what is feared or anticipated in this measure is actually in existence. Anyone who travels through the country knows that the existence of crime of this nature is rather rare in comparison with even such a law-abiding country as England. If you compare the Press reports of crime in Ireland and in England within the last two months, you will find that there is nothing to show that the condition of affairs here is of such an extraordinary character that these special powers are necessary to deal with it. I think that before these powers should be sought and before the impression which their introduction is bound to create outside the Saorstát is created, we should be satisfied that the ordinary law, in addition to the powers which the military have and always will have, should be sufficient to deal with the state of things as they exist.

Mr. LYONS: There is one consolation in connection with this section, and that is that men interned before the passing of this Act shall not receive the punishment specified under it. I would like to know if that also includes that portion indicating that any person found guilty of any offence mentioned in Part 1 of the Schedule shall be liable to suffer the death penalty? Surely there are quite enough death penalties, quite enough executions? I hope it will be no longer required that any officer, any Minister for Defence, or any Minister of the Government, shall sanction any further executions. If the amendment that has been accepted also applies to that portion of Section 5, then I think an improvement has been brought about. I am sure the Minister fully realises that the time has passed when very drastic measures were really necessary. Is it suggested that men interned at the present moment may be tried in six months from now and sentenced to death?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Not under this Bill.

Mr. LYONS: I am very pleased to hear the Minister explain that that is not so under this Bill. I will now deal with the question of penal servitude.

You have men in prison for ten months who are not tried, and I am sure you will have power under this Bill to manufacture or frame a charge against them. You will have power under this Bill to put them on trial and sentence them to penal servitude.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Not under this Bill.

Mr. LYONS: That, at least, is a comfort, that the men interned at present will not suffer anything under this Bill. They cannot be tried under this Bill, and they will not be tried under it. I am sure it is the opinion of every Deputy in the Dáil that before the expiration of the time allotted for this Bill—six months hence—that the Saorstát will be united and every man who is in prison at the present time will be released. I do not at all approve of the Section, but I was pleased to hear that one or two objections to this particular Clause have been removed by the amendment that has been accepted. But if you find a man with a revolver, a land mine, or a few cartridges in his house, I would like to know if all the evidence brought against that man is to be published in the Press. I have objected strongly from the time this Bill was introduced to its provisions, but I would like the members of the Dáil to register their votes more particularly against this Section number 5.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: A Chinn-Comhairle, in supporting the request of other Deputies that this Section be deleted from the Bill, I would like to ask the Ministry to state once and for all—they have not stated it up to the present, at least in a way that is convincing to me—why exactly the measures and the provisions in the Bill are necessary at this particular moment? The President has addressed people of Irish birth and descent in Australia indicating that, to his mind at all events, there has been a very considerable improvement in the position in Ireland. The Publicity Department of the Government has, on various occasions, issued statements to much the same effect. Now those statements both of the President and of the Publicity and some other Departments, and statements not directly coming from the Government, but from publicity sources strongly supporting the Government, coincide with the experiences and with the general view of a good number of the Deputies in the Dáil. Without any shadow of doubt whatever, the internal situation in Ireland is much better, much more satisfactory, and much more rational than it was three or four months ago. To many of us it seems that that improved situation is really a sign and a promise that there is a return to a certain degree to ordinary and normal life in Ireland. But in spite of all that under this particular Section of the Bill the Ministry seek extraordinary powers and asks for extraordinary penalties. It asks the Dáil to sanction measures, penalties and provisions not covered by the existing laws. To me, at all events, it is extraordinary that if those penalties and those measures are necessary now they were not necessary within the last twelve months when certain other extraordinary measures were asked for and granted by a majority of the Dáil. But no reason has been given by the Ministry except the expression of the fear that there may be a renewal of the troubles of the last twelve months. That fear does not seem to me to be sufficient to justify all that is asked for under Section 5. On the contrary, I think that the hopes of the Ministry, and the hopes of the people in general, would be brought nearer realisation if the Ministry showed in letter, as well as in spirit, that it was willing to help in the return to the normal. There was talk this morning of a certain disease in the body politic. It was described as a mental disease. Now I feel that for such a disease and for any mental disease of a similar character that the true and the real remedy is not so much physical punishment as an attempt not only at understanding but an attempt to remove any remaining causes that help to extend such disease, and I suggest that Section 5 of the Bill is not an attempt in that direction, but that its effect is likely to be in the contrary direction, that it is more likely to act as an irritant than as a solvent.

Professor MacNEILL: I am glad you agree with the diagnosis, at all events.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I certainly agree that it is a disease, but I deny that a proper way to treat a disease of the mind is to perform an operation on the body. Deputy O'Connell has referred to what is not a remote origin of the disease. The President, if I may say so, suggested this morning that it was not possible either to excuse or to understand certain things in Ireland now. I beg to differ with him in that, not that I would say that it is possible to excuse, but I do hold that it is possible to understand. Deputy O'Connell, rightly I think, suggested one way of understanding it. It would be utterly and completely wrong, in my opinion, to date the origin of certain irregular activities from December 6th, 1921, or from April, May or June of 1922.

One of the biggest errors that I think the Executive Council has made is to think that the preaching and practices of the last five or six years would have no influence after the Treaty. I refer in particular to two of the offences defined for punishment under this Section, and I put it to the Dáil and to the Executive Council in this way. No matter what the popular sanction, you had arson in the campaign against the British occupation in Ireland. What bearing, in spite of the popular sanction behind it—and there was very considerable popular sanction behind it—had the holding up and the seizure for certain national purposes, by force of arms, of certain moneys before the Treaty came? It may be said, as it was said on another occasion, that these things had not the direct sanction of the national legislature of the time, but in spite of that we all know that they had not only the direct sanction but, in many instances, they had the direct command of the particular active arm of the nation, which was as much, if not more, than any other arm of the nation responsible for the setting up of the Saorstát.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am afraid the Deputy is going on too long and back too far.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I may be going on too long. If I am, I bow to your ruling.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I will let the Deputy continue, because I am interested to find the connection between what he is discussing and the Section. He may continue his speech, if he is going to make it.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The connection, A Chinn-Comhairle, is this, that it is not possible, in my opinion, whatever may be the opinion of the Executive Council, to have certain activities of that kind carried on under considerable popular and national sanction without having effect on a later period. I submit, with all due respect to the opinions of the supporters of the Executive Council, that that has had its effect upon later events, and that there are men who, by the laws of the State, have become criminals, not because they were of criminal intent, and only partly because they were opponents of the Saorstát, but because they had the example and the history of certain acts before them. I should be the last in the world to condemn the acts I mention, but I do say that they go some distance to explain the mentality behind some of the acts of the last twelve months, and that in that sense it is possible to come to some understanding. I say they have been aggravated by deliberate incitement, but even deliberate incitement would not have produced all the things that have happened had there not been a revolutionary background. Many activities which, while legitimate enough from a revolutionary point of view in a revolutionary period, are anything but legitimate and anything but legal when the revolutionary period has passed. For that reason I think that the Section shows a misunderstanding of the whole present situation.

Question put: "That Section 5, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Dáil divided: Tá, 29; Níl, 13.

Tá.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Pádraig Mac Ualghairg.
Doasmhughain Mac Góráil.
Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
Micheál de Duram.
Ristoárd Ó Maolchatha.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Sir Séamus Craig.
Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Liam Mac Aonghusa.

Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Séamus Ó Cruadhlaoich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghin Ó hUigin.
Proinsias Bulfin.
Séamus Ó Dólaín.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.

Níl.

Tomás de Nógla.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Liam de Róiste.
Darghal Fíges.
Tomas Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Liam Ó Briain.

Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Séamus Eabhróid.
Soán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seandáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.

Motion declared carried.

SECTION 6.

(1) It shall be lawful for an Executive Minister to order the seizure of any cattle and other animals found trespassing on land belonging to any Board or Department of the Government or to any private person or body, and the removal and detention of such cattle and other animals to and in any place within or outside Saorstát Éireann.

(2) Whenever any cattle or other animals are seized under this section, such notice as the Minister aforesaid shall prescribe shall be given to the owner thereof, and such owner may, within such time as the Minister shall prescribe, redeem such cattle and other animals by payment to the Minister of such sum as the Minister shall estimate to be the fair value of such cattle and animals, or such lesser sum as the Minister shall think proper: Provided always that if such owner shall satisfy the Minister that the trespass by such cattle or other animals was accidental or took place against the will of such owner or was otherwise innocent, the Minister may return such cattle and animals to such owner.

(3) All cattle and other animals seized under this section and not so redeemed or returned shall be sold in such manner and at such place whether within or outside Saorstát Éireann as the Minister shall direct.

(4) The money paid for the redemption or the proceeds of the sale of any cattle or other animals redeemed or sold under this section shall be applied in the first place in or towards the payment of the expenses of the seizure, removal, detention and sale of such cattle and other animals, and in the next place in or towards the payment to the owner of the land on which such cattle and other animals were found trespassing of such compensation as the Minister shall direct for the damage caused by such trespass. and the surplus (if any) of such moneys or proceeds shall be forfeited and paid into such special account in such bank as the Minister for Finance shall from time to time direct.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I beg to move to insert after Sub-section (1) a new sub-section. Section 6 deals with powers to seize and sell animals found trespassing. Sub-section (1) reads—(sub-section quoted). The new sub-section which I am moving reads:—

“Before any cattle or other animals are seized under this section notice of the intended seizure shall be given to the owner thereof, so that he may discontinue the trespass; but such notice need not be given on the occasion of a second or other later wilful trespass.”

I should say that the necessity for this new sub-section arises, like many other things, out of the circumstances of the revolutionary period through which we have passed. In that period many and various weapons were used, and in my opinion rightly used, by what, without any disrespect, I may describe as the revolutionary forces.

Certain conceptions of the status, position and standing of what the President sometimes describes as certain orders in Ireland were held by the National Forces, and by the people supporting the National Forces. I think it is true to state that one of the instruments used with popular, if not national or legislative, sanction was the adaptation of certain measures, which at various times have been taken by the body of the people, or an agrarian portion of the body of the people in Ireland.

To my knowledge, and to the knowledge of many Deputies, force was used on the national side for the purpose of seizing, maybe only for a temporary purpose, and maybe only for tactical reasons, certain lands in the possession of people belonging to certain orders, and for the driving off of cattle on certain lands which locally were considered as not being put to the best use in the national interest. Because that practice had more or less become common, and because a common practice like that is not easily departed from, we have found, since a national Government was established, that in some parts of the country, quite wrongly, there have been repetitions, illegitimate and unlawful repetitions, of the kind of measures I have just spoken of. Since the establishment of the national Government, with legitimate national authority, such measures have become quite unlawful and illegitimate. I put it to the Deputies that it is not at all easy—as a matter of fact it is extremely difficult—for any community to make a sudden break with the practices of the recent past. Sub-section 1 gives power to the Ministry to order the seizure, removal and detention of cattle trespassing on certain lands. With that at the moment I am not going to quarrel, but I think that sufficient provision is not made in the Sub-section to make it satisfactory, and it is necessary to do something more.

The amendment or new sub-section I propose asks that where it is found necessary to make a seizure of these cattle due notice—I do not mean the giving of notice at an undue length of time before the seizure—should be given to the owners of the cattle, so that if they are not quite aware that they are committing an offence or about to commit an offence that they might be brought to a realisation of the real position, and to the fact that they are committing an offence in the shape of a trespass. I think it is only fair and reasonable that such notice should be given, because instances have occurred where cattle belonging to a certain citizen have trespassed on lands on which they ought not to have trespassed, but they did not trespass in such a way as really to constitute an offence or a crime within the knowledge of the owner of those cattle. Now, a thing like that, I freely admit, cannot happen twice, and for that reason I do not ask that such notice should be given to the owner of trespassing cattle a second time. I would only give the notice on the first occasion. We had an instance of this in a question put in the Dáil some weeks ago, where the owner of certain cattle had his cattle seized. That owner was not, in fact, of the belief that his cattle were trespassing. He was, indeed, paying rent for the land on which his cattle were trespassing. It so happened that the person or persons to whom he was paying rent had no right to receive the rent, because the land, so far as our knowledge goes, had been seized by them. But the cattle were seized on these lands. It was a bona fide transaction on the part of the owner of the trespassing cattle.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): Would the Deputy give particulars of that case?

CATHAL O'SHANNON: At the moment I have not the date, but the Minister may remember that it was raised in a question put by Deputy Lyons. I do not remember the exact date of the case.

Mr. LYONS: There are two such cases—one a case in Castletown, Westmeath, and another a case in Ballymore, Westmeath.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: That, I think, was a bona fide transaction on the part of the owner of the cattle. It was to cover such cases that I put the amendment. No such case of trespass should, as I say, occur a second time. One warning ought to be quite enough, but I suggest that they should be given some warning.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Would the Deputy not consider the passage of the Bill a sufficient warning?

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The Minister asked me if I would consider that the passage of the Bill would be a sufficient warning. No, I do not consider the passage of the Bill a sufficient warning. A man, even if he purchased the Bill and studied its provisions, might still think that he was outside its provisions. Certainly I think that the persons to whom I refer would consider that they were outside its provisions, because they had no knowledge that the lands on which their cattle trespassed were lands that had been wrongfully and illegally seized by the person to whom they paid rent. Furthermore, no matter how widely distributed a Bill or Act may be, and no matter how many of its provisions may be published publicly in the Press, in many of the rural parts of Ireland we know that the chance of some of the most material provisions of that Act reaching that countryside are not very great for one reason or another. For that reason I cannot agree that the enactment of the Bill would be a sufficient warning. I think that there ought to be some further warning. Mind, I do not mean that where there is a really good case against the trespasser who had wilfully or deliberately, and with full knowledge, trespassed, there should be a great deal of consideration. I am more concerned with those who more or less out of ignorance, or more or less out of sticking to certain practices of the past, have more or less unconsciously been guilty of an offence. I think in reason and in fairness, if not in strict legal justice, that there should be some warning, but that there should be no second warning. I beg to move the addition of this new sub-section after Sub-section (1) of Section 6.

Mr. GEORGE NICHOLLS: I would like to say, as representing a typical agricultural constituency, that the Deputy who has last spoken has made me very wide awake. I represent the County of Galway. I know that people there have gone in and seized and commandeered lands, utilised them for their own benefit, and we are led now to believe, from what the last Deputy has said, that they have been acting in ignorance. We are told that they do not know that the land is not their own. They have gone into these lands and they had no right to go into them. I think it is about time that there should be an end put to that humbug. When land is seized everybody who is trespassing on it knows that that land is not his own, and if people go into land to which they have no right, they have to put up with the consequences. I represent now a very typical constituency, the County of Galway, and I know that there has been forcible seizure of land all over the County, North, South, East and West—the four old divisions, as it was originally divided into four constituencies.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of Order, this amendment or Sub-section does not deal with the seizure of land. It is with cattle trespassing that it deals, and I submit they are not the same thing.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The trespass of cattle and the seizure of land are quite different.

Mr. LYONS: I wish to support this amendment, because I am well acquainted with several cases where people lost cattle through having them on land, grazing them. One particular case, that Deputy O'Shannon mentioned a moment ago, occurred in Westmeath. There had been an agreement. I am informed, signed by the proposed owner on one side and the original owner on the other side.

Mr. HOGAN: Name the case.

Mr. LYONS: Mrs Crosbie of Kilbeggan.

Mr. HOGAN: I am merely suggesting that particulars of individual cases should be given to identify the case, and not reference to the cases vaguely, so that nobody would understand to what cases they refer.

Mr. LYONS: If the Minister for Agriculture wants the case fully explained, I think I should detain the Dáil for an hour and a half going fully into it.

Mr. HOGAN: I merely want the name of the party.

Mr. LYONS: The names of the parties are: Mrs. Crosbie, the supposed owner, and Mrs. Keegan on the other side. The military arrested the two young Crosbies, and they are still in custody. In this particular case the people who had the cattle grazing on the land were of opinion that the parties to whom they were paying rent were the proper owners. If such an amendment as this was accepted, naturally those people would be notified, and then, if they continued trespassing, well, I certainly would have no sympathy with them at all, even if every bit of horned stock they had was seized. It is a very bad policy not to give them notice. I know one case of a labouring man who, by the fruits of his labour, succeeded in buying one beast, and through pure economy he was going along the road to success. He was a labouring man, living in a cottage, and by his industry he succeeded in buying three cows. That man's name is O'Gorman, of Castletown.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is he in possession of the cattle?

Mr. LYONS: Those cattle were seized by the military, and I am speaking to this amendment.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Were they seized because they were found trespassing?

Mr. LYONS: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I thought they were found on the man's land?

Mr. LYONS: The labouring man was not lucky enough to possess land, but had a "take" on the eleven months system for which he was paying. He thought at the same time that he was paying the right owner. He was not notified that he was committing a crime against the laws of the land, and, of course, his three little cattle were there on the land, and naturally the soldiers came down and made a clean sweep and took everything that was on the land away with them. I have already sent the details of that case briefly to the President, as it was the President answered the question for me when I raised it in the Dáil. I quite forget the date at the moment. Indeed, now I am sure we can certainly ask the support of the Farmers' Party on this amendment, but I see just now that they are only a party of one. As they have not been here all night, naturally they are not so tired that they will not be able to come in and say "Tá" to this amendment. It really is an amendment [Mr. Lyons.] that will do some of the people that they represent justice. I hold that there is no justice in going to a farm and seizing the cattle on this farm, not knowing whether all the cattle seized belonged to the person who had the farm or who had taken the farm by force or had got it by agreement.

Now that is, of course, the idea that Deputy Cathal O'Shannon had when he put forward this amendment. Throughout the country there are many very poor people, who may possess a cow. In one particular place in Edge worthstown, in Longford, there is a poor man living in a cottage and he possessed a cow. That cow was also found trespassing. I am not disputing the fact that that man did not know—as the land was in the possession of a family for a number of years—that he was paying the right person, but that cow was taken, and that deprived the man's family of milk and butter. We come now to Ballymo, and there the same tactics were adopted by the Minister for Defence and the Minister for Agriculture. Will you be giving power to the Minister for Home Affairs to go further? I am sure it has happened before now that even a goat that was rambling was also taken—

Mr. JOHNSON: By a peeler.

Mr. LYONS: No, not in this case, it was taken by the soldiers. Whether the Minister for Defence wanted to feed the Army on goat's milk I do not know. It would probably be stronger for them. I do want to see this amendment added to Sub-section (1) of Section 6, so that the poor man will get an opportunity of knowing who is the owner of the land on which he puts his cow to graze. Certainly I have not much sympathy for the farmer who may possess two or three hundred acres of land, and who comes along and says to himself, "My great grand-aunt lived in this place and this place belongs to me," and who then goes along and takes possession with the help of some people whom he may get into his clutches to help him in doing that. I have no sympathy with a man like that—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Hear, hear.

Mr. LYONS:—but I do want to try to safeguard, to the best of my ability, the poor man who is solely dependent upon a beast or two, probably to pay his debts or to pay his half-year's rent. It is a very old custom throughout the country.

Mr. HUGHES: Very.

Mr. LYONS: It is a very old custom that from one fair day to another that a particular man or woman, in some cases a widow who may have a small family, are solely dependent upon that beast or whatever little cattle they have. They may have no land of their own, and they have to get grass for them. The military come along, if that land is in dispute, and take these cattle along with the rest. They take all the horned stock that are there. I am sure such animals as do not wear horns at all will be carried off by the military if they can lay their hands on them.

Mr. HOGAN: They have even taken pollies.

Mr. LYONS: I want the Farmers' Party to support this amendment. They did an awful lot of talking, when the Land Bill was on, against the seizure of cattle. Now I want them to come here and to prove that they are really against the seizure of cattle by the military or by the Minister for Home Affairs, or whoever may be in that office when this Act comes into force. It is really a very awkward thing for any poor man living in the heart of the country that, even if he himself was in the dispute with the landlord and that his father was originally the owner of the holding, that the cattle of such a man should be seized. I know of cases where the landlord from which such men hold at present are in the possession of land from which that man's grandfather or father was evicted.

Mr. NICHOLLS: On a point of order, is the Deputy now in order? He is dealing with the question of grabbing farms, and not with cattle trespassing.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy is out of order.

Mr. LYONS: This amendment does exactly what I would have done myself. I would have inserted in the Bill, if I had the power, a clause which would do what this amendment wants done. I will be greatly surprised if a vote is challenged on this amendment. Is it possible that the Minister for Home Affairs is so much against the farming class that he will say to the Dáil that he will not accept this amendment? I would be surprised if the Deputies, the majority of whom are farmers, vote against this amendment. There are no farmers on these benches here, and I would ask the Deputies to do something for the people who sent them here. There are more small farmers in the country—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy has exceeded his time.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am really astonished that the Minister has allowed the time of the Dáil to be spent in discussion of this amendment, because I am sure he is going to accept it. It is hardly reasonable to ask the Dáil to have a long discussion without any speech from him explaining that he is going to accept the amendment. I want to put before him an entirely different aspect of the case from that which has already been touched upon. Section 1, which it is sought to amend, reads (Section quoted). There are different roads which belong to public bodies, and under this section, unless it is amended, it would be lawful for an Executive Minister to order a seizure of any horse, donkey, or goat that was grazing on the public roadside. Apart from any question of entering into a field, a horse grazing on the roadside could be seized under that sub-section without notice. I know that is not the intention of the Minister, but he is asking us to give him power to do that without notice. I think it was Mr. John Leonard who gave evidence before the Agricultural Commission some time ago and explained that, owing to the high cost of railway transit, he, for one, had developed a practice of sending his cattle to market along the roads. It would take two or three days to do this, and he said that this was a custom likely to be revived, and that instead of transporting cattle to market by rail, they would be driven along the roads. He said it would pay to travel the roads any distance, says 30 miles—

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Will the Deputy allow me to say that there is no property in the roads in the local authorities. The care of the roads is entrusted to certain local authorities.

Mr. JOHNSON: "All land belonging to." It may be that the roads are not property, and that there are no patches abutting on the roads that are property, but I think it will be admitted that within the limits of that sub-section it would be possible for the Minister to order without notice the seizure of animals—cattle, horses, goats, or any other stock—that may be looking for fodder. It is surely not an unreasonable suggestion to say that where it is known to any police officer, military officer, or any other person who is given charge of the peace of a district that cattle are trespassing, an intimation to that effect should be given before those cattle are seized. It may be only one hour's notice, if they can reach the person owning the cattle. It may be notice put up on a gate; but due notice, surely, ought to be given to a man before his cattle are seized for an offence of this kind. To swoop down, on an assumption of guilty knowledge, is not reasonable. I submit that the proposition that some notice should be given to a man before you take his cattle and sell them is the least a Minister should be asked to do. The Minister will say, of course, that it is not his intention to do these things; "we are going to be assured of the facts of the case before we order that cattle shall be seized." I have no doubt that that is his intention. But there are always risks when you give power to people in Acts of Parliament to do things that should not be done. There is always a risk that they may do those things, and the proposition in the amendment is surely a very mild one, and not at all unreasonable. Is there any Deputy to say—for instance, my colleague in the representation of County Dublin, Deputy Rooney—that it is an unreasonable thing to ask that the owner of cattle shall be informed beforehand that his cattle are trespassing, and that if he does not remove them within one hour they will be taken? Is that an unreasonable request?

Mr. ROONEY: In normal times I think they should get notice.

Mr. JOHNSON: We are, on the authority of Ministers, entering into normal times. It is hoped that normality will have been reached before the end of six months—we hope before the end of one month—and notice ought to be given it is admitted in normal times. I submit that notice ought to be given at [Mr. Johnson.] any time before officers of the State, under direction of the Minister, enter upon a proceeding of this kind. I would quite honestly and sincerely ask the Minister either to accept this amendment or to give some reasonable explanation as to why it is impossible to give some notice before cattle are forcibly seized.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I want to put briefly the considerations which render acceptance of this amendment undesirable and impossible. The amendment practically amounts to this, that deliberate trespassers have a free fling until they receive notice that they are not to repeat the offence. Now, as to the practical difficulty of the amendment—supposing for a moment that I were to accept it—it is that nobody owns the cattle until they are seized. It is like hens trespassing in corn. They are freelance hens until they are caught in a trap or there is an accident with a dog, or something of that kind, and then the owner comes to the surface. I have some knowledge of these cases, stretching back for the last six or seven months, and I know that it would be a task beyond the wit of man to establish the ownership of cattle grazing in this way until the cattle are seized. Sometimes they are sent from a distance. A middleman grew up in this kind of business—a man who says: "I will keep that land clear of all stock except yours for so much a week or so much a month." A regular traffic and vested interests grew up around this kind of thing. Arrangements are frequently made that cattle are sent ten or twelve or fifteen miles to land that has been confiscated in this way. The passage of the Bill must be taken as the notice by all. People will have to learn to keep their stock on their own land. I do not agree for a moment that a person is entitled to enter into a bargain to put his cattle on certain land without taking very thorough steps to find out whether the person making that offer had any right to make it. That is something fundamental to all business transactions. You do not buy from a person without finding whether he has a right to sell, and you do not rent from a person without finding whether he has a right to let. If mistakes are made in this kind of transaction, the person who makes them has to take the consequences.

I direct attention to the provisions of the Section. Deputies will say that in one case in a thousand a mistake could be made, that a man might be innocently deceived into believing that the person who asked him to put his cattle on certain lands at so much per month had the right to let those lands. In Sub-section 2 you have this proviso: "Provided always that if such owner shall satisfy the Minister that the trespass by such cattle, or other animals, was accidental, or took place against the will of such owner, or was otherwise innocent"—surely that is broad enough—"the Minister may return such cattle and animals to such owner." I propose accepting Amendment 59 and Amendment 60. I think that ought to meet any reasonable case that there is or that has been put forward by those urging the acceptance of the particular amendment under consideration. Men must keep their stock on their own lands, and if a man has the misfortune to be possessed of what is called in the country a "rogue" cow, that no fences will stop, and that insists on trespassing, then he will never get any satisfaction with that animal, and the best thing he can do is to sell it. It will get him into trouble sooner or later. The Minister for Agriculture tells me that there might be some excuse for a yearling, but that a cow is old enough to know better.

The experience of recent months has made it absolutely necessary to meet this problem otherwise than by treating it as mere casual, accidental trespass or by leaving it to the injured party to bring a case before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction. It is more than a challenge to the rights of a particular owner. It is something that strikes at all stability and all security in the country, and if not checked would result in damage to credit and security throughout the country. We have to strike in this legislation the note that was struck long, long ago, "Woe to him who removeth his neighbour's landmark."

Mr. O'CONNELL: To come back to the particular amendment before the Dáil, I wish to point out that the only reasons put up by the Minister for refusing to accept this amendment, which provides for giving notice, is the difficulty of finding the owner. That is the only reason.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I did also put up the reason that it is not a sound thing or a proper thing that we should say, as in effect this amendment says to people, that they can go ahead for once—that they can go ahead until they get notice that they are not to go ahead.

Mr. O'CONNELL: The difficulty with regard to finding the owner need not worry him. It is possible to give notice without actually serving that notice on the actual owner of the stock. There is nothing to prevent him, for instance, if a complaint has been made that lands are being unlawfully trespassed upon, putting notice on the gates of these lands or putting notice on the nearest Civic Guard barrack, or having a notice put in the newspapers to the effect that cattle found trespassing on these lands will be seized by the military.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Then we will meet people who did not see the notice.

Mr. O'CONNELL: My suggestion would meet the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The notice was torn down or disfigured.

Mr. O'CONNELL: In any of these cases I presume it will be necessary that information should come to the Executive before action is ordered, unless, indeed, the proposal is that a general order will be issued to either Military or Civic Guard that where a complaint is made to them and where they are of opinion that trespass is taking place, they should go and seize the cattle themselves. That may be the machinery that will be set up, but I can see no reason for the Minister's objection to taking this amendment. I can see very many reasons indeed why the amendment should be accepted.

Mr. HOGAN: Even if there was no practical difficulty in the way of carrying out the terms of that amendment in practice I would be absolutely against it, and I am genuinely surprised that it is put up by the Labour Party. The amendment is intended to cover not only the very rare case of the man who is in possession of the land of another innocently, but the very numerous cases of persons who are in possession of other people's lands maliciously. I think there is no question about that. The amendment is drafted to cover both cases.

What does that mean? What is the principle behind that? It is an announcement that a man has the right to break the law once. It is exactly the same as if we were to set up a notice in Grafton Street: "No man shall steal a pound of tea more than once; no man shall take a motor car more than once." This is robbery; robbery of grass and produce, and what you are saying, in effect, in this notice is, "You are not to rob this man's grass more than once." This amendment is meant to cover not only the innocent, but the wilful trespass.

Mr. O'CONNELL: There are other remedies besides the seizure of stock.

Mr. HOGAN: I am aware of that, but this amendment is intended to cover not only innocent, but wilful trespass.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Drastic measures are taken.

Mr. HOGAN: I am not sure whether the amendment is intended to cover the innocent case at all—whether it is not intended to cover the wilful case exclusively, because it provided that notice be given the owner so that he may discontinue the trespass. In any event it is clearly intended to cover the wilful case. What does it amount to? It amounts to this, that in an Act of Parliament we are adopting the principle of saying to a possible wrongdoer: "You may steal once, but do not do it twice." I am genuinely surprised that Deputy Johnson has approved that amendment. The amendment is immoral. The principle is absolutely immoral and illegal, and I would not have it at any cost, even if the difficulties of administering it were removed.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister's surprise is astonishing. He suggests that the way to deal with an offender is to assume his guilty knowledge, take his property and sell it. I am assumed by the Minister for Agriculture—

Mr. HOGAN: On a point of order, I have not said that. I have not argued the question as to whether it is right or wrong to seize cattle. We can come to that later. That is not the issue at the moment. What I have stated is that the principle of that amendment is immoral. The principle of saying to a man, "You can commit an illegality with impunity once," is immoral.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Minister does not know what the section is dealing with. There is nothing in this amendment to suggest that you ought not to prosecute and imprison if necessary the man who sells another man's land or makes use of another man's land. There is no suggestion here of covering the offence. The suggestion here is that it is not the right way to deal with an offender by assuming his guilt and taking his cattle and selling them, without giving him any warning that he is assumed to be guilty. We are inviting you to prosecute the man. It is not yet the policy of the Government to take the various offences citizens are occasionally tempted to commit, and, without warning, go to their houses and take their property and send it to England to be sold. That is not yet suggested as a proposition to be put before the Dáil. The Minister is quite wrong in assuming that there is any suggestion here of condoning the offences that he assumes have been committed. We simply ask in this amendment that the offender shall be warned before you seize his cattle and take them away to sell. It does not prevent you immediately following that warning by prosecution for trespass. You may use all the forces of the law to deal with that offender, even if that amendment is accepted and embodied in the Act. There is nothing to prevent that being done. All we ask is that before seizing a man's cattle and selling them you shall give him an opportunity to take his cattle from the land of another on which you say he is trespassing. Prosecute him afterwards if you wish; bring him up before a Court for the offence of theft. But that is an entirely different proposition. You are then going to try a man for a definite offence against the law. In the other case you are simply taking away his property without having proved any offence.

Mr. HOGAN: I am extremely glad to have that interpretation of this clause from the Deputy, but it was a little bit belated. It was needed, at all events. The amendment reads:— "Before any cattle or other animals are seized under this section, notice of the intended seizure shall be given to the owner thereof, so that he may discontinue the trespass; but such notice shall not be given on the occasion of a second or other later wilful trespass." Now, that really needed a little explanation. It was a bit vague as it stood, and it was made particularly more vague by reason of the interpretation that was put on it by Deputy Lyons, who admitted that he had a weak spot in his heart, a kindly corner in his mind, for people who were putting in their cattle trespassing on other people's lands. I ask the Deputy to take the speeches which certain Deputies of his own Party have made on this section, and to read the section again, and to see whether my interpretation is not a more reasonable one.

Mr. JOHNSON: Certainly not. If this amendment is adopted or accepted, it is neither Deputy Lyons nor I will be interpreting it.

Mr. HOGAN: The Dáil will be enacting it.

Mr. JOHNSON: It will be interpreted by the Judge. The Dáil will be laying down what it desires and the lawyers and magistrates will interpret it. I am very dense and very dull, if that amendment is not very clear. It is just as clear to the Minister as it is to me.

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 13; Níl, 33.

Tá.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Liam de Róiste.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabhán Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seámas Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daímhín.
Seán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.

Nil.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
 Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
 Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
 Séamus Breathnach.
 Pádraig Mag Ualghairg.
 Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
 Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
 Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
 Micheál de Duram.
 Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
 Pilib Mac Cosgair.
 Micheál de Stáineas.
 Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
 Earnán Altún.
 Gearóid Mac Giobúin.
 Liam Thrift.
 Eoin Mac Néill.

Liam Mag Aonghusa.
 Pádraig Ó hOgáin.
 Pádraic Ó Máille.
 Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
 Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
 Séamus Ó Cruadhlaioich.
 Críostóir Ó Broin.
 Caoimhghin Ó hUigín.
 Próinsias Bulfin.
 Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
 Peadar Ó hAodha.
 Liam Mac Sioghaird.
 Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
 Earnán de Blaghd.
 Uinseann de Faoite.
 Séamus de Burea.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. JOHNSON: I move amendment 59:—"In Sub-section (2), line 28, to delete the word 'may' and to substitute therefor the word 'shall.'"

Mr. O'BRIEN: I move amendment 60—"In Sub-section (2), line 29, after the word 'owner' to insert the words 'or pay to such owner the fair value thereof.'"

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am accepting both these amendments.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. DAVIN: I move amendment 61, standing in my name. It is:—"In Sub-section (4) to delete lines 43 and 44 and to substitute therefor the words 'shall be paid to the owner of such cattle or other animals.'"

The section says: "The money paid for the redemption or the proceeds of the sale of any cattle or other animals redeemed or sold under this section shall be applied in the first place in or towards the payment of the expenses of the seizure, removal, detention, and sale of such cattle and other animals, and in the next place," and so on, and it directs that the surplus shall be forfeited and paid into such special account in such bank as the Minister for Finance shall from time to time direct. I think this section goes too far when it states that the surplus, if any, of such proceeds will be forfeited and paid into such bank as the Minister for Finance shall from time to time direct. It is quite obvious that the sub-section in the earlier parts provides for compensation to the owner of the invaded land, and then goes on to provide for the confiscation of any surplus proceeds of the sale. This is an arbitrary penalty. It is arbitrary because its extent depends not on the nature or gravity of the offence, but on the mere fact whether the amount that the cattle realise at the sale exceeds the amount of the compensation or not.

The State is entitled to punish evil-doers, but it is not entitled to make a profit out of their misdeeds. I suggest that the Minister, in view of the many things he has said in support of this Bill and the many other Bills in the Dáil, would be the last man to come forward and take up a Bill for compensation even of a private individual who might be guilty of offences with which part of this section pretends to deal. I move the amendment standing in my name.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE
 at this stage took the Chair.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The effect of this section, and the purpose of this section, is simply to convince people beyond all doubt that this particular line is not profitable; that it is not a paying game. If this amendment were accepted it provides certainly for compensation to the injured person. That is a sound principle. It says that before you go out to search the pockets of the ratepayers, you are going to levy compensation from the perpetrators of the wrong. But that is not a new principle. The Conspiracy Code provides for it, that where men combine to commit damage or to do wrong that they can be held jointly and severally liable for the wrong they do before other steps are taken to secure compensation for the injured person. Now, we have the sound but old principle of levying compensation from those who commit injury. You have further in the section a provision for covering the costs

[Mr. O'Higgins.] of securing compensation. The additional words directing compensation of the balance is the only penalty in the sense of pure penalty. The Deputy's amendment provides to do away with that. He will scarcely question that analysis of the section—compensation, the costs of securing that compensation, and then something that is not costs or compensation, but purely penalties.

Mr. DAVIN: Is this to be regarded as a fine?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Yes, the remainder would be. I cannot accept the idea that this should be reduced merely to a matter of compensation and costs. I might offer some compromise to meet the Deputy's views, which appears to be that it ought only to be compensation and costs, if he could meet me to the extent of saying something to this effect:—"And the surplus, if any, after such additional fine as the circumstances of the case may seem to demand has been paid, shall be returned." That would at least have the effect of securing that the whole of the surplus would not be confiscated to the Exchequer. Remember that in our view, when this kind of flagrant invasion of property rights takes place, there is greater injury done than the injury merely to the individual owner. An act of that kind constitutes a challenge to the State, and to the State's laws, and if I were to accept the Deputy's amendment there would be no penalty from the point of view of the State. There is merely compensation to the injured owner, and provision for the levying of the costs to secure such compensation for the injured owner, but there is no purely penal section to adjust or counterbalance the wrong to the State, the injury to the State and the challenge to the State. That is implicit in an act of that kind. It is implicit and explicit. I would be prepared then to accept an amendment, the effect of which would be to restore all the surplus after this penalty had been met.

Mr. JOHNSON: I wonder does the Minister realise what is contained in this section. The Minister speaks quite clearly as though he was not merely the Executive Minister ordering the seizure on the land for proved trespass, but he is also the judge in the case of inflicting the penalty. That is a greater authority than he has asked in any other measure, I think, in respect of property certainly. But will the Minister consider how inequitable it is? If a person owning these cattle happens to be a wealthy man, the punishment is going to fall lightly on him because he has other property, and the forfeiture of the proceeds of, say, six beasts may be quite a small penalty to a wealthy man. If the expenses of that detention were not very high even under the suggestion for the amendment by the Minister, the balance that will be returnable will be greater. But if it happens to be a poor man, who is living by the ownership of two or three cattle, and has been virtually using another man's land for the feeding of these cattle, the seizure of his cattle is not merely depriving him of the value of these cattle, but it is imposing a greater punitive measure upon him, because his offence is confined to a smaller number of cattle. That is quite unjust and inequitable. If the amendment were adopted it would at least modify and regulate the penalty in some degree to fit the offence. But if the section as it stands is retained, it simply means that if the offender is wealthy the punishment is not going to be so heavy, or if the cost of the sale and detention are smaller the punishment is not going to be so heavy. There is no regulation of the penalty according to the guilt of the offender. If the Minister seeks, as he does in his suggested amendment, the imposing of a fine, surely that fine ought to be measured by the offence, not by the value of the cattle, not by the cost of detention, but by something proximate to the guilt of the offender. Now, the amendment would at least move in the direction of regulating the penalty, but the section as it stands is distinctly unjust and unfair. I am not in that argument stressing the fact that the Minister is to be the prosecutor as well as the judge. That, I think, might have to be discussed again. From the point of view of fitting the penalty to the offence some change is required in the sub-section.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I appreciate, of course, what the Deputy says as to the inadvisability of placing an Executive Minister in a quasi-judicial capacity, to decide the exact amount of the fines and so on. But to meet that view I would go to the length of inviting the Dáil to state the proportion of the balance of the surplus, after compensation and costs.

that ought not to be returned. If it would meet the Deputy's views to say that for a first offence 25 per cent. of the surplus to be confiscated to the public Exchequer, for the second offence, say, 50 per cent. of the surplus to be confiscated, and that in any subsequent offence the whole of the balance would be confiscated, I would be agreeable to have something like that at a subsequent stage. But I do stress this, that in this Bill, and having regard to all attendant circumstances of the times, this offence is visualised rather as an offence against the State and against public order and morality than as an injury done to one individual citizen, by an infringement on his property rights. Now, in the case of contrabrand the goods are seized summarily and arbitrarily, and the penalty is imposed, not by a Court or Judge, but by the Revenue Department itself, which makes the seizure. We are advised that if our right arm offend us we should cut it off and cast it from us, not half of it or a quarter of it, but the right arm. If a man's cow or cows offend in this particular way in these times, and after the very solemn warnings that have taken place within recent months by military action, and after the solemn warnings of this Bill, I, myself, do not consider it excessive that the entire proceeds of the sale should be confiscated, going partly to the compensation of the owner who is wronged, partly in costs to secure such compensation, and the balance to the State. But I would go some length to meet the views that have been expressed by endeavouring to set out in the section the proportion that ought to be retained. That would, at least, obviate the objection that Deputy Johnson has urged of placing the Minister in quasi-judicial capacity. This Court would then be deciding the amount of the fine in proportion to the total value of the proceeds. This is the highest Court in the land. I do not think there would be anything wrong or anomalous in the Dáil stating that a fixed proportion of the balance should be confiscated to the State, having regard to the fact that we, in this Bill and this Sub-section, are visualising this offence as an offence against the State and an offence against public order, rather than viewing it from the angle of the individual owner whose property rights are encroached upon.

Mr. JOHNSON: The suggestion of the Minister does not meet, I think, with the approval, and should not meet with the approval of the Dáil. The offence to my mind of allowing a dozen yearling stores to feed on another man's land is just as great as to allow a dozen two-year olds to feed on that man's land. The damage may be greater in the second case, but the compensation to the owner of the land may require to be higher. But the offence is as heinous in the one case as in the other, and if you are going to deal with this offender in the same way as you would with the offender who tries to evade the Customs, then you will definitely fine the offender for the offence as well as confiscating the property. To deal with the offender for the offence before you endeavour to try him, let the fine be a punishment for the stated offence. Apart from the question of compensation, from the question of seizure, take the offender and prosecute him and punish him for the offence. As to the punishment which might be applied, and no doubt would be applied, the loss of his property should be considered in inflicting that punishment. No doubt that would be done. But surely it is the proper course to adopt to punish a man for an offence and fine accordingly, instead of letting the fine be an automatic affair according to the value of the property which has been seized. The circumstances, for instance, of, say, a second or third trespass would make the offence very much greater. If it were the second or third offence it would be immeasurably greater in its guilt than for the first offence, and if it happened that the expenses of effecting the sale of the seized cattle on the second occasion were very much higher than the expenses on the first occasion the amount of the fine on a sliding scale arrangement would by no means fit the crime. But I think that the proposal of the Minister is quite apart from the requirements of the case. I submit that the suggestion in the amendment is a wiser one. That is, that if you are demanding that the proceeds of the sale shall, in the first case, go towards the payment of expenses attending the seizure and sale, and in the second place to order the payment of compensation for a person who has suffered by the trespass, then the balance ought to be put to the credit of the offender, and before it is confiscated he should be tried for the offence. The nature of the offence should be proved, and then let him be treated by way of fine or imprisonment. Do not let the fine be a chance affair. Do not let it be automatically dependent as to whether the sale was good or bad, or the expenses high or low. These are matters entirely outside the control of the Minister or judge and the director of the prosecution, and entirely outside the control of the offender. It is, I think, far from reasonable that the Minister should make such a suggestion, as being equitable or just. The suggestion in the amendment certainly is much more related to one's sense of fairness, and it does not deprive the Minister of the right, aye, of the duty, to prosecute for this specific offence. Let the citizen who does wrong realise that he is being charged by the State which he has offended for that offence, and it is not a matter of the relationship between the offender and the owner of the property, but that it is in fact, as the Minister has urged, an offence against the State, and the State should deal with the offender against the law, not letting the penalty be automatic according to chance circumstances over which neither the prisoner nor the State nor the owner has control.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. O'HIGGINS: In legislation of this kind there will of course be of necessity a certain arbitrary element. But the matter is not quite so arbitrary as Deputy Johnson endeavoured to represent when he selected as a matter of example the yearlings and two-year olds. The matter is not quite so arbitrary as that. This, if you wish, is summary and drastic, and to use a familiar phrase, rough and ready legislation. The times demand it. We are making no apology for it. But the principle is this. You have to treat the cause of this disease. You must treat the cause first. There is no use playing about with the symptoms. Deputy Sir James Craig will, I have no doubt, bear me out in that. You have to treat the causes, and the cause in this case is greed, the hope of gain, of illicit gain, gain from crime, and you can only check that, I submit, by setting off against that hope of gain a very definite and a very real prospect of loss. Now, the gain hoped for will be in proportion to the value and ages of the stock that is put into trespass. A man who puts in a calf—

Mr. JOHNSON: Would it not be rather the period during which the cattle are grazing?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Well, he probably hopes to trespass indefinitely. The man who puts in a calf hopes to realise a certain definite gain by that process, the same with yearlings, and the same in the case of a man who puts in two-year olds. If Deputy Johnson tells me that it is not right that the man who puts in twelve yearlings should suffer more than the man who puts in a calf, that they both commit the same offence, the answer to that is two-fold. For one thing they do not both do the same damage, and for another thing there should be the principle of setting off your penalties so as to bear a rough proportion to the motive that insured the crime and the hope of gain. Deputy Davin is puzzled but Deputy Davin has sufficient agricultural recollections to know that what I say is true, that a man who puts in, say, two-years' old bullocks—forward stores—and expects to fatten and finish them on his neighbour's land is visualising a certain definite gain by doing that. In all the circumstances of the time and having regard to the extent to which this problem exists and the proportions to which it has grown you can only offset that by putting against it a very real prospect of a very substantial loss. You can go down the scale from the two-years' old forward store to the calf and substantially the loss will be in proportion to the gain hoped for. The man with the calf will lose in proportion to the gain hoped for and the man with the forward store loses likewise. You will not cure this disease in the body politic by any other process than by treating the cause and the cause is greed. Nothing that we did in recent months so struck the imagination of our naturally quick-witted people as that particular line of treating the cause; it sank home immediately. The lesson was learned. A blow struck here had reactions thirty miles away, so quick were people to learn the lesson. Deputies know that I am talking the truth. For six months we ask power to continue that procedure, until this evil will be once and for all eradicated. I cannot go into the mathematics of the thing. You could not in legislation of this kind. But it is sound principle to say that the man who goes out to rob, because it is robbery, in the hope of gain, must be counterbalanced by the hope of loss.

Mr. DAVIN: I was rather surprised at the admission of the Minister when defending this Bill, that it was confiscation. It is a case of confiscation to deal with confiscation.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Yes.

Mr. DAVIN: It is quite obvious, I am sure, to the Minister that the amendment is not for the purpose of preventing him and those who are responsible for dealing with such offences from punishing people in a proper and equitable way. The Minister, or whoever is going to act for him, has arbitrary powers for the seizure, removal, detention and sale of such cattle or other animals. Let us see the inequity of the case. Take for instance when the cattle are brought from Kanturk on the one hand and from the West of Ireland or the County Meath on the other. It is quite obvious that there would be a big difference in the charge for removal in these three particular cases. There might be a balance in one case whereas there would be no possibility of a balance in the other. Let us take the case of the two-years' old that the Minister spoke of. They might fetch in ordinary circumstances £20 per head. The cost of the seizure might be a different thing in so far as the troops who would be going to carry out the seizure might have to travel longer distances. The wages of the troops also have to be taken into consideration, and the cost of the railway journey, the carriage of the cattle, the cost of the detention, and so on. If all these things are taken into consideration they would form a very big proportion of the amount which the Minister or his representative would get in the Dublin Cattle Market for the cattle coming from different places and brought under different circumstances. The Minister was apparently in doubt when he was drafting this Section as to whether or not there would be a surplus. He asks the Dáil to say in a case where the actual value of the cattle sold is only sufficient to cover the cost of the seizure, removal, detention, sale and compensation for trespass, what proportion of the surplus 25, 50 or 5 per cent., where there is none, is going to be imposed on the individual. If there is no surplus how are you going to recover what the Minister states is in the nature of a fine?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Of course 25 per cent. of nothing is nothing.

Mr. DAVIN: The section then does not make provision for recovery of the standard fine where no surplus is available. I think if the Minister works the problem out from a mathematical point of view, taking the place of seizure, the distance of removal, the wages of the soldiers, the distance they have to travel and what it costs the Government to send them there, in the long run the unfairness and inequity of the whole proposition will be seen.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I made an offer on this proposal. If it is not accepted, I simply stand by the Section as it stands, that would be complete confiscation—compensation, costs and the surplus to the State. If the offer is accepted, even grudgingly, even as Deputy FitzGibbon said yesterday "with modified thankfulness," then I would bring up something to that effect on the next stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: I cannot advise Deputies to accept any such offer or any compromise of that kind which asks that offences shall be punished in that haphazard way, that fines shall be imposed by chance methods, rough and ready as they may be. I was sorry to have heard the Minister use the illustration in support of the Section, that because drastic action had been taken it had been effective even thirty miles away. The result of drastic action has been the one criterion as to the rightness of such action. I am not unfamiliar with the philosophy of those people who have advocated that the way to get things done is to do them without regard to procedure or usual methods of law—the philosophy of the direct-actionist. I am reminded every time the Minister utters his defence, of certain actions on the ground that the end justifies the means, of the philosophy of the direct-actionist. Peace reigns at Warsaw! The destruction of Warsaw brought peace. Peace was the end sought, and that was all about it. It did not matter how the end had been attained.

We have asked that this amendment should be accepted because the method proposed of dealing with cattle seized, because of trespass, was going to act inequitably upon the various offenders, that there was no fitting the punishment to the offence. There was a distinct preference given to the man who had means. The wealthy offender was, without question, treated more leniently than the poor offender, and the suggested method of equalising the penalty was to simply remove some modicum of the gamble. If the expenses were greater then the balance to be divided would be smaller, and the 25 per cent. in that case would be a greater penalty than in another case.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Again, there is no modification of the fine or punishment where the offender is a first offender, a second offender or a regular criminal. There is no equity in the method at all, and the suggested improvement made by the Minister does not go any degree whatever to remove that inequity.

Mr. O'DONNELL: I would not make the distinction at all that Deputy John-

The Dáil divided: Tá, 13; Níl, 33.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Liam de Róisto.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mac Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Darghal Fíges.
Doaenhumhain Mac Gearailt.
Seán Ó Ruanaidh.
Micheál de Duram.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altun.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Néill.

son has made between the wealthy offender and the poor offender. The distinction I would make is between the accidental offender and the wilful offender. If cattle go in accidentally and trespass on land and, perhaps, destroy a crop, the owner should be fully compensated for that crop, but for a wilful offence there should be some more punishment. I would draw a distinction between the wilful and the accidental, and I would say that there should be some more punishment for a wilful offence than for an accidental offence.

Mr. JOHNSON: The Section does not give that.

Mr. GERALD FITZGIBBON took the Chair at this stage.

Mr. O'DONNELL: Of course I would not mind about a bona fide cow that would stray along the road.

Amendment put.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Soán Ó Laidhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.

Níl.

Liam Mac Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faolencháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaioich.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Próinsias Mac Aonghusa.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seamus de Burea.

Amendment declared lost.

Mr. DESMOND FITZGERALD: In Deputy Duggan's absence I move Amendment No. 2:—"In Sub-section (4), lines 43 and 44, to delete the words 'such special account in such bank as the Minister for Finance shall from time to time direct,' and to substitute therefor the words the 'Exchequer in accordance with such directions as may be given from time to time by the Minister for Finance.'"

This amendment is merely a change in the drafting. The original draft was faulty. As drafted there is no indication as to what is to become of the surplus moneys when they are lodged. The amendment ensures that such surplus money will be brought into the Exchequer.

Mr. JOHNSON: It does not seem to me that this is merely a change in drafting. It seems to me to imply a distinct change in purpose. The original intention was that such surpluses should be paid into such special account in such bank as the Minister for Finance shall, from time to time, direct. One would conclude from that, that there was an intention to keep the sums apart, to have them available and easily recognisable as sums kept apart for a distinct purpose. But the amendment rather suggests swallowing them up in the ordinary Exchequer, subject to such direction as may be given from time to time by the Minister for Finance. It rather seems that there is a change of intention covered by the change in phraseology. If the Minister had desired simply to do what the mover of the amendment alleges he would have added words "to be paid into such special account in such bank, and to be disposed of by the Minister for Finance as he shall from time to time direct." But the stress is laid here upon a special account, and I think there was a distinct intention in the Section as it stands to segregate these moneys with a view to, perhaps, restitution, or for such specific purpose. I think that the handing of those moneys into the ordinary Exchequer is not an improvement, though no doubt the Minister for Finance can find ways and means of getting instructions from the Dáil as to what is to become of the money which has been paid into the Exchequer. Am I not right in saying that once moneys were paid into the Exchequer it would require a specific vote of the Dáil to take them out and utilise them for a distinct purpose?

ACTING CHAIRMAN (Mr. FitzGibbon): That, I think, is an ordinary rule with regard to all moneys paid into the Exchequer. They can only be paid out in accordance with directions of the Dáil.

Mr. JOHNSON: So I think that makes a distinct change in the intention, and I would ask that some explanation be given as to why that change is required. The paying of these surpluses into a special account, as was originally intended, might well cover the purpose of paying those surpluses automatically on certain conditions, but I think that the amendment requires some further explanation before it should be accepted.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: There is nothing sinister about the amendment as the Deputy seems to suggest. It is merely technical. On the one hand in the draft as it stood you had the instruction that this money would be kept in a special account, a separate bank, and the proposal is now that it be paid into the Exchequer in accordance with the directions of the Minister for Finance. It is not true to suggest that the former wording left the door any more open for recoupment than the present wording, or that the present wording any more bangs the doors on the possibility of recoupment in whole or in part than the former wording. In either case there could be no question of recoupment except by formal legislation to that effect. Deputy Johnson's statement rather suggested that in the previous case it would be open to the Dáil by resolution presumably—he did not state by what means exactly—to instruct the Minister for Finance as to the disposal of funds in the special account, and he seems to have an idea that the change removes such a possibility. Now that possibility did not exist. The previous wording was: "and the surplus if any of such money or proceeds shall be forfeited and paid into such special account." If the surplus is forfeit to the State it becomes the property of the State, and can only be disposed of by legislation initiated by the Minister for Finance. That is my information and my advice on this section, and the Deputy is not correct in his suggestion that there is any substantial change any more than what the mover of the amendment stated, and any more than a mere technical drafting change as between the amendment, and the wording as it stood.

Mr. JOHNSON: Of course there is the possibility that the Section as printed in the original draft might mean that the proceeds having had taken from them the expenses of the compensation, shall be forfeited by the holders of those proceeds, and the surplus shall be forfeited and paid into an account. They no longer are the property of the Minister who directs the sale.

ACTING CHAIRMAN: They never were the property of the Minister who directed the sale. The Minister acted on behalf of the State; they cannot be forfeited by the Minister who holds in his Ministerial capacity.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is no suggestion no definite contention here, that the proceeds of the sale are then the property of the State. The Section does not provide for that until we come to the word "forfeited." It does not say they shall be forfeited to the State as the Minister interprets. These proceeds of the sale of cattle are to be expended in certain ways and the balance is to be forfeited. To whom and by whom? They are to be forfeited and paid into a special account in a bank. No doubt inasmuch as they are paid into the account directed by the Minister for Finance, they shall be under his control, but there is nothing in this Section which says they have then become the property of the State. While I do not suppose the amendment makes a tremendous change, there is an added implication, a more direct implication, that the forfeiture is into the Exchequer, and it is a forfeiture to the State, and that is a very distinct change in the intention, at least in the language, and the possible interpretation of the clause as originally drafted and the clause as it would be amended if this amendment were passed. I think that the holding of those monies in a suspense account of some kind in a special bank may be more satisfactory than putting them into the Exchequer, and, in a way, losing them in the general sum.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Amendment put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 35; Níl, 12.

Tá.

Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Domhnall Ó Mocháin.
Seamus Breathnach.
Pádraig Mag Ualghairg.
Peadar Mac a' Bháird.
Darghal Fíges.
Seoirse Ghabháin Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Deasmhumhain Mac Gearailt.
Seán Ó Ruaneidh.
Micheál de Duram.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altín.
Sir Seamus Craig.
Liam Thrift.

Liam Mag Aonghusa.
Pádraig Ó hÓgáin.
Pádraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faoileacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Seamas Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Eoin Mac Néill.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghlin Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Próinsias Mag Aonghusa.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faoite.
Seamus de Burea.

Níl.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Liam de Róiste.
Tomás Mac Eoin.
Liam Ó Briain.
Tomás Ó Conaill.

Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
Seamus Eabhróid.
Liam Ó Daimhlín.
Seán Ó Laidhin.
Cathal Ó Seannáin.
Domhnall Ó Muirgheasa.

Amendment declared carried.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move to Report progress, the Committee to resume at 3 o'clock on Monday. I am not now moving the Section.

Motion put and agreed to.

[THE DAIL RESUMES.]

Progress Reported. Committee ordered to sit again on Monday.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move that the Dáil now adjourns until 3 o'clock on Monday.

Motion put and agreed to.

The Dáil adjourned at 3.50 p.m.

DAIL EIREANN.

DE LUAIN, 16ADH IUL, 1923.

(Monday, 16th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar a 3.15 p.m. Bhí an Ceann Comhairle, Micheál O hAodha, 'sa Chathaoir.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDERS.

MINISTER for HOME AFFAIRS (Mr. Kevin O'Higgins): Before we proceed with the business, I have to move: "That the Dáil sit later than 8.30 to-day for the consideration of the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Bill, 1923, and adjourn not later than 6 a.m. to-morrow, Tuesday, 17th July."

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. Blythe): I second that.

Mr. JOHNSON: I would like to hear some reasons given before this question is thrown into discussion.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I should have thought that the reasons are very obvious. There is a heavy legislative programme awaiting the consideration of the Dáil and Seanad, and it is necessary to get through this Bill in order that other Bills may be brought forward for the consideration of the Dáil. The reasons are just the same reasons as compelled us to sit late on Thursday night last—just the same reasons.

Mr. JOHNSON: That means that there are no reasons whatever. The legislative programme that is before us is one other Bill, of which the Second Reading has been taken, and to which a very small number of amendments have been put forward. That is the heavy legislative programme that we are asked to deal with. When is the General Election? Is it next week or the week after, or three weeks or a month hence? If not, where is the heavy legislative programme that demands a night sitting? That is not the reason, notwithstanding what the Minister says. I protest against what I consider to be very scurvy treatment of the Dáil by the Minister and his colleagues.

On Thursday, we were here to discuss business in the ordinary course, with the ordinary Standing Orders, having had the ordinary notice that the business would be conducted in the ordinary way. We have had, week after week, business coming to us, adjournments over several dates. We have had men coming from the country for one day and going back again with no other business in hands. Then the Minister comes forward on Thursday, and tells us that we have to sit beyond the normal period. He moved that we sit until 4 o'clock in the morning. On Friday we adjourned without any notice of any new procedure, of any suspension of Standing Orders, or any alterations in Parliamentary time. The Minister comes forward to-day again at 3 o'clock in the day, and tells us that we are to suspend the Standing Orders. He moves the suspension of the Standing Orders for the abolition of the time limit. I say that is scurvy treatment of the Dáil. It means that in the minds of the Ministers this Dáil is merely a toy for them to play with. We are to say "ditto." "What we have decreed, you are to obey." I resent that kind of treatment. I ask the Dáil to resent that kind of treatment.

Ministers have been treated by the Dáil very fairly, and very reasonably, and with the greatest possible amount of consideration. They have brought forward Bills here; they have broken their rules of order. They have broken their Standing Orders time after time, and they asked for the leniency of the Dáil. They do it time after time. They have broken all the rules of order, and all the rules of debate. Then they come forward to the Dáil and say, "Here is a thing we want done." They give the Dáil no consideration whatever. They say, "Because we have willed it the majority of the Dáil must follow us." We have been given no consideration whatever. That is scurvy treatment of the Dáil, and we resent it. If the Ministers are going to treat the Dáil in the way they threaten they will get all the opposition they require. If they are going to treat the Dáil as a toy, if they are going to destroy any attempt to make this Assembly worthy of the name of Parliament, if they are going to destroy this Dáil they are welcome to it, and they will get every possible amount of assistance. They can easily do it. If they are going to challenge us to bring this Dáil into contempt, then they can have it brought into contempt.

[Mr. Johnson.]

I say that the method of conducting business has been a scandal and a shame, and this procedure of trying to rush a Bill of this kind through in the small hours of the morning, and coming here in the afternoon of the day and asking for the suspension of the Standing Orders so that we shall be here again all night, is treating the Dáil scurvily, and without any of the reasonable amount of consideration with which men should be treated.

The PRESIDENT: I regret that the Deputy has thought fit to use such language as he has used in connection with the motion for the suspension of the Standing Orders.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There is no motion to suspend the Standing Orders. Under the Standing Orders a motion can be made without notice for the extension of the time.

The PRESIDENT: Well, the motion for the suspension of the time limit. It is a motion at any rate that is provided for, and for which the Standing Orders were specially adapted to make provision. The Deputy says we have not good reasons for this particular proposal. I gave the reasons on the last day, the first day that we moved to sit late. The reasons were, first, there was a considerable amount of business, and I adhere to that statement. There is a considerable amount of business. Some thirteen estimates have not yet been passed, and when they are passed an Appropriation Bill will be necessary, and it will have to be dealt with before the first of August. In addition to that there are other Bills practically ready for introduction, but we must clear the way with regard to this particular measure. The question is: is this Bill that is now presented a Bill of any importance? Is it a Bill of urgency, and is it a Bill in connection with which the Deputy, if he were here on these Benches and in the same position as we are, would be free to say "I will not have this Bill." Everybody in the Dáil, and nobody better than the Deputy, knows that if he were here he would have to introduce a Bill not having, perhaps, all the attributes of this particular measure; at any rate he would have to introduce a Bill similar in its main functions, having the same character and embracing the same provisions as there are in this one. If other business be tabled it will delay the passing of this Bill, and the passing of this Bill cannot be delayed. I quite admit the Dáil has treated the Ministry with every consideration; I have admitted that more than once. I have admitted that as far as the transaction of ordinary business is concerned, we have been facilitated in every way at any time that we asked to be facilitated. Deputies are certainly aware of the fact that we had not a free hand with regard to many measures that were brought forward. Some had got to be considered before a certain date; other matters of considerable importance had to be brought forward before they were considered; and there were occasions when we had to ask for special consideration owing to the circumstance of the time. We are not living in normal times; everybody knows that. There may be people who say that we are approaching normality. I quite admit that. We may have normal conditions now; but, the setting up of a Government to arrange for the laying of a foundation for the future convenience and stability of the State, is a matter of no small difficulty now as compared with a normal period. While Deputies are perfectly entitled to criticise the Ministry, the Ministry's time has not been sufficient. Twenty-four hours in the day are not sufficient to enable us to deal with present legislation. The setting up of services required considerable attention. Some had to be constructed from the very foundations, and that work had to be carried on together with the ordinary transaction of the affairs of Government. During that period there have been continuous communications in regard to the financial adjustments and otherwise between the British Government and this country. I am positively certain that for some time to come, even when a new Government has been elected, such delays are inevitable until really normal conditions are restored, and by normal conditions I mean normal conditions of government, in which it will not be necessary to take up these temporary financial adjustments that have to be made. The Deputy asks when will the General Election take place. I can assure him that I am not in a position to say when the General Election will be.

I am not in a position to say for two reasons, one of which is very material to the issue. I do not know at this moment when exactly the Register will be available. We cannot decide when an Election will take place until we have that information. The other reason is that there are certain Bills to be considered before the General Election. I do not know that I could give any more satisfactory answer than that, and it does appear to me while the Deputy may feel annoyed, that we have not resented very lengthy discussion on this particular measure. We have not introduced the closure on this or on any other measure. I explained that if we did that it would not be necessary for us to ask for those long sittings. We wish that to this and other Bills the greatest consideration and the most lengthy consideration should be given by the Deputies. I am sure Deputy Johnson will admit that so far as this is concerned what I have stated is exactly the case.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The President has asked whether the measure before the Dáil is an important one. It is. It is so important that plenty of time should be given for its discussion. What are the facts?

It was introduced without half as much notice as any other measure that has been introduced. It went through its first and second stages. It came forward for Committee on last Monday, and, as everybody in the Dáil is aware, when it came before the Committee last Monday the Dáil had to adjourn until Tuesday because sufficient notice, even according to the Standing Orders, had not been given for its consideration. In other words, Monday, legislatively, was largely lost. I am not attributing blame in any particular direction for that, but nobody knows better than Ministers that three or four weeks ago the Dáil adjourned for two or three days. No. I am not going to object to an adjournment of that kind, but if there was need for such desperate haste and desperate urgency in the consideration of all these things why not make a better use of the time at the disposal of the Dáil? I remember that the adjournment was moved on the night of the Second Reading of this Bill, and it was moved for a certain purpose; that purpose was achieved after two days, namely the second two days of the races at the Curragh. There still remained one further Parliamentary day, and it would have been quite possible for the Dáil to have dealt with its legislation on that other day. The consideration of further Estimates was before the Dáil at that time, but they were not reached and we are now told that they must be got through before a particular time, but the Dáil at the request of the Ministry wasted its time, and declined to meet at a time when, according to the opinion of the Ministry, it ought to have met. Whose fault was that? Certainly not the fault of those who were endeavouring to carry out their duty by criticising the Bill. With the exception of six or seven people on this side of the Dáil and two or three elsewhere, apart from the Ministers concerned, the Dáil has given little or no consideration to the Bill. It has simply taken it as it was put before it and it is prepared on the whole to do the same for the future. Why exactly is it necessary that this thing should be done to-night and at such short notice? Why must you have the measure pass its Committee Stage before to-morrow morning? What is the business before the Dáil to-morrow? The talk on the last occasion that this step was taken about the necessity for doing this in a hurry was largely fudge, because no matter how much we hurry the matter here it has still got to go through the Seanad, and the Seanad is not meeting within the next two or three days. We have got to have the Report Stage before that and also the Final Stage. You did get two or three days' work squeezed into 21 hours on Thursday night and Friday morning, but I hope that this Dáil will never put itself in the position in which the Seanad has put itself when it squeezed three or four weeks' work into twenty minutes. The thing is a scandal. You have got already, and I suggest you take full advantage of it, a docile majority that will vote here whatever the Ministry puts before it without question. I have no hesitation in saying that. There has been no attempt unduly to prolong the Committee Stage of this Bill.

I have taken some pains to look over the time spent by the various speakers in criticism of the Bill. I find invariably that they had not taken the full limit of time allowed by the Standing Orders.

[Cathal O'Shannon.]

Those of the Deputies who attend the debates while they are going on know perfectly well, and no one knows it better than the Minister, that those who have been opposing the measure could work out the full limit. They have not done so; they have confined themselves to speaking at such length as they think necessary for dealing with particular points. I do not want at all to discuss the Bill or any of its provisions now, but I suggest that it is just as unnecessary to rush this Bill as it is unnecessary to put certain exceptional provisions into the Bill. On Thursday night the Ministry thought, I presume, that by having an all-night sitting they could wear out the opposition to the Bill, and that legislative consciences were so elastic that after three or four hours' discussion we would be as tractable as the Government majority in the Dáil. We were not. We were sent here to perform certain duties. To the best of our ability and judgment we have been performing them and we shall continue to perform those duties, but if there is anything to the discredit of the Dáil that discredit will not fall on the opposition to the Bill, but will fall on the majority supporting the measure. Again and again we have noted that the greatest weakness and the biggest fault of this Dáil have been the docility of the majority of the Dáil in regard to whatever is put before them. They consider themselves simply little more than a mere registering machine.

Long ago, at the height of your crisis, when you were threatened with the overthrowing, not only of this Dáil and of this Ministry, but with the overthrow of the Treaty which brought this Dáil, this Ministry and this Free State into existence, you did things that we had occasion to oppose. I want to say that, in spite of the bitter opposition on many things we had to give you then, we had such a keen realisation of our duties that, whether personally, politically, or collectively distasteful to us, we took our stand on certain things. We continue to take that stand, and in the deliberate judgment at least, of one of us, we did a great national service to this State by doing so, because at any moment had we chosen we could have let you remain simply a registering machine—not a mutual admiration society exactly, but a body that would not even have the courage to be a mutual admiration society, but that would come here day after day, hour after hour, and rush indecently without any consideration, except the consideration given by draftsmen and Ministers, every measure. We did not choose to do so; we took a different line. We thought it was the duty, at least, of somebody in the Dáil to subject measures that came before the Dáil to scrutiny and examination. No Minister, and no Deputy supporting the Government can deny that if there came helpful suggestions, if there came useful hints from any side of the Dáil outside the Ministry, they came from those who are opposing this measure, and they only came because those opposing this measure now, and who were criticising and examining previous measures, gave thought and consideration to those measures, examined them line by line, picked out what they thought were their weaknesses, suggested changes that they thought would be useful, helpful, and strengthening to those measures.

We have done the same with this measure. We have tried to change it; we have not asked for anything except ordinary consideration. We have only asked that the Dáil should be treated as a legislative assembly, purely and simply as a deliberative and legislative assembly. If you want it to be something less than that, something quite different, then in honesty and decency you ought to say so, and if anyone has an objection to your change of mind, to your change of policy, to your new conception of what the Dáil ought to be, then those who have such objections can consider their position and decide whether they will or will not support you by continuing to take part in the proceedings. In theory you have deliberately chosen that this should be a deliberative and legislative assembly. We have endeavoured to help in making it so, and now, because you are piqued, because you are disappointed and vexed like children at school, because you cannot get your own way in everything, then you must have all night sittings. Perhaps it is not so much that we would object to you voting as a block; you are quite entitled to do it. It is the custom, more or less, and the practice of such assemblies as this to do that. But your greatest sin in this Dáil has been your absolute indifference to discussion.

Mr. BLYTHE: On a point of order, is the Deputy addressing the Chair?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputy is to address the Chair.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: The greatest sin and weakness of the Dáil has been that Deputies have refused to discuss certain things. Certain things were stated in the Press about the last all-night sitting, many of them incorrect. Can anyone deny that throughout this discussion you were not engaged in deliberating at all until the division bell rung? If you desire that there should be no division bells rung, that the Ministry should be allowed to do just as they please, if the Dáil desires that that should be the state of affairs let the Ministry say so, and some of us, at all events, will do our best to accommodate them.

Professor MAGENNIS: The Deputy who has just spoken seems to take so much delight in bouquets being thrown that, in default of their being thrown by others, he throws bouquets to himself and to his Party, and it would be a pity not to add to his gratification by throwing a further bouquet from the Independent benches. It is true that, in these days of strain to which he refers so feelingly, it was unnecessary to force attendance in the Dáil during the long sittings, because in these days the patriotism of the Deputy and his Party exhibited itself conspicuously. There was no attempt to speak out lengthened speeches in wearisome detail, but there was a desire to be helpful, and to make the proposed measures more useful and more effective for their intended purpose. I was present throughout the greater part of the sitting of Thursday night and Friday morning.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Silent.

Professor MAGENNIS: I was present. Does the Deputy suggest that my mind was not working? He went out of his way to be offensive to many of us, and declared that, because we did not join in the childish amusements in which he indulged himself, that therefore we were not taking a serious view of the position. He spoke just now of "We." Nothing amazed me, who sat through that night-long debate, so much as the word indicative of unity regarding his Party. A little after 5 o'clock in the morning on Friday the Deputy himself was engaged in the rôle of enacting the "fat boy" from Dickens, trying to make our flesh creep with the details of the horrors and the agony of whipping, as described in some book which he read, and, only a little time before, his ostensible leader was reading from another book a passage to show that the Recorder of Liverpool had found, by experience, that instead of whipping being mediæval without chivalry, that it was a punishment which held so little dread for those who were expecting it, that they asked for it in preference to lengthy terms of imprisonment. The leader of the Party told us that the attitude of the expectant convict was pretty much that of a child towards cod liver oil as we see it depicted in newspaper advertisements. The children look at it, and ask for more; and "we," the same Party, ask us to believe that this is such a horrible, barbarous, and nefarious punishment that it is a disgrace to civilisation to attempt to impose it upon men who have as little regard for civilisation as they have for their parole. Deputy Johnson says we have no need for haste. I speak for myself, personally, and as they have advanced their considerations for personal comfort without stating it explicitly, I advance mine. I want a summer holiday, and I do not see why I should be obliged to sit here, day after day, and week after week, listening to Deputy A. proposing that the figure 21 should be changed to 23, and then when that is defeated, another member of his Party, after speaking for the third time for 10 or 15 minutes, proposes that the number should be changed to 19. There ought to be some consideration not merely for the members of the Dáil, but for the discharge of public business. It was a Deputy in the front benches of his own Party who proposed that we should sit to 8 a.m. We all rose to the suggestion. No sooner did he indicate the desire of his Party to sit until 8 a.m. than the majority immediately voted to sit until that hour. Now, he complains that it is an effort to wear them down. There is the legislative programme to be considered. We have been promised a Bill to which I am looking forward with great interest, and I would prefer to go without a holiday than to miss that Bill—the Ministries' Bill. That has been dangled before our eyes for quite a considerable period, and we are living in expectation of it. There is also the Bill to deal with the Constitution of the Judiciary System. Then there is the Army Bill, and several other Bills—

[Professor Magennis.]

Mr. JOHNSON: They have been promised, but not introduced.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: They are not coming before the elections.

Professor MAGENNIS: Deputy Figgis says that they are not coming before the elections. Possibly they may, or may not, but those of us who are working men, attending the Dáil from day to day, and work besides, feel the strain, and are anxious to have a summer recess of some sort. I think I am entitled, in the name of humanity to Deputies, to speak in these terms. Humanitarian considerations have been pressed with regard to men who burn other people's houses in the night, and their children after the houses. We are asked to shed tears for the robber who arms himself in order to terrorise the bank clerk.

Mr. JOHNSON: Who asked that?

Professor MAGENNIS: Are tears not to be shed for other victims?

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Who asked that?

Professor MAGENNIS: Those who called for the withdrawal, or the evisceration for all effective purposes, of Clauses in this Bill in the name of civilisation. They are practically asking for that, although none of them have had the courage to stand up and defend these people altogether. No, but they display an amount of anxiety for nice and gentle treatment of malefactors of that sort.

Mr. JOHNSON: We are backed up by Deputy FitzGibbon at least in that.

Mr. DAVIN: What about the Recorder of Dublin?

Professor MAGENNIS: The Recorder of Dublin is not in order here.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Is it in order for the Deputy to suggest that only for lack of courage we would have done these things?

Professor MAGENNIS: I did not suggest anything of that kind. I did not speak in that fashion. I measure my words. I said that they had not the courage to do it.

Mr. O'BRIEN: Willing to wound yet afraid to strike.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It would be better that we did not discuss the Bill just now.

Professor MAGENNIS: I am sorry if I have trespassed in discussing the Bill. I pointed out what the operations are that those interested in the passing of the Bill have to face. It is absurd—I have already called it offensive—but it is absurd to suggest that those of us who voted for this measure voted with blind acquiescence, that we did what we understood not. Deputy O'Shannon complained that I was silent. Would anything that I could have said have altered his vote or the vote of any member of his party? The fact is that we are all quite alive to the necessity of getting this Bill passed, and the fewer speeches made upon it the better where they are merely damnable reiteration, to quote a famous eighteenth century phrase. For my part I am prepared to remain for four or five consecutive all-night sittings rather than have the Bill blocked by lengthy discussion of immaterial details.

MINISTER for EDUCATION (Professor Eoin MacNeill): I am afraid my friend, Deputy Magennis, has attached too much gravity, and too much seriousness to the situation. I am quite sure Deputy O'Shannon did not intend to be taken seriously when, in the words of Deputy Magennis, he presented himself and those acting with him with a very elaborate bouquet. It is some months ago since I complimented Deputies on the other side in belonging to the legitimate section of the opposition of this assembly, and I see nothing in the recent discussion that would induce me to qualify that compliment. We have been told on this side of the Dáil that we vote in block. The proceedings, especially on the discussion of this Bill, will show where the best examples are to be found of voting in block.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: And where the best discussions are to be found also.

Professor MAGENNIS: The longest speeches, not the best.

Professor MacNEILL: I will come in a moment to discuss that.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Why did you accept some of our amendments?

Professor MacNEILL: I am quite willing to give way to the Deputy if he wishes to make another speech. I do not know whether, in any dictionary of the English language, it will be found that the word "consideration" and the word "deliberation" which have been used in regard to this Bill contain anything, in their definition, to indicate that they consist in making speeches. Certainly for my part I find I can consider best when I am silent, and I often consider better, than otherwise, when other people are silent also.

Mr. O'CONNELL: Why summon the Dáil then?

Professor MacNEILL: The same, I think, applies to "deliberation." I am not going to deny that it is possible to think that all the things that the section on the other side of the Dáil have said are true, and that they have all the virtues, as we are told, and that we have all the vices. It is possible to think of the meaning of the things that they say; but the suggestion before us now is that if we had a day's interval, upon each occasion, so that by this time tomorrow we would have fully appreciated the weight and the merit of the things Deputies have said to us to-day, then we would have proceeded with due deliberation; but that it is impossible to come to a conclusion on the same afternoon on the merits, or, at all events, if we sit continuously for an evening, it is not deliberation, whereas if we break up our discussion into junks of three or four hours it would allow ample time for everything to sink deeply into our minds, and that that is deliberation.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: On a point of explanation I do not think that I or any other Deputy on this side suggested that no decision should be come to until the next day on a point made to-day.

Professor MacNEILL: No, but we are told we are proceeding with undue haste, which means that we are not allowing the arguments presented to us to sink into our minds. Some further things have been suggested. It certainly has been suggested in some of the interruptions, if it has not been suggested in any of the responsible speeches made on the opposite side, that the Ministry, in some way or other, has been introducing deliberate delay into its legislative programme. We have been told, in an interruption, that certain things brought forward in the legislative programme were not intended to be passed before the elections, and in another interruption that they were being dangled.

We have not been told in any responsible speech, nor has any responsible speech been made from any quarter of the Dáil that the members of the Ministry here were wasting time, that they were delaying legislation, that they were deliberately imposing obstacles or delays in the way of their own legislation. If we were told that, I think we, and every person who has a true appreciation of the facts, would receive the suggestion with amusement. Only one other point in regard to what the Deputy said. He made a further suggestion—I will not deal with the things which I hope were not said with any view to provoking acrimony—a suggestion that the only people who think, who deliberate and consider, are those who presented so frequently on the last sitting on this Bill, the number thirteen in the divisions. Those are the only people in the Dáil who think, who deliberate and who consider, and the people who sit on this side of the Dáil are a docile flock who vote en masse, who do exactly what the Ministry desire, and whom I suppose the Ministry never consults on any point. The other suggestion which brings me to where I began—that Deputy Professor Magennis has taken the matter far too seriously—was the suggestion that in making the proposal to have a prolonged sitting, on the previous occasion, or on this occasion, our object is to wear down the opposition. I am one of the oldest men in this assembly. I do not know, looking around, that I could count on the powerful physique on this side of the Dáil wearing down the puny material resources of, shall I say, Deputy O'Connell, or Deputy Davin. I do not know that we could count on our powers of holding out against the miserable resources that are at the command of these gentlemen. I wonder really whether Deputy O'Shannon meant that to be taken seriously, or whether Deputy Professor Magennis was justified in taking that and some of the other remarks he made quite so seriously as he did.

Mr. DAVIN: It is rather refreshing to find that the silence of Deputy Professor

[Mr. Davin.]

Magennis has been broken at last, by giving expression to the opinion that the speeches on this side of the Dáil were damnable reiteration. If they were of such a character as Deputy Magennis describes them, I wonder how he can explain that the records of that particular debate show that 17 amendments had been accepted from this side of the Dáil, and several others had been promised consideration. That is proof, at any rate, that the first statement made by Deputy Professor Magennis is not altogether correct. The President has asked whether or not this is to be considered as a Bill of importance. It certainly is not one of the fourteen Bills that he handed to us in a list some considerable time ago. Many of the Bills which were on that list have been pressed for by various members of this Dáil, as being important and meaning a good deal to many people outside. The President's question is answered by the fact that no speeches have been made from his own side of the Dáil in support of the Bill, or against even any amendments that have been put up. When the first all night sitting was proposed, Deputy Sean Milroy suggested that it was inhuman to make any such proposal.

Mr. MILROY: On a point of correction, I made no such suggestion. I would like the Deputy to quote me correctly.

Mr. DAVIN: The statement he made was that human nature could not stand it. I remember distinctly sitting here for hours during that long night and seeing the effect of the all night sitting on Deputy Sean Milroy, that he anticipated. I think that could be said of others of Deputy Milroy's party, and the proportion who suffered in that way was considerably more than those who suffered on this side of the Dáil.

Mr. WHELEHAN: Due no doubt to the angelic nature of the Deputies on the opposite Benches, whichever region they came from.

Mr. DAVIN: I have not had the pleasure of hearing the interruption. I suppose it is an attempt at a joke, on account of the smiles on the faces of the people who sit around Deputy Whelehan. I think it has not been contended, even by the Minister, who has been the only member of the Government party who has taken any strong line of action in opposing the amendments from this side of the Dáil, that the amendments were ridiculous. They have at any rate, so far as we are concerned, in the most important Bill that has been introduced, been put up in order to make the Bill more acceptable than what we thought it was when presented with the backing of his own party. I am quite certain that the Bill is not being rushed for the purposes of giving an exhibition of flogging, because the Recorder of Dublin has provided for that by a decision he gave in a case on Friday last. Therefore, there can be no suggestion that there is any hurry from that point of view, as the existing law makes provision for dealing with people committing the offences that are mentioned in the particular Clause of the Bill.

After all, Deputies on this side of the Dáil, though they may be few, are entitled to some consideration with regard to the effect of several all-night sittings. They should be taken into consideration by the Committee on procedure, or by whatever other Committee is responsible for the arrangement of these Bills, before a motion, such as is now made by the Minister, is sprung upon them. Some Deputies live a long distance from these premises, and they should be made aware before they come here that they will be expected to sit out the night. This information is only given to the Minister's own colleagues and those who sit behind him. Some provision should be made by which notice would be given of a motion of this kind before we are asked to vote for it in the hurried way in which it is now presented.

Mr. SEAN MILROY: I want to correct a statement made by the last speaker. He said that the motions are known only to the Minister, and those who sit behind him. I happen to sit behind the Minister, as well as stand behind him, and I had no more knowledge of this proposal than the Deputies on the other side. I am not making any grievance of it, but before I proceed further I would like to call the attention of the Dáil to the very generous tribute which the last speaker paid to the Government. He said the Government had accepted 17 amendments from their side, and promised consideration to others. Is that an attempt at ruthless legislation?

Does that not indicate that the Ministerial mind was open to receive any helpful suggestion made?

Mr. DAVIN: On a point of explanation, I made the statement referred to in order to prove the necessity for putting up these amendments. Some of them were not accepted until they had been spoken to three times from this side of the Dáil.

Mr. MILROY: It shows that the Ministerial mind is not so impervious to argument as some of the Deputies have been trying to prove. I think a party that can succeed in getting 17 amendments accepted by a Minister in the short time this Bill has been in Committee must be a party that can congratulate itself on its legislative powers of persuasion. The Deputy made some allusion to the statement I made the last day. The statement I made that day I do not wish to retract. The original motion was, I think, that the Dáil should sit not later than 4.30 o'clock.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Four o'clock.

Mr. MILROY: The motion of Deputy O'Brien, without any suggestion that the Deputies should get overtime, was that the hour be extended until 8 o'clock. I think in this matter we have even a greater grievance than the dockers who have gone on strike to-day. What occurred to me, under those circumstances was, that having secured an extension of four hours in the morning, the suggestion of Deputy Johnson to adjourn prior to the discussion was not one of an extravagant nature. But the Ministry know their legislative time-table, and they know their position with regard to the matters they want to get through, and I bow to their decision. There is no doubt at all about the urgency of this Bill. If those phases of the Bill that have evoked torrents of denunciation from the other side of the Dáil are so heinous, then I want to know why some Deputies on the other side of the Dáil have not risen to move the adjournment or given notice to raise on the adjournment a question calling attention to the decision of the Recorder the other day. That has evoked no horror—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is out of order absolutely.

Mr. MILROY: I do not like to be out of order. Another argument has been put forward by another opponent of this motion. The Deputy who spoke last said he saw evidence of the fatigue of the last night's sitting upon myself. Undoubtedly. It took me a good while to recover from the fatigue of that night, but I do not regret having sat here if it expedited the Bill. I am prepared to indulge in twice as much fatigue to-night if necessary. The Deputy also made an interesting point which I would like to emphasise—that this is an attempt to wear down the other side of the Chamber. He simply endorsed the observations of Deputy Professor MacNeill, the Minister for Education. He said although he saw evidence of weariness on this side of the Dáil there was no evidence of weariness on the other side. Evidently it is impossible to do anything to wear down the Deputies on the other side, and, therefore, they have adduced no argument to show that this proposal is an undue strain upon them, whatever it may be upon the delicate physique of the Deputies who are sitting or standing behind the Government.

Mr. O'CONNELL rose to speak.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I move that the question be now put.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I will hear Deputy O'Connell before I take that motion.

Mr. O'CONNELL: The sum and substance of the objection by Deputy Johnson to this motion was that it was brought forward without due notice to Deputies. When we came here on Thursday we were told that there would be an all-night sitting. That was the first of it that the Deputies on this side heard and from the statement made by Deputy Milroy that was the first other Deputies heard of it also.

Now we went through that all-night sitting and we met here on Friday. On the occasion of the adjournment on Friday there was no word and nothing to indicate that there would be another all-night sitting to-night. Why was it not moved then that there should be an all-night sitting to-night? If that were done, as far as I am concerned, it would remove a considerable portion of my objection. I do not like to be brought here, having arranged for other business, as many of us have to do, after

[Mr. O'Connell.]

8.30 p.m., and then he told on coming here that we will have to sit until 6 o'clock in the morning. If I was told to-day that there would be another all-night sitting to-morrow night my objection would not be so strong as it is to this motion. We heard three Ministers and two or three other Deputies speaking in favour of the motion, but one and all kept clear of that point, the sum and substance of Deputy Johnson's objection.

Mr. McCARTHY: I move that the question be now put.

Mr. STAINES: I second.

Motion put: "That the question be now put."

The Dáil divided: Tá, 38; Níl, 11.

Tá.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Gearoid Ó Suileabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Seán Ó hAodha.
Seamus Breathnach.
Deasamhúhain Mac Gearailt.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Sir Seamus Craig, Ridire, M.D.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Neill.
Liam Mag Aonghusa.

Padraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dóláin.
Próinsias Mag Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faioite.
Seamus de Burca.

Níl.

Tomás de Nóglá.
Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
Darghal Fíges.
Tomás Mac Foin.
Seoirse Ghabhain Uí Dhubhthaigh.
Liam Ó Briain.

Tomás Ó Conaill.
Aodh Ó Cúilacháin.
Liam Ó Daimhín.
Cathal Ó Seanáin.
Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Motion declared carried.

Question put.

The Dáil divided: Tá, 39; Níl, 11.

Tá.

Liam T. Mac Cosgair.
Donchadh Ó Guaire.
Gearoid Ó Suileabháin.
Seán Ó Maolruaidh.
Seán Ó Duinnín.
Micheál Ó hAonghusa.
Seán Ó hAodha.
Seamus Breathnach.
Deasamhúhain Mac Gearailt.
Micheál de Duram.
Seán Mac Garaidh.
Risteárd Ó Maolchatha.
Pilib Mac Cosgair.
Micheál de Stáineas.
Domhnall Mac Cárthaigh.
Earnán Altún.
Sir Seamus Craig, Ridire, M.D.
Liam Thrift.
Eoin Mac Neill.
Liam Mag Aonghusa.

Padraic Ó Máille.
Seosamh Ó Faioleacháin.
Seoirse Mac Niocaill.
Fionán Ó Loingsigh.
Seamus Ó Cruadhlaoidh.
Cristóir Ó Broin.
Caoimhghín Ó hUigín.
Próinsias Bulfin.
Seamus Ó Dóláin.
Próinsias Mag Aonghusa.
Eamon Ó Dúgáin.
Peadar Ó hAodha.
Seamus Ó Murchadha.
Seosamh Mac Giolla Bhrighde.
Liam Mac Sioghaird.
Tomás Ó Domhnaill.
Earnán de Blaghd.
Uinseann de Faioite.
Seamus de Burca.

Nil.

Tomás de Nógla.
 Riobárd Ó Deaghaidh.
 Darghal Fíges.
 Tomás Mac Eoin.
 Seoirse Ghabhain Uí Dhubhthaigh.
 Liam Ó Briain.

Tomás Ó Conaill.
 Aodh Ó Cúlacháin.
 Liam Ó Daimhín.
 Cathal Ó Seanáin.
 Domhnall Ó Ceallacháin.

Motion declared carried.

THE DAIL IN COMMITTEE.

PUBLIC SAFETY (EMERGENCY POWERS) BILL, 1923—THIRD STAGE RESUMED.

Motion made and question put:
 "That Section 6, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 63 is not moved.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

SECTION 9.

"Every person who shall be charged before a District Justice with having in his possession or on his premises with his knowledge or conveying in any manner anything which may reasonably be suspected of being stolen or unlawfully obtained, and shall not give an account to the satisfaction of such District Justice of the manner in which he came by the same shall be guilty of an offence under this Act, and shall be liable to a punishment not exceeding twelve months' imprisonment with or without hard labour."

Amendment by Mr. GAVAN DUFFY:
 "To delete the words 'given an account to the satisfaction of such District Justice of the manner in which he came by the same,' and to insert therefor the words 'adduce satisfactory evidence that he had no intention to defraud.'"

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: The Section, as drawn, appears to me to be somewhat vaguely expressed. I may say that this is one of the few sections of the Bill with which I have sympathy, understanding as I do that it is directed against looters, and I appreciate the propriety in present circumstances of putting upon the looter, to some extent, the onus of proving his innocence instead of following the ordinary method. But the actual wording which has been adopted will leave the law very uncertain, and if it is necessary in normal times that the law should be certain, it is much more necessary when exceptional powers are being taken that those powers should be very clearly defined. The Dáil is asked to agree that every person charged before a Justice with having in his possession or on his premises property which may reasonably be suspected of having been stolen, or unlawfully obtained, should give an account to the satisfaction of the Justice of the manner in which he came by the same. A subsequent amendment proposes that the prosecutor should prove certain essentials first, before the alleged delinquent is called upon to prove anything. I have, however, been obliged to put this amendment in before the next one because it deals with wording which comes earlier in the Section than the words after which I propose to put the other amendment. To say that a District Justice must be satisfied as to how A.B. came by certain property is to say a thing which is very vague and indefinite. One District Justice might interpret "satisfaction" in one way, another in another. The District Justice, be his intentions what they may, is not given any precise direction by the law as to what his duty in the matter may be.

"The satisfaction of the District Justice." The Dáil will see at once that that is a very wide term and capable of varied interpretations. I ask the Dáil and Ministers to agree that it is not reasonable that the matter should be left in language so loose as that. The Dáil will see at once that the wording of the Section as drawn lends itself to a further objection. I do not know if it is intended that the alleged delinquent should have the power to appeal. He certainly should have, because it is desirable that the general law in these matters should be departed from as little as possible, and the stolen property will already have been reconveyed to its owner under Section 7, so that when Section 9, with which we are now dealing comes into operation, the only question will be whether or not the alleged delinquent is the guilty party.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

There can, I think, be no reason why there should not be an appeal from the decision of the District Justice as in other cases. The wording adopted by the mover of the measure seems to me to go a long way to take away that appeal because the appellant is likely to be told that the Appeal Judge cannot inquire as to the "satisfaction" of the District Justice. That is a subjective matter, in the same kind of way as if a matter is left to the discretion of a court, and there can be no appeal from that discretion. I want to put in words which will make the matter of decision objective. I fancy it will be agreed that precisely the same result is obtained by saying that the alleged delinquent must adduce satisfactory evidence that he had no intention to defraud. The question on appeal, as to whether or not the evidence which he adduced proved what he wished it to prove, to entitle him to get off, is an objective question upon which a court would be entitled to pronounce. I think that will be clear to anybody who has compared the two phrases. Therefore, for those two reasons, which I need not go into at any great length, I greatly hope that the amendment will be accepted to the objectionable wording, that the alternative will be accepted—first, because the original wording leaving the matter to the satisfaction of the District Justice is clearly too vague for a punitive law, and secondly, if there be, as I submit there should be, a right of appeal, the test upon the appeal should depend on some such subjective matter as the character of the evidence adduced, rather than upon the District Justice's opinion of the evidence given.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The wording of this Section is taken from the Dublin Police Act, and I submit if the wording is bad, the Deputy's amendment does not improve it; it does not improve it even from the point of view of the argument which he has himself adduced in support of the amendment. It is objected that the present wording leaves the matter subjective—"shall not give an account to the satisfaction of such District Justice"—and that in the Appeal Court they could not inquire into the question of whether the District Justice was satisfied or not. The use, in the amendment, of the words "satisfactory evidence," is open to the same objection. "The evidence is to be satisfactory." Satisfactory to whom? Satisfactory to the District Justice? I am not disposed to accept the amendment. The present wording is contained in an Act which has been in force for a long time, and which has been found perfectly satisfactory. It has passed the test of our own experts in drafting it, and I see no reason to change it. Even on the grounds that Deputy Duffy has himself advanced, the amendment is not an improvement on the Bill.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: There is no use in my arguing a somewhat technical matter of this kind against the majority of the Dáil, and I will confine myself to pointing out that the Minister's answer does not deal with the objection. There is a real distinction between the subjective thing which is the satisfaction of a particular District Justice and the objective thing which is satisfactory evidence.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Evidence satisfactory to whom?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Satisfactory in se. The Appeal Court will judge. Under the Dublin Police Act there is an appeal. I invite the attention of the Attorney-General to the considerable difficulties that have occurred in deciding whether or not there is an appeal in statutes passed subsequently, where the statute itself says nothing about an appeal. That particular matter runs right through the Act in the penal sections. The question as to whether or not it is intended the District Justice's decision should be final is not made clear, and if an appeal is intended I suggest it is very desirable that it should be made quite clear by express wording.

Professor MAGENNIS: Does Deputy Duffy suggest that a District Justice is a peculiar type of magistrate who would be satisfied by something that falls short of satisfactory evidence? The distinction that he has drawn between what is satisfactory to a particular individual and the more objective thing called evidence which would be deemed to be satisfactory to every right-minded and dispassionate man is undoubtedly a valid and well-known distinction. But to apply it here, I suggest it would be necessary to show that the words "to the satisfaction of the District Justice " include, and could be permitted to include, some sort of subjective appeal, something which would influence the mind of the particular District Justice and would, of its nature, be inoperative with regard to any other hearer of the case. Those words " to the satisfaction of " occur in many statutes, and are always deemed to mean precisely what Deputy Duffy says in more explicit language. The magistrate is to be satisfied by evidence, and the evidence which is good for him would be good for any other person presiding over a tribunal. It seems to me that while, from the point of view of a metaphysician, the words of Deputy Gavan Duffy are better, yet through old-established customs and practices, as there is no ambiguity in the phrase which he seeks to amend, possession being nine-tenths of the law, the phrase ought to stand.

Amendment put and declared lost.

MR. GAVAN DUFFY: I beg to move.

To add at the end of the section the following words:—" Provided that, before any person charged under this section shall be required to adduce evidence on his own behalf, it shall be incumbent on the prosecutor to prove (a) that the property, the subject of the charge, is of the value of £10 at the least; (b) that there is reasonable ground for believing that property to have been taken by way of loot or plunder since the 1st day of July, 1922; and (c) that the said property is, or has at some time since the time when it is believed to have been taken, been in the possession or on the premises of the person charged."

This amendment is a further attempt to improve the section, which I say is one with which I have sympathy. Now, there are three distinct things there which I seek to have put upon the prosecutor as matter to be proved before ever he calls upon the defendant to go into the witness-box. First of all, that the property is worth £10 at least. Why? Because we do not want people to be harassed with trivial prosecutions on allegations of loot. We do not want, and I hope the Dáil does not want, to see this exceptional procedure adopted at all except in cases of a certain seriousness. I should myself have been inclined to put a higher figure than £10, but I put £10 in the hope that I might the more easily get some assent to the proposal. I think it must be generally agreed that for trivial items of loot it is not worth while to be putting into force a section of this kind. Secondly, one does not want to infringe upon the very proper and necessary principle that the onus must be on the prosecutor, except in the least possible degree, and even when you are charging an assumed looter there is a risk that the charge may be unsustainable. I want to guard against the possibility that your ordinary thief, who steals because he is starving, may be prosecuted under this section. As the sole justification for the section is the necessity of dealing with loot by special means, I ask that the prosecutor should be compelled to prove that there is, in fact, reasonable ground for believing that the property in question had been looted since the civil war began. Lastly, it is also right that the prosecution should prove affirmatively that the man whom they charged with loot has in fact at some time since the property disappeared been in possession of it or had it on his premises. If those three items are conceded, I speak for myself in saying that I am quite in sympathy with the proposals that the looter properly so-called shall be made to discharge the onus which then properly will lie upon him. If those concessions are not made, then I think the section is objectionable, because it is too liable to be used against persons who are not looters properly so-called, and it does not put upon the prosecutor the onus which I think ought to be undoubtedly his in the first instance.

MR. O'HIGGINS: It is not proposed to accept the amendment. The Deputy says that if the amendment were accepted he would be in complete sympathy with the section. But in fact the amendment conflicts rather radically with the whole tenour and purpose of the section by shifting the onus of proof quite definitely to the prosecutor, whereas the object of the section is, where there is suspicion that a particular piece of property is not properly in the possession of the person, that such person should be asked to state in what manner he came by it, and he should be asked to give a satisfactory account of his possession of that article of property to the District Justice. It is, as I say, only an extension to the country of something that has been for a long time contained in the Dublin Police Acts. The Deputy's amendment demands that there should be a limit to the value—that below a minimum of £10 there should be no action taken under this section. I do not know what the Deputy's standards are, but it seems to me that £9 worth of loot is not exactly a trivial matter even in those days when loot has been carried on in the grand manner, and I see no sufficient reason for accepting a value limit at all, whether £10 or £9 or £8 or £5. It is a time when there has been a good deal of indiscriminate looting. An article worth £2 or £3 taken from a poor man's house is not a trifling matter, and it certainly is not so trifling that the State ought not to take the fullest measures and the strongest steps to trace it, and, if possible, to restore it. Now, the next thing asked in the amendment is that the prosecution should show that there is a reasonable ground for thinking that that property has been taken by loot, plundered since July, 1922. In that portion of the amendment there are two grounds asked—reasonable grounds for satisfying that the property was taken by loot, and a time limit back to the 1st of July last year. We would not accept that portion of the amendment, because reasonable ground for belief falls little short of proof. If the prosecution has to show in Court that there are reasonable grounds for belief, and if it is able to show it, then there is little reason why proceedings should not be taken under the existing code—under the Larceny Acts.

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: My point was reasonable grounds for belief that the property in question was looted, not by the particular person accused, but that in fact it was looted property.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy should visualise the situation in the country that we are attempting to cope with. In certain counties a great many residences were burned. Somehow it became known before they were burned that the burning was about to take place, and they were broken into and indiscriminately looted. This section is meant to cover the case where a man is found to be in possession of property out of all proportion to his means and to his circumstances of life, and it asks that in a case of that kind that it should be possible to demand that he give a reasonable account of how he came by such property. I gave instances here in the Dáil of people whose houses were visited, people in a humble way of life—cottiers—and costly candlesticks, trousers presses, gilt mirrors and articles of that kind were found in the houses. We should have power in a case of extreme suspicion to ask how that property came into the possession of the holder. That is what that section does. I do not feel that the limitations which the Deputy asks for in his amendment are proper or ought to be inserted, least of all the one dated back to July, 1922. If there is to be a time limit it ought not to be July, 1922. In fact, there was probably more loot in the first six months of last year, before we came to the decision to grapple with the situation, than since July, 1922. Whole areas in the country were effectively in the occupation of the Irregulars. They were supreme there. Their will, supported by their guns, was unchallenged, and areas like Tipperary and certain areas in Connaught suffered very severely during that period, and there was a great deal of property stolen. There can be no question of placing the time limit back to the 1st July last year, and I see no sufficient reason for accepting a time limit at all. It would be impossible, if one came across a case of a man in very humble circumstances in possession of a particularly elaborate piece of property—perhaps a piano or, as I say, one of these gilt mirrors—even approximately to place the date at which that was looted or stolen, while there would be, of course, a reasonable suspicion that it had been looted. It is setting too big a task to a prosecution to say that they must advance reasonable grounds for saying that it was stolen since the 1st July last. I am afraid I do not quite catch the drift of (c) in the amendment, because action of this kind would be taken only against a person in whose possession property was actually found. I think I would ask the Deputy to give me some further enlightenment on the effect of (c), and in what way it supplements the section I am moving.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: My impression is, "having in his possession looted property" might refer to any period of time. I may be wrong. If that is so, it should be incumbent on the prosecution, in the first instance, to shift the onus that is on them by proving the fact that the stolen property has been in the possession of the man accused.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: "Every person who shall be charged before a District Justice with having in his possession or on his premises with his knowledge, or conveying in any manner any article suspected of being stolen or unlawfully obtained." I think that is sufficiently clear. The prosecution would be taken only against a person who would be charged either with having in his possession or on his premises an article supposed to have been stolen, or with conveying such article to some other person. I do not think that (c) strengthens or improves the section.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: If the Minister's interpretation of the section is right, I submit that a man can only be charged with conveying if he is conveying at the time of arrest. That is not what it means. If he conveyed a week or a month or two ago, surely the section would hit him, and if that be so, why give a different parsing to the words "having in his possession"?

Amendment put and declared lost.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I propose Amendment 66, which is as follows:—

To add a sub-section as follows:—

"Evidence given by a person charged under this section shall not be capable of being used against him in any other criminal proceedings."

I propose this amendment for the purpose of having it placed on record. It is useless to propose an amendment of this kind for any other purpose in view of the attitude taken by the Minister or by his official advisers.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I am advised that this amendment ought not to be accepted; that there is no reason why a statement made by a person who is asked to account for the possession of property under suspicious circumstances should not be used in subsequent legal proceedings or prosecution that may be taken against him. I am informed that there is not sufficient reason for the insertion of any such provision, and the Attorney-General, who is responsible for criminal prosecutions, advises against acceptance.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: It does seem a little hard that a prisoner who in the ordinary course would not be called on to open his mouth until the case has been proved against him, should now, under this new form of putting the onus of proving his own innocence on him, be obliged or compelled to go into the witness-box to clear himself of a charge before a prima facie case has been made against him, and should be liable, as the result of the cross-examination to which he is submitted, to be prosecuted upon some other charge upon evidence which he has been compelled to give, and which in ordinary circumstances he would not be compelled to give, or even permitted to give, because, according to the law as it stands at present, the prisoner can neither give evidence on his own behalf nor be summoned to give evidence against himself. He is entitled to stay there and to say to the prosecutor, "Prove your case." He cannot be made to go into the box and be submitted to cross-examination except under this new method of putting on him the onus of proving his innocence, and, in endeavouring to prove his innocence of the particular charge against him he lays himself, under cross-examination, open to some other charge upon which he can be indicted on his own evidence. That seems to me to be going very much too far. He is not only compelled to prove his innocence under this Bill, but his very endeavour to do so may result in a prosecution against him on some other charge. I wonder would the Minister, between this and the next stage, reconsider his attitude in regard to this amendment.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I wonder if I might put a hypothetical case to the Deputy. A person is found in possession of a piano. He is asked to account to the District Justice for the manner in which he came by the article, and he gives a certain account. He says, perhaps, that he received that from some relative, and that is accepted, and that particular prosecution is passed. In the course of time the fact becomes clear that the piano was not presented in that way by a relative. Is the suggestion that no subsequent proceedings could be taken in which could be used a false statement, or a statement which, in course of time, is proved to be false, and which was made by a person in whose possession the property is found?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: The statement is that no statements made by a person who is compelled to go into the box can fairly be used against him in any proceedings afterwards.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: That proves my

[Mr. O'Higgins.]

point that a person would be free to make statements in the proceedings provided for by the section which could not be called in question subsequently or used in any way in subsequent proceedings, even though those statements are found to be false.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: With the greatest respect to the Minister, I say he could be indicted for perjury. The man could not again be charged for the same offence even under the law as it stands in this Bill.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: The instance I give is rather in the direction of what I had in mind—namely, that the prisoner is charged with having stolen property in his possession, and he proves to the satisfaction of the Court, and truly proves, that it was given to or purchased by him at some date at some particular place. It is then discovered that he was in that place on that date, and then he can be indicted for some other crime, and the evidence which he has given can be used against him to prove that he was in that place for the purpose of the other crime, and to prevent him from giving evidence of an alibi or something of that sort, and saving themselves the trouble of proving that he was there. It is the use of that kind of evidence in that way that seems to me unjust, because you get the foundation, not of a new crime but the destruction of the defence against the new crime by the evidence given by him to clear himself.

Professor MAGENNIS: What weighs with the Deputies obviously is the tradition of British law, the administration of law. It does seem rather hard that a man should be forced to give evidence where under ordinary circumstances he would have been left at liberty to hold his tongue and force the prosecutors to make the case against him. On the other hand, this is emergency legislation, meant to deal with abnormal cases under abnormal conditions, and the tradition to which the Deputies rightly appeal was a tradition in favour of justice and fair dealing, but it was justice tempered with humanitarianism. The question now is whether we should apply the flavouring of humanity in that particular case, or give the strictest of strict justice to the type of malefactor against whom this Bill is aimed.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Only common justice.

Professor MAGENNIS: Only common justice?

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Yes.

Professor MAGENNIS: Not the strictest of strict justice. I consider natural justice and the strictest of strict justice to be identical.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: They provide a contrast.

Professor MAGENNIS: Perhaps Deputy Gavan Duffy will make his case, and then I shall finish. My difficulty is, the Deputy accuses me of contradicting myself in effect, and without his assistance I cannot see that. I say when in ordinary administration an accused person taking up the position of a witness is not obliged to commit himself, I say when you apply that doctrine, which is a reasonable humane doctrine, to the type of case for which this legislation is meant, you are qualifying it with an element of humanitarianism. Does Deputy Gavan Duffy dispute that? I hold in those special circumstances that that element of qualification should be omitted. I think, however, the two Deputies have in their own minds a case they have not stated. I can conceive two different positions here. "A" volunteers to give evidence. He is a prisoner; the ordinary operation of the law of evidence would not be used against him in a further case. Now we pass to the emergency legislation, and we will assume this is an Act, and that a man is being charged before a Court or District Justice with having in his possession or on his premises, with his knowledge, something reasonably suspect of being stolen or being unlawfully obtained. He is called upon to give a satisfactory account of how he came to be in possession of this. Suppose he is found guilty, that is one case. Suppose he proves his innocence, that is another case. Supposing, in proving his innocence of having stolen something, he allows something to transpire which is capable of being employed against him as evidence later. Deputy FitzGibbon considers that that is objectionable. Suppose, however, the evidence he brought forward did not clear him of the charge under Section 9, and that notwithstanding the evidence he gives he is found guilty of being in possession of loot. Now, I would like the Deputy to address himself to this question. Is the evidence not fairly to be used against him on a further charge of further guilt? Why are we to have such soft hearts for criminals in this particular conjuncture? I have some sympathy with a man who, when he is charged with the offence of being in the possession of loot, not only having loot in his house, clears himself of that charge and escapes imprisonment for twelve months, with or without hard labour, by evidence he adduces in his own favour.

If that evidence would have the effect of involving him in further punishment, having escaped by virtue of the present punishment, I could have some sympathy with him. But suppose, as I have already put it, that, notwithstanding the evidence he has adduced, and, I assume it to be true, he is found guilty of this charge, I see no reason why, because he is found guilty of this charge, he should not be found guilty of other charges. In other words, I think if a man is found to be possessed of loot, and renders himself liable under this emergency legislation to this punishment, he ipso facto divests himself of any sympathy or to any application in that special sense of mercy that I have used on the part of the District Justice.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I did not intend to say anything in favour of my own amendment, because I feel it is utterly useless to argue any of these matters in this Bill. Surely it is plain to anybody who considers the matter that it is not fair or ordinary justice to compel a man to go into the witness-box, on pain of being sent to prison, because he is suspected of having a piano or a chicken, and when you have got him there to prove himself completely innocent of the charge, counsel for the prosecution cross-examines him, and in the course of cross-examination discovers he is guilty of aiding or abetting, assisting, or in any way encouraging the commission of one of the numerous offences set out in this Schedule, then you prosecute him with a view to flogging him or with a view to sending him to prison under Schedule 1, or under any one of the other sections of the Bill. You put him in the position that he himself must go into the witness-box and expose himself to your cross-examination, and having extracted from him proof of his own innocence upon a charge, you will be entitled, according to this law, if it becomes a law, to say, "Now that we have it out of your own mouth that you did something else, we will rely upon your ipsissima verba to prove you guilty of the charge." What is his answer? He has got none. If the Minister thinks that fair, then he should have the same clause in every one of the previous sections dealing with arson, or else say, in connection with every offence, that each person shall be presumed to be guilty until he proves himself innocent. If that is the law, let it be stated openly. I cannot see any reason why you should not have an identical provision, or sub-section, in every clause of the Bill imposing a penalty. If it be right to make a man go into the witness-box where he will be subject to cross-examination just because he is suspected of having looted property, and then to use what he says in the witness-box, where he is under compulsion, against him on any conceivable charge, just because it is called loot, then it is equally right to make him go into the witness-box first before you prove anything at all against him on any other charge whatsoever. If I am wrong, I should be very much interested to know where the subtle distinction lies between what is right in one case and not in the other.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy who has just sat down seems to have a natural sympathy with artful dodgers. He also seems to have the idea that people charged with certain offences set out in the Schedule to this Bill ought to be given the greatest possible latitude for evading the law, and that if in the course of proving ownership of a particular article of furniture the person reveals the fact that he is guilty of any or all of these offences, there should be no prosecution upon such evidence. We cannot accept that. The Deputy said Deputy Magennis was contradicting himself. There seems to be an epidemic of this sort. The Deputy's amendment is to the effect that no statements made by a person under this section shall be used against him in any subsequent criminal prosecution, but in the next breath he says he may be prosecuted for perjury. There seems to be some conflict there.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Yes; in your section.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: No, in your amendment. If the amendment is accepted it would not be open to prosecute for perjury in respect of persons under the section.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Then I take it we are to accept this rather startling proposition—I merely asked that it be noted for record—that the Ministerial view is that any man charged upon suspicion is a man who ought to be presumed guilty until he proves his innocence. Any man charged on suspicion under this section will be presumed to be guilty until he proves his innocence; ergo any man charged upon suspicion of an offence, under another section, should likewise be presumed to be guilty until he proves his innocence. I challenge the Minister to put that plainly into the Bill at its next stage.

Professor MAGENNIS: I am sure Deputy Gavan Duffy would glory in the result if the Ministry were to write themselves down as hopeless imbeciles. That is the usual trick of the nisi prius performer. Why is the doctrine of Section 9 to be made law universally? This section deals with the commission of one particular form of crime which has become very prevalent in the country of late. One man loots a house and takes possession of the loot before another man burns it. "A B" is charged with being in possession of property reasonably suspected of being looted, we know very well what these words connote. We know very well what the people living in the district mean by an expression of this sort: "That is my piano, that is my mirror, or that is my armchair, and I recognise it." How are you, in the special circumstances which prevail in the district where looting was prevalent recently, and arson following on the looting which preceded it—how are you to prove by witnesses who will not come forward, as they used to in the ordinary course, these things in view of the fact that we have recently the evidence of Captain McGarry that he could establish certain things only that the witnesses dare not, for fear of their lives, come into Court to give evidence? When these are the regnant circumstances of the times, how are the ends of justice to be met? Let a man who has property deemed to be loot in his possession show either of two things—that it is not in his possession as loot, or that it came into his possession in some way that left him innocent, in view of this emergency legislation.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I rise to a point of order. We have already dealt in two previous amendments with the matter to which the Deputy is now addressing himself. I submit, with all respect, that the matter that was before the Dáil, and is still before it, is whether or not a prosecutor is entitled to use, on a subsequent trial, evidence given by a prisoner in a previous trial under this sub-section, and not the question whether the machinery provided by the section is correct.

Professor MAGENNIS: The point under discussion is Deputy Gavan Duffy's amendment, and the egregious thing which he alleges, by way of argument, in support of it. I submit that that is the subject which is under discussion—Deputy Gavan Duffy's proposed amendment in the interests of humanity, justice, fair play, and all the fine things for which there would be applause outside. I am entitled to show that the purpose of this Bill, and particularly of this section, would be defeated by an amendment of this type if it were made operative. When the onus is put upon the man charged to show that he does not come under this section, in his effort to clear himself he may make it obvious that he is guilty of some other offence. According to Deputy Gavan Duffy, the law is to be applied to him as it used to be in the case of a dog. The dog was allowed one bite, and somehow this man is to be allowed one offence. The State would never have found out that he was a guilty man only that he happened to find it necessary, in his own behalf, to inform them of the fact, and because in his own interest, in his own defence, he informs the State of the fact that he is guilty of such and such an offence, the State is now asked to say to him, "Because you have so informed us, you may go free." We hear a lot about childishness and puerilities, but surely that argument is to expect us to declare, in favour of this Bill, that it is something of emergency legislation called for by a particularly objectionable state of affairs regnant in the country, and then to turn around and make it ordinary procedure of ordinary normal, quiet, law-abiding times.

Mr. MILROY: Deputy Gavan Duffy's attitude may be explained by the fact that he does not wish to see "a rift in the lute."

Amendment put and negatived.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 9 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 10.

Amendment 67 not moved.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 10 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 11.

(1) If and whenever an Executive Minister shall satisfy a District Justice that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that any sum of money standing to the credit of any person in the books of any bank or similar institution is, or represents, or is directly or indirectly derived from

(a) any stolen property or funds, or

(b) any public funds or funds which ought to be in the custody or under the control of a Minister or a Government Department, the District Justice shall, notwithstanding that no notice of such application has been given to the person in whose name such sum of money is standing in the books aforesaid or to any other person, order that such sum of money shall be transferred to the Minister for Finance.

(2) An order of a District Justice under this section shall operate to vest in the Minister for Finance as from the time of the service of a copy of the order on the bank or institution in whose books the sum of money aforesaid is standing, all money which at the time of such service is standing in such books to the credit of the person aforesaid.

(3) Whenever any sum of money becomes vested in the Minister for Finance by virtue of an order under this section, the Minister for Finance shall give public notice by advertisement or otherwise of such vesting, and unless within a time to be limited by such notice (not being less than one month) or such extended time as the Minister for Finance shall allow, some person proves to the satisfaction of the Minister for Finance that such sum of money belongs to him, and is not and does not represent and is not directly or indirectly derived from

(a) any stolen property or funds, or

(b) any public funds or funds which ought to be in the custody or under the control of a Minister or a Government Department, such sum of money shall be forfeited to the Minister for Finance.

(4) All money forfeited to the Minister for Finance under this section shall, after payment thereof of the costs and expenses incurred in the recovery thereof, be applied by the Minister for Finance in recouping the person from whom such money was directly or indirectly stolen or the fund to which such money directly or indirectly belongs.

Mr. DUGGAN: I beg to move the following amendment:—To delete the section, and to substitute therefor the following section:—

(1) If and whenever an Executive Minister shall satisfy a District Justice that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that any sum of money standing to the credit of any person in the books of any bank or similar institution is, or represents, or is directly or indirectly derived from

(a) any stolen property or funds; or

(b) any public funds or funds which ought to be in the custody or under the control of a Minister or a Government Department, the District Justice shall by order prohibit any transfer of or other dealing with such sum of money or any part thereof.

(2) Whenever an order is made by a District Justice under this section prohibiting the dealing with any sum of money, the Minister for Finance shall give public notice by advertisement or otherwise of such prohibition, and unless within a time to be limited by such notice (not being less than one month) or such extended time as the Minister for Finance shall allow, some person proves to the satisfaction of the Minister for Finance that such sum of money belongs to him and is not and does not represent and is not directly or indirectly derived from

(a) any stolen property or funds; or

(b) any public funds or funds which ought to be in the custody or under the control of a Minister or a Government Department, the Minister for Finance shall certify in writing that such sum of money is forfeited to the Minister for Finance.

(3) If within such time or extended time as is mentioned in the foregoing sub-section any person proves to the satisfaction of the Minister for Finance the matters mentioned in the foregoing sub-section, the Minister for Finance shall certify in writing that the order made by the District Justice under this section in respect of such sum of money may be discharged, and upon production of such certificate to a District Justice such District Justice shall discharge such order.

[Mr. Duggan.]

(4) A certificate given by the Minister for Finance under this section certifying the forfeiture of any sum of money shall operate to vest in the Minister for Finance, as from the time of the production of such certificate to the bank or institution in whose books the sum of money aforesaid is standing, the whole of such sum of money.

(5) All money forfeited to the Minister for Finance under this section shall, after payment thereof of the costs and expenses incurred in the recovery thereof, be applied by the Minister for Finance in recouping the person from whom such money was directly or indirectly stolen or the fund to which such money directly or indirectly belongs.

The effect of the amendment is that money can only be forfeited on the certificate of the Minister for Finance. In the clause it is provided that, on the certificate or order of the District Justice, the money shall be transferred to the Minister for Finance. The effect of the amendment is that the order of the District Justice will only have the effect of holding up the money, so that it could not be finally forfeited without the certificate of the Minister for Finance.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I have put down some amendments to the Clause as it originally stood, and they will substantially fit in with the newly-drafted Clause. The object of them is to get the District Justice out of the matter altogether, and for this reason. The great charge always brought forward against Judges of all ranks, and particularly against those of the lower ranks in the Judicial hierarchy, in the past was that they were the tools, and very often the willing tools, of the Executive of the day. You have set up a system of District Justices which I have heard from various parts of the country is working very well, because it has the confidence of the people. I fear that if this section were passed in the form in which it is drawn you would bring upon these very Justices, who are now doing well, the very charge that used to be brought against their predecessors, that in certain cases they are nothing but the tools of the Executive. I am quite certain that when the framers of this Bill put in the beginning of this section that it should be the duty of the Executive Minister to satisfy the District Justice that there was reasonable ground for suspecting that money standing to the credit of any person in a bank represented directly or indirectly money derived from stolen property, their object was to interpose, between the Executive and the subject, the action of a "Judicial Officer." That, I think, was a very high-minded and proper attitude for them to take up, but I am asking them to delete the "Judicial Officer," because on reflection I think they will see themselves that he performs no Judicial office at all; he merely registers the will of a particular Executive Minister, and for this reason he has no right to hear the other side. He has no right to cross-examine the Executive Minister who makes the case before him, and therefore he will, in fact, merely register the will of the Executive Minister. The Executive Minister will come before him with a statutory declaration, affidavit or report, or whatever the proper procedure may be, and the District Justice will read it, and it will be his duty then to make the order asked for by the Minister. There is no appeal to the District Justice. If that order is accurate, if anyone wants to challenge it, it is to the Minister they must go. They do not come back to the "Judicial Officer." The Minister merely appears before him and goes through what, in the ordinary Police Courts, would be the swearing of an information, and the order is made accordingly and is issued at once. If District Justices are compelled to do that they will be held up through the country as merely the tools of the Executive, and I ask the Minister not to put that upon them. The amendment that I put forward does not embarrass the Minister at all; it merely enables the Executive Minister to make an order himself without going through the form of applying to the District Justices. It is the merest form in the circumstances, and therefore the amendment that I move is to leave out the words "satisfy a District Justice," and simply say that if and whenever an Executive Minister shall be satisfied that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that the money is stolen money, he may make an order himself, and then, when he has made the order, there shall be the usual advertisements as to appeal, and the appeal shall come before the Minister for Finance as the section as it stands provides.

All that I want to do is to try and get your new Judges out of the unfortunate position of being merely the registering officers of the will of the Executive Minister. I do not want to interfere in any way with the powers of the Executive to confiscate stolen money any way they please, but I do beseech them to keep the judicial administration out of what is really Executive action. If the Judge really had any duty to perform I would welcome it, but it is because he must act ex parte—upon the statement of one side only—that I think the Minister who calls upon him to make the order ought to be empowered to make the order himself without going through the form of getting the District Justices to countersign it. When I saw the newly-drafted section I handed in amendments, applying my amendments, 69 and 70, to the section as newly drafted.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Deputy FitzGibbon's suggestions with regard to this section have been very carefully considered, and I am advised that it would be undesirable to delete the reference to the District Justice in the first portion of Deputy Duggan's amendment. There is a judicial function involved; there is a discretion which ought to rest with someone other than the Executive Minister of granting or withholding an injunction. The reference further down to the District Justice we will be prepared to reconsider, and we would be prepared to agree with the Deputy and to meet him on the point that the Executive act of forfeiture ought to be the act of the Minister. But I submit that in the first section the procedure involved is very much the same as the granting of an injunction by a Court on prima facie evidence.

"(1) If and whenever an Executive Minister shall satisfy a District Justice that there is reasonable ground for suspecting that any sum of money standing to the credit of any person in the books of any bank or similar institution is, or represents, or is directly or indirectly derived from

(a) any stolen property or funds; or

(b) any public funds or funds which ought to be in the custody or under the control of a Minister or a Government Department, the District Justice shall by order prohibit any transfer of or other dealing with such sum of money or any part thereof."

The Deputy, I think, indicates the view that is very much the same as the granting of an injunction on an ex parte representation. My advisers are of opinion that there is a proper function there in the first portion of the amendment for a District Justice to discharge. We are prepared to reconsider that portion of the amendment which places the actual forfeiture on the District Justice rather than on the Minister.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: The forfeiture is not in the District Justice in the new section. In the old section it was. In the new section it is in the Minister for Finance. My reason for saying that this differs from the granting of an injunction on prima facie evidence is this: An application is made to a Judge on prima facie evidence for an injunction, which he grants ex parte to the next day or until notice can be served upon the other side to come in and discharge it. But he discharges it. It is merely granted to preserve property for the moment, until the other side can be brought in, when he hears and discharges his own order. An ex parte injunction is in all urgent cases invariably granted, without any hesitation, because it is only granted until the following day, or perhaps for 48 hours, until the other side has time to be brought in. Once the District Justice has made the order he is functus officio. No one ever comes near him again. His order lasts till the end of time, not until an opportunity has been given to the other side to be heard, and he must make the order upon the declaration by the Minister, because he is bound to accept the declaration of the Minister. No District Justice who had a statutory declaration before him by a Minister that he had reasonable grounds for believing such property was stolen could for a moment refuse such an order. It is for that reason I suggest that he is not in the same position as the Judge who grants an ex parte injunction, which he may discharge [Mr. FitzGibbon.] himself the next day. He is in substance the mere formal tool of the Minister who applied to him to make the order.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I think the Deputy is, perhaps, overstating the case when he says if an official of the Ministry of Finance were to make representations to the District Justice to the effect that there was reasonable ground for suspecting that a particular sum of money represented stolen property, that the District Justice would have no alternative but to grant the order. The amended section reads:—

"If and whenever an Executive Minister"—which, in fact, means an official of his Department—"shall satisfy a District Justice that there is reasonable grounds for suspecting," etc.

I have too high an opinion of the District Justices to believe that if they were not satisfied that there was a reasonable suspicion that they would still grant the order that was sought by the Ministry.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: I do not think they would. I have the same opinion of them.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: There is therefore something to show to the District Justice.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: If I might interrupt, I would say that I have too high an opinion of Executive Ministers to think that they would send forward a case to the District Justice without good grounds.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Nicely said, sir. The Deputy's contention is that there is no judicial function in fact—that if such a representation is made, the District Justice is the merest automaton. I think it right to have a check, and that a person in a judicial office must at least be satisfied that there is reasonable ground for suspicion in regard to those funds before an injunction is granted closing down on them or transferring them temporarily to the Minister for Finance. It may be said that it is not a very substantial check, and that the tendency would be for the District Justices to accept, with the minimum of critical examination, the grounds put forward by the Finance Ministry or any other Ministry. But it is a judicial function. To completely eliminate the District Justice and state that a Minister or Ministry could close down on any property or any funds on suspicion would be rather an extreme course to take. There should at least be an examination of prima facie evidence by some judicial person and some person who can approach the matter with a detached view. The District Justice is the best person we could find for that purpose. If I might add, the word "shall" in Sub-section (1), Section 11, while it seems mandatory, is of course qualified by "if and whenever an Executive Minister shall satisfy a District Justice."

Amendment put and agreed to.

Motion made and question put: "That the new section stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Mr. FITZGIBBON: Amendments 69 and 70 were to the section which has been deleted, and they, of course, fall.

Amendments 69, 70 and 71 not moved.

SECTION 12.

Amendments 72 and 73 not moved.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 12 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 13.

Amendment 74 not moved.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 13 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 14.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 14 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 15.

Amendment 75 not moved.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 15 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 16.

Amendments 76, 77 and 78 not moved.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 16 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECTION 17.

(1) This Act may be cited as the Public Safety (Emergency Powers) Act, 1923.

(2) This Act shall continue in force for six months after the passing thereof, and shall then expire.

• Amendment 79 not moved.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I move Amendment 80, which is designed to ensure that this Bill shall be submitted to a referendum before it becomes operative. The amendment reads:—

In Sub-section (2) to insert after the word "Act," line 26, the words "shall be submitted by referendum to the decision of the people and shall require the assent of a majority of the votes recorded on such referendum before it shall become operative; it."

The motive for the amendment is this. In this Bill the Executive Council is proposing drastically to amend the Constitution not in favour of liberty, but against it. I hold that no Executive Council, however powerful in this Dáil, has any moral right to uproot the Constitution passed last November unless they are certain and can prove beyond yea or nay that in so doing they have the assent of the Irish people. It may be that a majority of the electors would vote in favour of this Bill. I emphatically believe that a majority would vote very decisively against it. But if the Ministry believe, as they profess to believe, and as they claim, that they are carrying out the will of the people, of which we have heard so much, they must be the very first to welcome an amendment which will give them a magnificent opportunity of showing that the people are solid behind them. I apprehend that the people who supported the Ministry throughout the more difficult times will be found, when they are consulted, to declare that they emphatically dissent from this Bill as being the wrong remedy for the present state of affairs, and as being designed not to bring about peace, but to bring about further turmoil. If I am wrong the Ministry can prove it very easily by accepting the amendment.

Let the Dáil consider how, in fact, it is proposed radically to alter the Constitution passed here. Can it be said radical alterations should be passed without the assent of the people? No one can suggest that this Dáil was elected to amend a Constitution which did not exist when the Dáil was elected. It is proposed to do away with habeas corpus in the case of these prisoners. It is proposed to do away with the Article in the Constitution which declares that judicial power shall be exercised and justice administered in the public Courts, and to substitute the back chamber of a Minister, in which he receives reports from his agents, for the public Courts of this country. It is proposed to overrule the emphatic Article of the Constitution which declares that extraordinary Courts shall not be established. It is proposed to do away with that first principle of criminal law whereby the onus is always laid upon the prosecution in the first instance. It may be that the people of Ireland are so disgusted with the proceedings of the last twelve months that they will tell the Ministry that they are right. It may be, but they are entitled to be consulted and to be asked their opinion before you commit them to so drastic an amendment of the Constitution and so emphatic an annulment of many parts of the Constitution as this Bill provides. None of us was elected to this Dáil to pass the present measure; none of us was elected radically to change the Constitution. Ministers are quite entitled to say that the only way in which they can find it possible to deal with the present situation is to pass such a Bill as this. They are entitled to say that if that is their conviction, but they are aware that there are other ways in which the matter might be approached. They are aware that the people are not unanimously behind them on this measure, and I put it to them that it is their duty to make certain whether or not the people approve of the measure before forcing it into law with a majority not elected for any such purpose. It is one special way of dealing with the present difficulties—some of us think an exceedingly bad way. Why should it be forced upon the country before the country has an opportunity of saying whether it is or not a method which it desires to see adopted? I may be told that there is urgency; let us consider that. Is there urgency? The Courts of this country have so far humiliated the law and the respect in which law should be held as to intimate that there will be a state of war in the technical sense in this country so long as the arms are not surrendered. That, I think, is a fair paraphrase of the judgments that have been given. Very well. If that be the case a month or two months hence I presume it is probable that the Courts will still be refusing habeas corpus, and if a referendum took a month or six weeks the Ministry would not be greatly damnified by the delay. They would be in exactly the same legal position at the end of that time as they are now. I do not think that urgency can be pleaded. So long as Courts are going to justify the Executive in their present action on the ground of a state of war, urgency is not an answer to a demand for a referendum before you change the Constitution radically in those things which most closely affect the liberty of the subject. I suppose I shall be told, as I was told by a Deputy just now, that an amendment of this kind is electioneering. No doubt. If the Ministry are right in assuring us from every platform up and down the country that they, and they alone, represent the will of the people, the very best electioneering for them is to prove it by getting a magnificent majority on a referendum in favour of this Bill. They know, and every Deputy knows, the horror which this Bill has excited. Everybody knows it.

[Mr. Gavan Duffy.]

Mr. HENNESSY: I do not know it.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Except the Deputy on my right.

Mr. McGARRY: I have not heard about it either.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Those who do not know it will discover it at the forthcoming General Election. People are perfectly entitled to their views, however insane, on the best way of dealing with the present situation. But if your views require that you should uproot the Constitution passed by yourselves a few months ago in the middle of a civil war—passed at a time when everything that has happened could have been foreseen—if your views require such amendments as that to the Constitution, I submit that it is the clear duty of the Ministry and of the Ministerial majority to see to it that before such amendments are placed upon the Statute Book to disgrace our Constitution, that the people should have the right to say yea or nay to the question: Is this the way in which you wish this problem to be dealt with?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: The Deputy is always on the side of the angels; always a defender of high constitutional principles.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: That is more than I can say for the Minister.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Champion of liberty of the individual. No doubt he feels the blood of the signers of the Bill of Rights boiling in his veins. We have a certain responsibility to the people, and we have put a clear, plain interpretation on that for the last year. In a couple of months' time we will go to the people and ask whether we have discharged our trust in the manner in which they wished us to discharge it, and the people will decide. We are not greatly troubled about that prospect. We have not begun to lose any sleep about it. If the people decide to give a mandate to others than those who have held it for the last ten or twelve months, it will be simply one more proof of their sovereignty which has been vindicated—which was challenged, and which has been vindicated. Now, as to the Bill. I am not aware that there is any clamour or anxiety in the country for the release of 12,000 or 13,000 men in view of the fact that arms and explosives are secreted throughout the country. I think the people understand that to hold any of the prisoners it is necessary to get powers to hold all, and to use judgment and discretion and caution in the matter of any releases. Neither have I found throughout the country that there is any protest against the proposal to use against the crimes of arson and robbery with violence the most effective means, to use a familiar phrase. The people have a right not to be robbed; they have a right not to have their houses burned; and they have a right to demand that their Executive Government will take all possible steps to stamp out these two crimes, which menace all society, all stability and all prosperity. I have found through the country—and I have been through the country more than the Deputy—no feeling against this Bill, and no feeling against that particular Section of the Bill which Deputies here profess to make most cry about. If imprisonment is, as we believe, inadequate to check robbery with violence and arson, then the people demand that we will use whatever methods will check those crimes. Robbery under arms and arson, these may be said to be the main features of the Bill. There is another feature, the methods by which it is proposed to meet agrarian anarchy. Now, I have found a very thorough appreciation through the country of the fact that agrarian anarchy cannot be met by prosecutions before a summary court for trespass; cannot be met by the law which was intended to meet mere cases of accidental or casual trespass. People realise that this particular form of anarchy requires very drastic treatment to check it and that you have to treat the cause. The cause is, and has been, greed, and you will only meet and beat that particular offence by setting off against the greed, against the desire for illicit gain, the rather certain prospect of loss if that line is adopted, that is the line of driving one's cattle into a neighbour's land and removing your neighbour's landmark. These are the main features of the Bill: the intention to hold those of the prisoners whom it is thought unsafe in the public interest to release; the intention to apply very special and very stringent penalties to robbery with arms and violence, and arson; and the intention to meet agrarian anarchy; the confiscation of one's neighbour's land, by confiscation of the trespassing stock that are driven in, in direct challenge to all that law, and to all those principles upon which civilised society rests.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE resumed the Chair at this stage.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: We make no apologies to the Deputy for this Bill or to any Deputy and we made no apologies through the country. On the contrary we would feel that we should be apologetic through the country, to the people, if we had shirked or shrunk from taking all the steps which in our minds and in our own consciences we believe to be necessary to deal with the situation with which we have been confronted, and with which we are still confronted. There is no intention of accepting the Deputy's amendment, to submit this Bill to a Referendum. In a few months' time the people will decide on this and on other matters that have occurred within the last 12 months, and we are not afraid of that decision, and we are not worried about it. We will simply go honestly and in a responsible spirit before the people and state what the situation was and ask them to decide. As I say, if they decide against us and give a mandate to others than those who have been conducting their political affairs for the last 12 months, it will simply be another proof of their sovereignty and we will not go out with arms or with petrol cans or land mines to challenge the people's will.

Amendment put and declared lost.

Amendment 81 not moved.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 17 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SCHEDULE.

PART I.

1. An armed revolt against the Government of Saorstát Éireann.

2. Threatening, coercing, assaulting or attempting to threaten, coerce or assault any person in furtherance of any such revolt.

3. Destroying, damaging or removing or attempting to destroy, damage or remove any property in furtherance of any such revolt.

PART II.

1. Having possession without lawful authority of

(a) any lethal firearm or other weapon of any description from which any shot, bullet or other missile can be discharged; or

(b) any ammunition for any such firearm or weapon; or

(c) any grenade, bomb or other similar missile, whether capable of being used with any such firearm or weapon or not; or

(d) any land mine or other similar explosive machine; or

(e) any dynamite, gelignite or other explosive substance; or

(f) any component part or ingredient of any such article or substance aforesaid.

2. Having possession without lawful authority of any article of clothing, equipment or accoutrement or any arms or ammunition belonging or issued to any member of the military or police forces of Saorstát Éireann.

3. Putting on or assuming without authority the uniform or any part of the uniform of any branch of the military or police forces of Saorstát Éireann.

4. Assuming the name, designation or description of any rank, or of any member, of the military or police forces of Saorstát Éireann for the purpose of doing or procuring to be done any act which the person assuming such name, designation or description would not by law be entitled to do or procure to be done of his own authority.

5. Wrongful entry on and retention of possession of land without colour or pretence of title or authority.

6. Robbery under arms; that is to say, robbing or attempting to rob while armed with any offensive weapon or instrument.

7. Arson; that is to say, unlawfully setting fire or attempting to set fire to any house or other building whatsoever, whether public or private.

8. Unlawfully injuring or destroying or attempting to injure or destroy any property whatsoever, including standing trees and crops

9. Interfering with or preventing, without lawful authority, the lawful occupation, use or enjoyment of any land or premises.

10. Illicit distillation, or having possession or control of any illicitly distilled spirits or any illicit still or any articles or materials for illicit distillation.

11. Selling or offering, exposing, or having for sale any illicitly distilled spirits.

12. Aiding, abetting, assisting in, or encouraging the commission of any of the offences mentioned in this Schedule, or helping in the concealment or escape of any person guilty of any such offence.

Amendment 82 not moved.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move:—

In paragraph 7, to delete the words "or other building whatsoever, whether public or private," and to insert in lieu thereof the words:

"factory, barn, haggard, workshop, or other building, or any agricultural property, food supplies for man or beast, or any other property of any nature or kind, movable or immovable, public or private, including standing trees and crops."

The object of the amendment is to provide a more extended definition of "arson." It is felt that it was not sufficiently clear in the Bill. I submit it is fitting that the Bill should apply to the burning or destruction of all the things mentioned.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Mr. DUGGAN: I move Amendment 84.

In paragraph 8, to delete the words "property whatsoever," and to insert in lieu thereof the words:

"house, factory, barn, haggard, workshop, or other building, or any agricultural property, food supplies for man or beast, or any other property of any nature or kind, movable or immovable, public or private."

This amendment is in identical terms and refers to unlawfully injuring or attempting to injure or destroy any property.

Amendment put, and agreed to.

Amendment 85 not moved.

Amendment 86 not moved.

Motion: "That the Schedule, as amended, be the Schedule of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

THE PREAMBLE.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendment 87 is out of order, as it has no relevancy to the Bill

The Preamble and Title of the Bill put, and agreed to.

DAIL RESUMES

Bill, with amendments, Reported.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: When is the next Stage to be taken?

Mr. O'HIGGINS: I would be anxious to take the Report Stage on Friday, and to that end I have made arrangements that amendments embodying the undertakings which I gave in the course of the passage of the Bill through Committee, would be handed in to-day. It is really a matter of the printing; if the Bill, as amended, could be printed in time for the Report Stage on Friday I would be glad.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Bill, as amended in Committee, will be in the hands of Deputies to-morrow evening about 4 o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order, will it be in order to receive this Bill for Friday?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It would be impossible to get the amendments in time, if four days' notice of amendments were given, naturally.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: I desire to say that in a Bill of this kind proper time should be given for amendments. There is no reason why the Bill should not be taken on Monday, which would give time. To take it on Friday would seem to be rushing the thing quite unnecessarily. The Bill is a very serious one, and Deputies should have the Bill in their hands, as passed in Committee, before being invited to put in amendments for the Report Stage.

Mr. BLYTHE: Is it a fact that the Standing Orders require four days' notice for amendments? The copy which I have dealing with amendments to motions, seems to contemplate that they shall be in, not later than 11 a.m. on the second preceding day. That is Standing Order 12. It does not seem to apply to Bills, but I cannot find any other Standing Order dealing with the matter.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Amendments will have to reach us before 11 a.m. on Wednesday to be strictly in order. If they were accepted later they would not be in the hands of Deputies until Friday.

Mr. GAVAN DUFFY: Perhaps it would be fairer to the minority in the Dáil if the Bill were not taken until Monday.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Well, Sir, I have stated the position. The Bill is an urgent one, and the question of its consideration next week in the Seanad depends largely on its being taken on Friday, if at all possible, and I think that Deputies should realise that a Bill having been in their hands for 10 days or a fortnight, and having been very thoroughly considered in Committee, it is not unreasonable to ask that the interval as between Monday and Friday should be sufficient between the Committee and the Report Stage.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order, I would draw attention to the Order, which says that notice of motion must be handed in on the fourth preceding day. Monday would be the fourth preceding day, so that it is impossible to have the motion in time to take the next stage on Friday.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Standing Order bearing upon the particular matter is 74, of the book in the Deputies hand, "When a Bill has been returned from a Special Committee, or from the Dáil sitting in Committee, notice shall be given of a motion to receive the Bill for final consideration." That is the notice which the Minister is giving now. The notice requires strictly the usual notice which is given on motions and, strictly, therefore, it is late. Is there objection to taking the notice.

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes.

Mr. O'HIGGINS: Very good. I must move that we take it on Monday next.

Report Stage ordered for next Monday.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

ESTIMATES FOR PUBLIC SERVICES.

MINISTRY OF INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move:

"That a sum not exceeding £193,445, be granted to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1924, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, including Umpire and Courts of Referees; for Contributions to the Unemployment Fund and to Special Schemes; for Payments to Associations under the Unemployment Insurance Acts; for advances to Workpeople under the Labour Exchanges Acts, 1919; for Fees and Expenses of Medical Referees under the Workmen's Compensation Acts, 1906; for Fees to Certifying Surgeons under the Factory and Workshops Act, 1901; for Fees and Expenses under the Trade Board Act, 1909 and 1918; for Fees and Expenses under the Electricity (Supply) Act, 1919, and the Gas Regulation Act, 1920; and for Contributions towards the expenses of an Irish Stall at the Daily Mirror Fashion Fair." (£102,000 had been voted on account.)

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move that the consideration of this Vote be deferred so as to allow of details of Sub-head (a) to be presented to the Dáil. It is now, I suppose, some three months since the Estimate was drawn up, and no details have been presented regarding the Sub-head (a), giving particulars of "Salaries, Wages and Allowances, £180,000," and I think it is due to the Committee that such particulars should be given. There may have been difficulties some months ago in drawing up these statements, but, in the meantime, no doubt, men have been detailed to draw up such particulars, and I think they ought to be presented to the Dáil so that we should understand what we are voting. I beg to move accordingly.

[Mr. Johnson.]

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I second.

ASSISTANT MINISTER for INDUSTRY and COMMERCE (Mr. J. B. Whelehan): When the Estimates were being prepared the organisation of the Ministry was not completed, and it could not possibly have been foreseen what offices would be necessary and what salaries would, accordingly, be required for officials. I have, however, available at present, particulars of all salaries, wages and allowances, and I shall be very glad to have these circulated to the Dáil, but it has only been possible to have these compiled very recently. As a matter of fact, the Vote on account of the Ministry is now exhausted, and if it will meet Deputy Johnson's point that I should have these particulars circulated, I will undertake to have them circulated as quickly as they can be turned out.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: They are not ready now?

Mr. WHELEHAN: No; they are not ready at the moment. You understand, I have all the figures and all the particulars as to staff, salaries, wages and allowances, but one copy only.

Mr. JOHNSON: How soon could this be circulated?

Mr. WHELEHAN: As soon as we possibly can have them graphed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We could not have these particulars circulated for an hour or an hour and a half, which would be too late.

Mr. JOHNSON: I am sure the Minister was not expecting that this particular Estimate would be taken to-night, and, therefore, he would not be disappointed at not having to deal with it.

Mr. WHELEHAN: I have been expecting this Vote to come up for the past month, the Deputy will understand.

Mr. DAVIN: I think it would be undesirable that the Vote should be passed this evening without the information that has been asked for by Deputy Johnson, and for that reason, and for that reason alone, I think it is desirable that the Vote should be deferred until we are in possession of the information asked for.

Mr. WHELEHAN: I quite appreciate that, and that Deputies are perfectly entitled to ask for all the particulars under that head (a). I have no objection to having it left over until to-morrow.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Shall we take that as an agreement, without putting the motion?

Agreed.

Motion withdrawn accordingly.

TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move "That a sum not exceeding ten thousand seven hundred and seventy-eight pounds (£10,778) be granted to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending 31st March, 1924, for the salaries and expenses of the Transport Department of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, including certain payments in connection with railways." (£6,000 had been already voted on account).

Mr. HUGHES: I do not know would I be in order in raising the question on this Vote regarding the facilities that are offered to traders and other people since the coming into being of the new Customs regulations. I have been informed by various traders and others—

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I do not know if this Estimate has anything to do with that.

Mr. DAVIN: It has.

Mr. HUGHES: Perhaps it is the previous one.

Mr. WHELEHAN: In so far as it refers to any question of the Railway Companies, I think the Deputy is in order in raising it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question of facilities afforded by the Railway Companies.

Mr. HUGHES: Yes, and Steamboat Companies connected with them as well.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Do steamboats come into this?

Mr. HUGHES: It is all transport.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I want to get clear before we get on. This is railways, merely, is it?

Mr. WHELEHAN: Yes.

Mr. DAVIN: I suggest, in the case of Shipping Companies who are also Railway Companies, the question of Customs can come inside this Vote.

Mr. WHELEHAN: Quite right.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I am quite able to appreciate that.

Mr. MILROY: My own impression is that if you have deferred Estimate 55 that all Estimates dealing with the Department ought to be deferred also for this reason. I hope I am in order in making the suggestion. What I wish to say is that before you come to deal with the particular items in an Estimate that the whole general survey of a Department ought to come under review before we come down to generalities and details, and I think if, under such an Estimate, such a discussion is at all in order it would come under No. 55 rather than under this sub-head or minor phases of the working of the Department. I certainly think, as I have said before, that this is one of the most vital phases of administration and it is hardly sufficient, I think, simply to discuss these things in detail without first having a general survey of the whole work of the Department. I think if No. 55 is to be deferred to a later date every matter that comes under this Department ought also to be deferred.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is the suggestion. Is that agreed on?

Mr. WHELEHAN: I have no doubt Deputy Milroy is very interested in the Estimate for the Ministry, and he has been good enough to give me notice that he is so interested. I can assure him that when the general vote of the Ministry comes up to-morrow he will have full facility for discussing it. I shall provide him with information on every possible subject that can be raised, and which I hope he will find quite satisfactory, but I think that we ought to proceed with the Vote, if the Dáil wishes.

Mr. JOHNSON: I support Deputy Milroy in his suggestion, inasmuch as this Vote says quite distinctly that it is for the Transport Department of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce. It may well be that some of these items of salaries may have to do with the Transport Department; we do not know. We accept your assurance that it is not, but if we had the names, offices and salaries before us, we would understand exactly. At any rate there is an Assistant Secretary in this Department, and there may be a Secretary over the whole Department, whose policy might come under consideration, and, therefore, I think, as the Vote on this Department of the Ministry has to be considered to-morrow, Deputy Milroy's point is a good one.

Mr. MILROY: The point I wish to make is really a criticism, although a friendly criticism, of the way in which these Estimates are prepared. You have the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, then you have the Transport Department, and you have then the Marine Service, all phases of the one Department. Now, I contend that an opportunity should be given by which a comprehensive criticism and discussion of all the different phases of that Department should be in order.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It will be in order on the Vote for the Ministry of Industry and Commerce.

Mr. MILROY: I assume, that would be the only occasion in which it would, but if we defer that and proceed with the Transport Department or the Marine Service Estimates, when we come to raise matters that arise out of these Estimates on the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, we may be informed that those things are already discussed, and that we must confine ourselves to the details in the particular Estimate. I think to defer this No. 55, and to proceed with the others, 56 and 57, is really putting the car before the horse, and would lead to confusion in the consideration of the working of the service and administration of this Department. I would certainly urge that if we defer 55 we ought also to defer this.

Mr. DAVIN: I suggest that the future organisation, or reorganisation, of this particular Department depends to a large extent, perhaps, on the policy of the Ministry, or any statement the Minister may have to make regarding the future of the railways. I think we are entitled, in view of the promises made many months ago, to hear from the Minister, or the Ministry, or the Executive Council, some statement regarding the present position of the railway companies, and their agreement or failure to agree regarding the grouping scheme, or the policy of the Government in spite of such a failure, if there has been a failure, and as to whether there will be a grouping up in the future of this Department, its enlargement or otherwise. For that reason, and by reason of the fact that it is a subordinate Department of the Ministry, the two Departments ought to be taken together, or one after the other.

[Mr. Davin.]

Mr. WHELEHAN: I really had no intention of excluding Deputy Milroy and other Deputies from raising the question when the Vote comes under consideration. In order to save the time of the Dáil, if it is the general wish, I have no objection to the Estimates being left over.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is to say, that Estimates 55, 56, and 57 are to be left over until to-morrow.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: They do really swing or hinge together.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Will that also apply to Vote No. 31?

Mr. BLYTHE: As there is going to be a discussion on Estimate 55 to-morrow, and as it will actually range over the whole ground, we would be, to some extent, wasting time in discussing it now.

Progress to be reported.

DAIL RESUMES.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: It is reported from the Committee on Finance that Estimates 31, 53, 56, 57 have been deferred until to-morrow.

Agreed.

Mr. JOHNSON: Will the Minister then make a statement respecting the general policy of the Departments, more particularly with reference to the Railway policy?

Mr. WHELEHAN: I did purpose making such a statement this evening, but as we are taking the Estimate to-morrow, I presume that statement may be left over until then.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move the adjournment until to-morrow, at 3 o'clock.

The Dáil adjourned at 6.50 p.m.

DAIL EIREANN.DE MAIRT, 17^{ADH} IÚL, 1923.

(Tuesday, 17th July, 1923.)

Cromadh ar obair an lae ar a 3.10 p.m. Bhí An Ceann Comhairle, Micheál O hAodha, sa Chathaoir.

CEIST—QUESTION.

[ORAL ANSWER.]

BALBRIGGAN SHOOTING.

CATHAL O SEANAIN (for Tomas Mac Eoin) asked the Minister for Finance when the £1,750 compensation which was awarded in March, 1921, to Mrs. Lawless, Balbriggan, for herself and children, in respect of the shooting of her husband will be paid.

MINISTER for LOCAL GOVERNMENT (Mr. E. Blythe) replying for the Minister for Finance: Payment in this case has already been made.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: When was payment made?

Mr. BLYTHE: On the 13th.

LAND LAW (COMMISSION) BILL, 1923.

(FROM THE SEANAD.)

LEASÚ ON SEANAD (AMENDMENT BY THE SEANAD).

To delete in Section 1, lines 22 and 23, the words "together with Part V. of that Act," and in line 26 to delete the words "Parts I., II., and IV. of that Act," and to substitute therefor the words "any subsequent Act now in force which is by its terms to be construed as one with the Land Purchase Acts."

Mr. BLYTHE (for Minister for Agriculture): I move: "That the Dáil agree with the Seanad in the said amendment."

Motion put and agreed to.

LEASÚ ON SEANAD (AMENDMENT BY THE SEANAD).

In Section 7 (1), line 27, to insert after the word "in" the words "or held in trust for," and in line 31, after the word "by" to insert the words "or for."

MINISTER for AGRICULTURE (Mr. Hogan): I move: "That the Dáil agree with the Seanad in the said amendment."

Motion put and agreed to.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: A message will be sent to the Seanad accordingly.

MONEY RESOLUTION.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Minister for Agriculture is in a difficulty in regard to a Money Resolution.

Mr. HOGAN: The Report Stage of the Land Bill will be on the Orders of the Day for to-morrow, and in connection with the Bill it will be necessary to introduce a new Money Resolution. Further money will have to be expended. The Resolution is quite simple. I am having it neo-styled now, and I could have it circulated in a short time. The Order Papers for to-morrow are printed, and if the Dáil would consent to take a copy of my Resolution to-day, it would facilitate us and enable us to get over the difficulty of re-printing the Orders of the Day. The Resolution is quite simple; it merely provides that further moneys in respect of one particular item in the Bill shall be appropriated by the Dáil.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: When does the Minister suggest taking the Resolution?

Mr. HOGAN: Perhaps it would be too much to expect the Dáil to take it this evening. If the Deputies are not willing to take it this evening, I suggest it could be taken to-morrow before the Report Stage. It can be circulated to-day.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: I do not think there would be any objection to having the Resolution taken this evening.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Order Paper for to-morrow is already printed, and the further Money Resolution which the Minister speaks of is not [AN CEANN COMHAIRLE.] on it. What is needed is the consent of the Dáil to take the Resolution this evening or to-morrow, and to waive the point that it is not on the printed Orders.

Mr. HOGAN: I understand Deputy O'Shannon's suggestion is that it could be taken this evening. That would suit me.

CATHAL O'SHANNON: Yes, provided that time is given to the Deputies to see exactly what is in the Resolution.

ARMY PENSIONS BILL, 1923.

(FROM THE SEANAD.)

MOLA ÓN SEANAD (RECOMMENDATION BY THE SEANAD).

That the words "for Defence," in line 22, Section 2 (3), be deleted.

MINISTER for DEFENCE: (General Mulcahy): I desire to move: "That the Dáil agree with the Seanad in this recommendation." It is purely a question of deleting the words "for Defence." The word "Minister" is defined in another portion of the Bill.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: There are really two recommendations in regard to deleting the words "for Defence."

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: The matter I am about to raise is not of great importance, but it raises a matter that may affect subsequent Bills. When a Bill has been passed by the Dáil and sent to the Seanad, and when it returns from the Seanad, is it possible that the Dáil can move amendments again to that Bill, or is it to be construed that the Dáil has finally concluded with the Bill?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Does the Deputy mean this Bill or the last Bill?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: We are now dealing with the Army Pensions Bill, are we not?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: We are dealing with the amendments from the Minister for Defence, as a Deputy of this Dáil, making certain changes in the Bill, and the point I am asking guidance on is, if a Bill has once left this Dáil and gone to the Seanad and come back, will it be considered in order for other amendments to be considered and moved, or can only Seanad amendments be considered on that occasion?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: This is a special case of a Money Bill. The Army Pensions Bill was certified as a Money Bill. The Seanad could not, therefore, amend it. They could only make certain recommendations. When these recommendations come to us, if we agree with them we have to move amendments, and the amendments have accordingly to be made in the Dáil. That is the only possible procedure. With regard to what amendments can be moved, the only amendment that can be moved in this Dáil, when a Money Bill comes from the Seanad, is an amendment which is necessary to give effect to the recommendation of the Seanad, or the amendment which might be offered to the Seanad in connection with one of their recommendations, and which would need to be relevant to it, or a further consequential amendment. With regard to the general question of a Bill coming back from the Seanad with amendments, such as the Land Law Commission Bill, the Seanad in that case has power to amend the Bill. Amendments have been made to the Bill, and if we agree, the Bill becomes law as it finally passed the Seanad. We can, of course, partially agree, and suggest other amendments to the Bill ourselves, but they, too, would have to be relevant to the Seanad amendments or consequential.

Mr. JOHNSON: On a point of order, I think we are on No. 2.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON: This is a motion of which notice was given, or at least notice was placed in the hands of the Deputies, last night. Is it in order to discuss it now?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is it the motion to agree with the Seanad in the said recommendation?

Mr. JOHNSON: Yes.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I think so. The motion was received in time to be placed upon the Orders of the Day, and the Orders of the Day were distributed this morning.

Mr. JOHNSON: I suggest that this is a motion of which four days' notice should be given, and while it does not mean very much, perhaps, to this Dáil, one can see that a precedent may be made, and very important amendments to Bills might be made in the Seanad affecting the whole structure of the Bill, and in such a case Deputies ought to have sufficient notice to examine the implications of those amendments. The ordinary notice of motion should be given, and the Dáil should have sufficient notice of any amendments that are coming forward to enable them to give proper consideration to them. I submit that the form in which these amendments from the Seanad must come before the Dáil necessitates a regular period of notice before they can be discussed in the Dáil.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The motion on the paper, "That the Dáil agree with the Seanad in the said recommendation," was received in time. The Standing Orders prescribe that the Deputies must get the Order Paper with the printed Agenda on the morning of the day to which the paper relates. In this case that has been done. Therefore this matter is in order. There is another question as to whether longer notice should not be given to me of motions dealing with recommendations or amendments from the Seanad, so that the motions could be circulated to Deputies, and the Deputies would have some days to consider the matter before they came on. I think that is a different question, and would have to be decided separately.

Mr. JOHNSON: This is not an amendment in the sense that an amendment to a Bill already before the Dáil might be considered an amendment. The Seanad has made certain amendments to a Bill, and the Bill comes with those amendments from the Seanad to the Dáil.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Recommendations in this case.

Mr. JOHNSON: Recommendations in this case; but I am raising it here because of precedent that may be created. Undoubtedly the motion by the Minister for Defence was received by you in due time, but the motion which is now before the Dáil is not quite in the same position as an amendment to a Bill already before the Dáil. It may be of very grave importance, and the Dáil should have an opportunity of discussing the effect of any amendment which the Seanad may make before being asked to come to a decision upon it. While I have no objection whatever to accepting this motion now, I want to call attention to the danger that we might find ourselves in at some future time if there were important and fundamental amendments to a Bill made in the Seanad, and the Dáil has not time to consider them before decisions are made.

Mr. HUGHES: Supposing the ordinary procedure had been followed in this case of notice of motion, would it appear on the Order Paper any earlier? If four days' notice was given, would we have it in our hands earlier? Does it make any difference?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: No, but I think I see Deputy Johnson's point now. If we take an example such as the previous Bill, which is better, I think, where an amendment has been made by the Seanad, under our Standing Orders we could put this amendment through all stages through which we put Bills—that is to say, we could take the fact that it is made by the Seanad as the introduction. We can read it a second time. We can go into Committee and amend it, and then we can have another stage on the motion that the Dáil agree with its own Committee on the amendment. In that way we would have sufficient discussion of any particular amendment, and if it is of a grave nature it gets all the stages which a section of the original Bill would get in the Dáil. Under present Standing Orders I think we could not do any more than that. I do not know if Deputy Johnson suggests that we should have a rule that amendments from the Seanad should be circulated to Deputies before they appear on the Order Paper with the motion for agreement.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is implied. I am only raising it now so that note may be taken of the point, because we can foresee rather important possibilities in this procedure.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes.

Question: "That the Dáil agree with the Seanad in the said recommendation," put and agreed to.

General MULCAHY: I desire to move: "To delete the words 'for Defence,' line 22, Section 2 (3)."

Agreed.

General MULCAHY: I desire to move: "That the Dáil agree with the recommendation by the Seanad that the words 'for Defence,' in line 6, Section 5 (2), be deleted."

Agreed.

General MULCAHY: I desire to move. "That the words 'for Defence,' in line 6, Section 5 (2) be deleted."

Agreed.

General MULCAHY: I move: "That the Dáil agree with the recommendation by the Seanad, that the words 'any section,' paragraph 6, line 6, Second Schedule, second column be deleted, and that the words 'this section' be substituted therefor."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That was an error in the Bill as it left the Dáil, but I thought it better that it should be formally corrected rather than corrected in the office.

General MULCAHY: The effect of this recommendation is that the paragraph in the Second Schedule now reads: "No allowance shall be payable under this section in any case in which any allowance was payable under any of the foregoing sections."

Question: "That the Dáil agree with the Seanad in the said recommendation," put and agreed to.

General MULCAHY: I desire to move: "To delete the words 'any section,' paragraph 6, line 6, Second Schedule, second column, and to substitute therefor the words 'this section.'"

Agreed.

General MULCAHY: I desire to move: "That the Dáil agree with the recommendation of the Seanad that the figure '3,' paragraph 6, line 2, Third Schedule, be deleted, and that the figure '4' be substituted therefor." This is just a misprint, where the wrong paragraph was obviously inserted.

Agreed.

General MULCAHY: I desire to move: "To delete the figure '3,' paragraph 6, line 2, Third Schedule, and to substitute therefor the figure '4.'"

Agreed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: A message will be sent to the Seanad that their recommendations have been accepted and the Bill amended accordingly.

[DAIL IN COMMITTEE.]

PREVENTION OF ELECTORAL ABUSES BILL, 1923.

SECTION 1.

CORRUPT PRACTICES.

(1) The expression "corrupt practices" as used in this Act means any of the offences stated in this section to be a corrupt practice, and any person who commits any of such offences shall be guilty of a corrupt practice.

(2) The following offences as more fully defined in the following sections of this Part of this Act shall be corrupt practices, that is to say:—

- (a) bribery,
- (b) personation,
- (c) treating,
- (d) undue influence.

(3) The following offences shall also be corrupt practices, that is to say:—

- (a) aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of the offence of personation,
- (b) knowingly publishing, before or during a Dáil or Seanad election, a false statement of the withdrawal of a candidate at such election for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of another candidate.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 1 is the existing law except that the publication of a false statement of the withdrawal of a candidate for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of another candidate is made a corrupt practice.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move: "In Sub-section (3), (b), lines 38 and 39, to delete all from the word 'for' to the word 'candidate' inclusive."

There is not, perhaps, a great deal in this point, but under the Proportional Representation elections a false statement which may be made regarding the withdrawal of a candidate may be just as false, just as harmful, although it may not be made for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of another candidate. You may have a rota of 10 or 12 names on a list, and someone may publish false statements that A.B. has withdrawn. Certainly the chances of the other 11 are increased by the withdrawal of one, but there is no special point towards any other individual candidate on the list. It seems that this phrase might apply quite satisfactorily to the elections under the old method, but it hardly fits the new method of Proportional Representation.

Mr. BLYTHE: I accept the amendment. I think it strengthens the Clause.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That Section 1 as amended stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 2 is practically the existing law except that there is a Clause preventing the inducing of voters to vote in a particular way. That was not necessary before the introduction of Proportional Representation. It is now necessary, otherwise it is the existing law.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: We had better take it section by section.

Question: "That Section 2 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Sections 3, 4, and 5 are the existing law.

Sections 3, 4, and 5 put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: In Section 6 the penalties apply to summary jurisdiction, as it was thought that there would be great certainty of conviction than trial by indictment. It provides a minimum penalty for impersonation, and extends the qualification for registration to the Local Government Franchise.

Question: "That Section 6 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

SECTION 7.

(1) Whenever an election court reports that any corrupt practice, other than treating or undue influence, has been proved to have been committed in reference to any election to either House of the Oireachtas by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at such election, or that the offence of treating or undue influence has been proved to have been committed in reference to any such election as aforesaid by any candidate at such election, such candidate shall for ever be incapable of being elected to or being a member of the Oireachtas, and if he has been elected to either House of the Oireachtas, his election shall be void, and he shall also be subject to the same incapacities as if at the date of the report he had been convicted of a corrupt practice.

(2) Whenever an election court reports that any corrupt practice has been proved to have been committed in reference to an election to either House of the Oireachtas by any agent of a candidate at such election, such candidate shall, during a period of seven years from the date of the report, be incapable of being elected to or being a member of the Oireachtas and, if he has been elected to either House of the Oireachtas, his election shall be void.

Mr. O'CONNELL: I move in Subsection (1), line 16, to delete the words "other than treating or undue influence," and in lines 19 to 22 to delete all from the word "or" to the word "election," inclusive.

It seems to me there is no good reason for making an exception to this particular form of corrupt practice.

Mr. BLYTHE: I accept the amendment.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Question: "That Section 7, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 8 is practically the existing law, except that there is not the maximum limit.

Question: "That Section 8 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 9 is the existing law.

Question: "That Sections 9 and 10 stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Sections 11, 12, 13 and 14 are the existing law, except in

[Mr. Blythe.]

Section 12 the law extends to include a Referendum and the Seanad elections.

Sections 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15, put and agreed to.

SECTION 16.

(1) Whenever an Election Court reports that any illegal practice has been proved to have been committed in reference to an election to either House of the Oireachtas by or with the knowledge and consent of any candidate at such election, such candidate shall during a period of seven years from the date of the report be incapable of being elected to or being a member of the Oireachtas, and if he has been elected to either House of the Oireachtas his election shall be void, and he shall also be subject to the same incapacities as if at the date of the report he had been convicted of an illegal practice.

(2) Whenever an Election Court reports that any illegal practice has been proved to have been committed in reference to an election to either House of the Oireachtas by any agent of a candidate at such election, that candidate if such election was a Dáil election shall be incapable of being elected to or being a member of Dáil Eireann during the continuance of that Oireachtas and if such election was a Seanad election shall be incapable of being elected to or being a member of Seanad Eireann before the next triennial elections thereto and in either case if he has been elected his election shall be void.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move as an amendment in Sub-section (2) to delete the words "if such election was a Dáil election" and also to delete the words "if such election was a Seanad election," and further to delete the words "in either case." The sub-section would then read if the amendments were made:—

"(2) Whenever an Election Court reports that any illegal practice has been proved to have been committed in reference to an election to either House of the Oireachtas by any agent of a candidate at such election that candidate shall be incapable of being elected to or being a member of Dáil Eireann during the continuance of that Oireachtas and shall be incapable of being elected to or being a member of Seanad Eireann before the next triennial elections thereto, and if he has been elected his election shall be void."

The position of the agent seems to me to be immaterial. If it had been an election to the Dáil, then if there is any disqualification it ought to apply to the other House as well. To say that a man is unfit or incompetent to be a member of the Dáil because his agent has committed a corrupt practice within his knowledge, but that he may be a member of the Seanad is not complimentary to the Seanad, or vice versa.

Mr. BLYTHE: I accept the amendment.

Amendment put and agreed to.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 16 as amended stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Sections 17, 18, 19, 20 and 21 put and agreed to.

SECTION 22.

PREVENTION OF PERSONATION.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move Section 22, which strengthens the existing law to some extent by forbidding the personating agent to leave the booth except with the permission of the Presiding Officer, and in compelling him to leave his notes and registers behind him when he does leave the booth.

Section 22 put and agreed.

SECTION 23.

(1) Whenever a referendum is demanded under Article 47 of the Constitution,

(a) Dáil Eireann may appoint a person to be Sponsor of the Bill, and

(b) If the referendum is demanded by a Resolution of Seanad Eireann, Seanad Eireann may appoint a person to be Challenger of the Bill, and

(c) if the referendum is demanded by a Petition, the Petitioners may, by any person or body of persons having or purporting to have authority to act for them, appoint a person to be Challenger of the Bill.

(2) The Sponsor and the Challenger shall each have the like power of appointing an agent in each constituency in Saorstát Éireann as is conferred by this Act or the Electoral Act, 1923 (No. of 1923) on a candidate at a Dáil election in such constituency and every provision of this Act of the Electoral Act, 1923, relating to the appointment of an agent by a candidate at a Dáil election shall apply to the appointment of agents by a Sponsor or a Challenger.

(3) Every agent appointed by a Sponsor or a Challenger shall have within the constituency for which he is appointed agent, the like powers of appointing sub-agents, personation agents and persons to be present at the counting of the votes as are conferred in that behalf by this Act of the Electoral Act, 1923, on a candidate or the agent of a candidate at a Dáil election in that constituency, and every provision of this Act or the Electoral Act, 1923, in relation to the appointment of such sub-agents, personation agents and other persons by any such candidate or his agent and the rights, powers and duties of such persons when so appointed shall apply to such persons when appointed by the agent of a Sponsor or Challenger.

(4) In this section the word " Bill " means the Bill which is the subject of the referendum.

Mr. BLYTHE: In this Section is provided the machinery whereby agents may be appointed to detect and prevent personation at a referendum. It is felt that owing to the prevalence that personation has attained in this country, some steps should be made to enlist people, who may be interested, either for or against any measure, as personating agents to prevent the actual result of the election being falsified, as it might be, by personation, which would be likely to occur if it simply depended on the Returning Officer acting. We know, in many cases, the Returning Officer would not have any great interest, and might not have even a partisan interest, which we would hope to utilise under this section, and that in most cases a Returning Officer would take no action whatever in the matter, no matter to what extent personation was going on. We feel that political parties or groups of individuals interested in a Bill might be able to appoint personating agents in their own area, with the result that you would secure a truer return.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move Amendment No. 4, which is to delete the Section, and to substitute therefor the following new Section:—

" Whenever a Referendum is demanded under Section 47 of the Constitution, the Returning Officer in each constituency may appoint personation agents, and agents to attend the counting of the votes in the constituency, in such number as he thinks necessary, and every person so appointed shall enjoy the same rights and privileges and be subject to the same obligations as a person appointed for the like purpose by a candidate at a Dáil Election enjoys or is subject to."

The plan in the Bill seems to me to be unworkable and not fit for the purpose of achieving the object that the Referendum is supposed to achieve. The intention in the Bill is that whenever a Referendum is demanded the Dáil may appoint a person to be sponsor, and if the Referendum is demanded by a vote in the Seanad the Seanad may appoint the challenger. If the Referendum is demanded by a petition, and the petition is made by a person or a body of persons purporting to act for them they appoint a person to be the challenger of the Bill. Now, if you take paragraph (c) in the section the method there is by popular demand, and it is by a petition that the Referendum is called for; it is as likely as not that more than one body of persons, organised or unorganised, would be interested in the motion of the petition, but under the Bill the body of persons or the person so purporting to have authority to act shall appoint the person to be the challenger. There it seems to me you will have to have another election to decide from all these petitioners who is to be the challenger, or alternatively the Minister will have to decide for the petitioners who is to be the challenger. It may be a Bill in which the Minister is interested, and he is to select a person from among the many persons or bodies who may be interested in promoting the petition—he is to select who is to be the challenger. That, I think, is not satisfactory, and may be found to be unworkable.

The Dáil is to appoint a person to be a sponsor to the Bill. That is to say that a majority of the Dáil, which in its turn means the Government of the day, will appoint a person. That, I think, is not satisfactory in view of the intentions of the Constitution regarding a Referendum. For the appointment of a sponsor for the Bill to be a political appointment, in effect, a Party appointment, for a Bill which may not be a Party Bill or may be a Party Bill, and that may not be a Bill promoted by a Party, seems to me to cause a difficulty. I think the proposal in the amendment fits the requirements of the case much better than the proposal in the Bill. The idea is to consider a Referendum rather as an official procedure, removing it as far as possible from Party conflict, and to treat the procedure of taking a Referendum as in all respects an official procedure. The Government or Minister of the day will have the appointment of the Returning Officer through the ordinary processes, and there is no good reason that I know of why that Returning Officer should not be authorised to appoint officials to act as personation agents and to have the powers of the personation agents which would be given in the case of an ordinary Dáil election. It is unlikely, judging by the experience of most countries, that in the case of a Referendum the same kind of machinery will be brought into operation. It is unlikely that anything like the full proportion of votes that we usually experience at a Dáil or Parliamentary election would be brought into effect at a Referendum, and the method of checking the voting by official personation agents would be quite effective enough, especially with the new powers that the Bill itself gives to the presiding officer, and I think it is much more in harmony with the general idea of a Referendum. I therefore beg to move my amendment.

[Mr. Johnson.]

Mr. BLYTHE: I am sorry I cannot accept the amendment. The proposal in the amendment was set down as one of the devices that was considered when the Bill was being drawn up. It was felt from our experience in the matter that such machinery as is proposed in the amendment would really result in an expenditure of money without any result. The Presiding Officer is an official person who gets a certain fee for acting as Presiding Officer in the booth. We know from past experience that Presiding Officers have really very seldom shown any inclination to do more than the mechanical work they are appointed to do, and that they do not desire to see anything which they can well avoid seeing, so as not to incur displeasure on the part of anybody by pulling them up if necessary. The Presiding Officer is a man who, perhaps, holds the position of school teacher in an area. He is paid five guineas for his day, and all he wants to do is to earn his five guineas by incurring as little displeasure as possible. If a personation agent were appointed he would be simply duplicating the offices of the Presiding Officer and the Poll Clerk. An official personation agent would not, we believe, stop personation, and would not take any steps to do it. An official personation agent would simply be a third man put there at the cost of the State who would do no more than the Presiding Officer or the Poll Clerk to stop personation. As regards attending at the Court, as the personation agent would have power to do under this amendment if passed, there is not much use, we think, in asking the Returning Officer to appoint a person to watch himself. We feel that if there is to be any good at all in appointing personation agents they must not be appointed officially, and we must not simply create a certain amount of patronage that might be distributed by the Returning Officer. We think that this is a thing which should be done voluntarily by people interested for or against the Bill, and that that is the only possible way in which you could get any results from the appointment of personation agents. If the State were to make these appointments the cost to it would not be negligible. There will be something like five thousand polling stations in the country, and you would probably pay three guineas or so a day to the official personation agents. That would be over £15,000 paid for, I believe, practically no results at all. I quite agree that it might be better to change the provisions of the Bill so far as they affect the case where the Referendum is demanded by petition. It might be difficult to decide who ought to have the power of appointing personation agents on behalf of those opposed to the Bill. It is not to be taken that the Government of the day will appoint a representative of the Dáil in the matter. I think myself that if a Referendum were demanded on the Charitable Hospitals Bill that this Dáil would scarcely allow the Government to appoint a person to act on behalf of the Dáil in the matter. If the Bill itself were a Party Bill, if it were a Government Bill that was being challenged, there is no reason why the Government in that case should not virtually appoint a person who would look after the Bill in the country. But where it was not a Party Bill, where it was some sort of measure as to which there was general agreement, there would be no reason in that case why there should not be a free vote of the Dáil. As a matter of fact, the Government of the day would probably be very anxious to appoint somebody who was outside their own group, to bring other interests and other organisations, if possible, into making the machinery as perfect as possible. It would be very difficult to be sure how this machinery that is proposed in the Bill will work. It is rather experimental. If it proves to be unnecessary, if there is no great amount of personation at Referenda, then I think the whole thing would automatically fall into disuse or almost complete disuse because of the fact that it is voluntary. If you appoint official personating agents, even if it were clear that there was no need for them and that little personation went on, there would be a sort of vested interest, and there would be a number of people in favour of continuing the whole business. When it is voluntary, when there will be no money going for it, I think if it proves to be unnecessary it will very quickly fall into disuse, and the actual provisions can then be repealed. It is a thing that is experimental, it is a thing that we feel, because of the great extent to which personation has been practised, that we ought to provide a penalty at this stage. We could imagine Bills that might affect a fairly wealthy interest, which would expend money in organising personation, and if no machinery existed except official machinery, I am very much afraid that the Referendum would not show the true feelings of the people on the matter. If by the penalties in this Bill dealing with personation at elections we were to eradicate the taste that has grown up for it, then, of course, there will not be much danger of it being resorted to at Referenda.

Mr. JOHNSON: Can the Minister say what the experience has been in other countries which have adopted the Referendum, whether the check upon corrupt practices is generally carried out by private organisations or officials?

Mr. BLYTHE: My information is that so far as Referenda are concerned, what checking is done is done officially, and that there is no great personation there. We feel that there is a special danger here.

Amendment put and declared lost.

Mr. JOHNSON: I beg to move:—

In Sub-section (1) (c), lines 33 to 35, to delete all from the words "the Petitioners" to the word "them," inclusive, and to substitute therefor the words: "the members of Dáil Éireann or the members of Seanad Éireann upon whose demand the Bill was suspended in accordance with Article 47 of the Constitution may."

The purpose of the amendment is that the members of Dáil Éireann or the members of Seanad Éireann, upon whose demand the Bill was suspended in accordance with Article 47 of the Constitution, may appoint a person to be challenger of the Bill. The intention, it will be seen, is to limit the number of people whose opinion is to be found. As I have already said, there may be very great difficulty in selecting a challenger of the Bill from amongst a heterogeneous body of petitioners which may be collected from all parts of the country on all kinds of different issues by different means. The proposal in the amendment would give the right to appoint a challenger to those members of the Dáil or Seanad who demanded the suspension of the operation of the Bill pending a Referendum being taken. I think it is very practicable, and I hope the Minister will accept it.

Mr. BLYTHE: I will accept the amendment, because I see that the arrangement provided in the Bill would lead to difficulties.

Amendment agreed to.

Section 23, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 24 limits the number of persons who may attend the local Seanad count. This is necessary, as if there were 45 persons, one representing each candidate, it might not be possible to accommodate them.

Section 24 put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 25 is the existing law, except that it gives a constable

[Mr. Blythe.]
power to arrest without being directed to do so.

Section 25 put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 26 is the existing law, but where an arrest is made by direction of the Returning Officer, without malice, it will not involve penalties, even if it turns out not to have been justified.

Section 26 put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Sections 27 to 37, inclusive, are the existing law.

Sections 27 to 37, inclusive, put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 38 deals with the question of a member of the Dáil sitting without having sent in any return of election expenses. The common informer penalty has been removed, and the prosecution is at the suit of the Attorney-General.

Section 38 put and agreed to.

Section 39 put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 40 provides that notice shall be published stating where a return of expenses can be inspected.

Section 40 put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 41 gives power to Seanad candidates to appoint election agents.

Section 41 put and agreed to.

Mr. BLYTHE: Under Section 42 Seanad candidates are not given power to appoint personating agents. It was felt that if a Seanad candidate were, for instance, to appoint a personating agent or two in each of the 5,000 polling booths, that the appointments might carry him in and might lead to the election not being carried on on the lines it was desired that it should be conducted. There is also the fact that it would be impossible to allow each candidate to appoint a personating agent at the polling booth. There could not possibly be 45, as there would not be accommodation for more than three or four people in a number of places where the polling booths will be situated.

Mr. JOHNSON: What then is the intention regarding the personation agents? Does this reference to agent include personating agent?

Mr. BLYTHE: Not personating agent. Sub-section (2) says: "Nothing in this Act or in the Electoral Act, 1923, shall be deemed to authorise a candidate at a Seanad election or the agent of any such candidate to appoint a deputy agent, sub-agent, or personation agent."

Mr. JOHNSON: Does not that nullify the argument the Minister has just used? If a candidate is a very wealthy man he can buy enough support by appointing personating agents in every constituency. I take it that a candidate who had support widely distributed through the country could appoint a personating agent in every constituency.

Mr. BLYTHE: It expressly says he shall not appoint them.

Mr. JOHNSON: Then what is the check upon personation in the case of a Seanad election?

Mr. BLYTHE: That is one of the difficulties we were up against, and we felt, on the whole, that we would let the section stand. There would be 45 candidates, and you could only have a few represented anywhere. You could not have the same sort of eagle eye on likely personators or supporters of a particular candidate who were being personated, as would be the case if there were a much smaller number of candidates. It was felt, as there will be a Dáil election before a Seanad election, that perhaps personation will have been given some check at the next election. There will be a smaller number of voters on the Seanad ticket, and there will be, we think, a great deal less interest in the Seanad election. There will be less likelihood of spontaneous personation, and in weighing up the matter it was thought that we might leave the election open, as one might say. We could only have imperfect representation of candidates for the purpose of checking personation. It would be undesirable to allow candidates to get influence over a wide area of country in which they might not be known at all by the mere device of appointing a special agent for each polling station and a personation agent for each booth. Personation was, we feel, not so likely at all in the case of the Seanad elections, because, you see, everybody cannot go up. Nomination is only open to certain classes of people who are chosen either by the Dáil or by the Seanad, and we feel that personation was a great deal less likely than in the case of a Dáil election, or even in the case of a Referendum, and as we could not think of any special way to represent each candidate for the purpose of preventing personation, and as there were objections to appointing a large number of agents by candidates who might only be known in a small area, and would only have proper reason for the appointment of personation agents in a small area, it would be better to leave the matter in the Bill without any personation agent. It is not a matter on which I feel very strongly, but I think that, in the circumstances, what is in the Bill is, perhaps, the best thing to be done. I would be quite open to conviction on the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON: There is a good deal of force in what the Minister says about the difficulties, but the arguments he has used rather convince me that the suggestion made respecting the taking of a Referendum and the appointment of personation agents for a Referendum apply at least as strongly to a Seanad election. The Seanad election of the future will, I think, be taken seriously by some people. In twelve years' time the Seanad will be entirely an elected body, and their powers will be considerable. If there is any necessity at all for a check upon personation at any election, it seems to be required for a Seanad election at least as much as for the voting on a Referendum, and if the provisions regarding the appointment of personating agents at a Referendum are considered satisfactory by the Minister, I think that they ought to be made applicable to an election for the Seanad. More strongly, I think, the arguments the Minister has used point to the necessity of having official personation agents in the case of a Seanad election, persons selected, not by the Returning Officer, who may be a local man with, perhaps, local interests, but appointed, let us say, by the Minister himself. But the local influences that surround a Dáil election will not apply even to a Referendum or a Seanad election, it seems to me, and it seems that there will be no need at either of those two forms of election for personation agents, if they are required at all. I think that there ought to be some means of checking and having somebody in the polling booth who would be responsible for noting the attempted personators. Perhaps the Minister will consider the wisdom of adding to this section some machinery or some adaptation of that which he has embodied with regard to the Referendum, or the proposal to appoint official personation agents for Seanad elections, which will only take place in every three years.

Mr. BLYTHE: To tell the truth, I was really to some extent keeping an open mind on the matter until I had heard what the Seanad itself had to say. There is just one thing about it that I did not mention. There will be a Police Constable or a Civic Guard in the booth, and he will have power in future to arrest on his own initiative if he thinks that personation is being done. By the time there is a Seanad election the members of the Civic Guard will probably have as good a knowledge of the people in their respective districts as they are likely to have, and a good deal more knowledge than they have at present, or than they will have when the General Election takes place. It is possible that to some extent they would act as official personation agents. Certainly they are the only people who would be likely to arrest on their own initiative the persons committing offences. The number of Seanad electors would be small, and it might be possible in some cases to combine polling stations. In that case the police could act more effectively. That is a matter that could be thought over, but we cannot find the means in the case of a Referendum, where an appeal is being dealt with, to line up people of two sides to find out what their interests are. If you get men each fighting for their own side in a sort of partisan spirit, which is the only way you will get people to act, in the case where you have 45 candidates one personation agent would probably be interested in one individual only.

I do not think that it would be a good thing certainly to allow the candidates for the Seanad election to appoint personation agents generally. I admit that it does seem a bit unfair to the Seanad candidates, and rather like discrimination against them. If, in the Seanad, there should be any strong case made for it, I have really to a considerable extent an open mind in the matter.

[Mr. Blythe.]

Motion made and question put: "That Section 42 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Mr. BLYTHE: Section 43 refers to the Corrupt and Illegal Practices list. It is the existing law. A list will be sent to each registration officer.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 43 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Motion made and question put: "That Section 44 stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

Sections 45 to 49, inclusive, put and agreed to.

SECTION 50.

(1) Each candidate at a Dáil election shall, subject to regulations to be from time to time made by the Postmaster-General, be entitled to send, free of any charge for postage, to each person on the register of electors for the constituency, one postal communication containing matter relating to the election only and not exceeding two ounces in weight.

(2) A candidate shall not be entitled to exercise the right of free postage conferred by this section before he is duly nominated unless he has given such security as may be required by the Postmaster-General for the payment of the postage on all communications sent by him under this section in case he does not eventually become nominated.

(3) For the purposes of this section, candidates who are, under the First Schedule to this Act, to be deemed to be joint candidates, shall be treated as a single candidate.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Section 50 appears to be inconsistent with the Title of this Bill. If Section 50 were relevant to the subject matter of the Bill we could insert Section 50, amend the Title, and make a special report immediately, but I cannot, with the information at my disposal now, see any relevancy as between the Dáil candidates being entitled to certain free postage and the amending and consolidation of the law relating to corrupt practices.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think there are other reasons why the Title should be altered, because there are several sections of the Bill which deal with procedure rather than the prevention of abuses or corrupt practices, and consequently the Title might very well be altered to allow these sections to be embodied. The Minister is not, I think, committed to the Title.

Mr. BLYTHE: No.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is desirable that we should agree to amend the Bill in Committee, with a recommendation to alter the Title.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Title may be altered. With regard to questions of procedure at elections, they are, in a sense, relative to the prevention of corrupt practices, but what is the relevance of Section 50 to the Bill as it stands?

Mr. BLYTHE: I will tell you how it comes there. It arose in connection with the maximum limit of expenditure which existed until it was removed by this Bill. Previously a candidate could only expend a certain amount legally for the purpose of enabling him to circularise literature to each elector. He was given free postage. It acted practically as an extension of the limit—this particular Clause—and came under the law of corrupt practices then. As therefore the limit has been removed now, I can see that it does not, in the ordinary way, relate to corrupt practices at all, but it is a matter in which the substance of the section is necessary to be preserved. We could, of course, preserve it in a particular way if we chose, without specifically mentioning it, by not repealing the particular section which provides for it.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Which Act is it in?

Mr. BLYTHE: The Representation of the People Act, 1918, Section 33, Sub-section (2), so that could simply exclude that.

Mr. JOHNSON: If that is the only way, I agree that it be done that way, but it is not the proper way.

Mr. BLYTHE: No.

Mr. JOHNSON: It is better to have the provision made clear in the Bill itself. In the Title it is stated that it is an Act to amend and consolidate the law relating to the prevention of corrupt and illegal practices and other electoral abuses, and to make provision for the prevention of such practices and abuses at elections for Seanad Éireann and at a Referendum, and for other purposes connected therewith. A further sentence, such as "to make provision for facilitating the election," will surely be allowed to be included. That is really what it is for—to facilitate the taking of an election.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: I do not think the question is of any moment in this particular case, because everybody is agreed that this Section ought to go into the Bill; but we have to provide for general rules always, and we may have very acute questions arising as to the introduction of a section in a Bill which is not within the Title, and which could not be declared to be relevant to the general subject matter of the Bill, as introduced. In that case the ruling upon it will become more important, and I would not like to see a precedent created, even in regard to a Section about which we are agreed. The giving of certain postage facilities to Dáil candidates is really a question of facilitating the election. I do not think it is the same as preventing corrupt practices. I do not think that could be argued.

Mr. BLYTHE: No, except that it comes into the question of consolidating and amending the law relating to corrupt practices. It is a matter that had relation to the prevention of corrupt practices heretofore. Under this Bill, or in future, it certainly will not.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: What we have to keep before us is not so much a particular question, but the general implication of the ruling and precedent. It would, of course, be better to insert a Section in the Bill than simply to say that a particular Section or Sub-section of an Act is not repealed.

Mr. BLYTHE: Would it meet the difficulty if some such phrase as "providing postage facilities for candidates," is put in the Title?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Is there any structural difficulty in procedure in regard to amending the Title now, or recommending that the Title be amended to read: "A Bill to prevent electoral abuses and to deal with other matters pertaining to elections"?

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The question is not so much the difficulty of amending the Title; it is a question of keeping the amendment which may be offered to a particular Bill within certain limits of relevancy. If we adopted the suggestion made by Deputy Figgis we could bring in a Bill with a very simple Title, and consisting of twelve sections. Either the Government or the Opposition or any Deputy could bring in an amendment to insert other sections dealing with a wholly different matter, and could then simply move to amend the Title by including these matters. It is not so much a question of amending the Title as of relevancy to the subject matter.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think this is relevant to the subject matter of the Bill. This was part of the law relating to corrupt practices, and we are consolidating that law now and amending it. If it were to be introduced as a fresh provision it certainly would not have anything to do with corrupt and illegal practices.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In some Standing Orders that come to my memory it is definitely stated that the Title to any Bill is left last in Committee, and it then may be amended. If the Title is to be left last and may be amended it may be supposed that certain matters introduced in Committee may require the amendment and the enlargement of the Title. It follows again that certain matters may have arisen in Committee that are not strictly relevant to the Title.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That is quite clear. What is introduced in Committee must not necessarily be relevant to the Title, but it must be relevant to the Bill as read a second time and as brought into Committee.

Mr. BLYTHE: I think the Section is in order as it stands. This is a Bill to amend and consolidate the law relating to the prevention of corrupt and illegal practices. We simply have taken certain sections and struck out a certain provision of the law relating to the prevention of corrupt and illegal practices, and we have left in other things to be re-enacted here. I think it should be left in even although its relevancy is a bit lost.

Mr. JOHNSON: I support that view. When I raised the question first it was rather with reference to the Short Title. I think the point made by the Minister when he draws attention to the Long Title, and the fact that this Bill is to consolidate and amend the existing law, makes the section conform to the general intention of the Bill as passed on Second Reading.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Yes, on that ground, that the consolidation and amendment of the law relating to the prevention of corrupt practices necessitates the insertion of this section, the section would be in order. The general position, however, is that when a Bill is introduced and read a second time, any section moved in Committee or any amendment moved in Committee must be relevant to the subject-matter of the Bill. The fact that the amendment moved is not within the Title is not necessarily a bar to the amendment. The amendment may be judged to be in order when it relates to the Bill. In that case if the amendment is adopted the Title must be amended. I only wanted to keep myself clear about it.

Sections 50 to 58, inclusive, put and agreed to.

FIRST SCHEDULE.

Mr. BLYTHE: I move the First Schedule, Parts I., II., III., and IV.

Mr. JOHNSON: If it is in order to go back to Schedule One, may I say that Paragraph 3 reads: "One personating agent in each polling station and no more." Is the polling station the building or the box? Should it not read, "at each polling station"?

Mr. BLYTHE: It is really at the table.

Mr. JOHNSON: The station is where the box is, and you cannot put a personation agent where the box is.

Mr. BLYTHE: I do not think I would interpret it just like that. I think that is the wording that has been accepted. In the Electoral Bill (Section 15 of the Fifth Schedule) it is provided that a separate room or booth may contain several polling stations—that is to say, there may be several polling boxes in the same room. That does not exactly say what is the polling station. I think that the station is the place, and not the box.

Mr. JOHNSON: I think it is better we should have a clear understanding on that. Commonly a polling station is spoken of as being the building in which the stations are placed—the booth, as it would be called. To speak accurately, a polling station is the box, at which a certain number of voters are to receive their polling papers and place their ballot papers there. I think "at each polling station" would be more accurate, and it would prevent a misunderstanding of the term.

Mr. BLYTHE: Very good; I will accept that. The amendment is: "In Paragraph 3 of Part I. of the First Schedule to delete "in" and to substitute "at."

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The paragraph as amended reads: "One personation agent at each polling station, and no more."

Agreed.

Question put: "That the First Schedule, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

SECOND SCHEDULE.

Mr. BLYTHE: In the short title of the fourth item in this Schedule, "The Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883," the word "Practices" is left out. It is a misprint.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: That will be rectified without any amendment.

Question: That Schedule Two stand part of the Bill."

Agreed.

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: Is the Minister sure that the note is sufficient to effect the purpose?

Mr. BLYTHE: I will get advice on that. The Bill specifically refers to Dáil Eireann and the Seanad.

Question: "That the Title stand part of the Bill," put and agreed to.

[THE DAIL RESUMES.]

Bill as amended reported.

Report Stage ordered for Monday, 23rd July, 1923.

COMMITTEE ON FINANCE.

ESTIMATES FOR PUBLIC SERVICES.

MINISTRY OF INDUSTRY AND COMMERCE.

Mr. BLYTHE: I beg to move: "That a sum of £193,445 be granted to complete the sum necessary to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending 31st March, 1924, for the salaries and expenses of the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, including Umpire and Courts of Referees, contributions to the Unemployment Fund and to Special Insurance Acts, for advances to work people under the Labour Exchanges Act, 1909, Fees and Expenses of Medical Referees under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, Fees to Certifying Surgeons under the Factory and Workshops Act, 1901, Fees and Expenses under the Trade Boards Acts, 1909 and 1918, Fees and Expenses under the Electricity Supply Act, 1909, and the Gas Regulation Act, 1920, and contributions towards the expenses of an Irish Stall at the "Daily Mirror" Fashion Fair. (A sum of £102,000 has been voted on account.)

AN CEANN COMHAIRLE: The Deputies have received the details of Sub-head A in type, I take it. How is it intended to proceed? Is it intended to have a statement from the Minister and take the general discussion first?

Mr. WHELEHAN (Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce): I think I promised the statement first.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE at this stage took the Chair.

Mr. WHELEHAN. Deputies by now will have received the details of sub-head A. First I would refer to the work of the Ministry during the past few months. The Ministry of Industry and Commerce in its present form, amalgamating what were previously two separate Departments, came into existence in October, 1922. Since that time a large part of the attention of the Ministry was devoted to examining legislation which had been inherited from the British Government, and so far as possible adopting what was suitable to Irish needs. Laws relating to such matters as patents, trade marks, designs, merchandise, copyrights, companies, merchant shipping, trade facilities, safeguarding of industries and electricity supplies have been carefully analysed. We have had some adaptation Orders. For example, such an Order as the Adaptation of Enactments Act, 1923, dealing with light railways, and the External Companies Adaptation Order, 1923, and we have prepared and in draft a Control of Electricity Bill. The principles of new legislation on the subject of patents, trade marks and designs are under consideration, and are receiving legal attention. In addition the Dáil will recollect that we have enacted the Statutory Undertaking Continuance of Charges Act, 1923, and, as promised when that Act was before the Dáil, we have set up a Committee of Investigation regarding the Dublin United Tramways Company. We also passed through the Oireachtas a special Act dealing with unemployment insurance, and we are still engaged in investigating the system of unemployment insurance operating in various countries, both in the old and new worlds, to see what system more suitable than the present it is possible to bring into operation in this country. Inspectors are in training for the operations of the Weights and Measures Act, and an investigation is proceeding throughout the country to recover and restore the standard and sub-standards which have been lost during the past few years. The first annual report of the Companies Consolidation Act, as to Companies operating in the Saorstát, has been submitted to the Oireachtas. Inspectors have been appointed for the purpose of the Factories and Workshops' Act, and medical referees and certifying surgeons under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

It has been a large task to review and adapt to the new circumstances created by the establishment of the Saorstát all legislation on matters affecting industry and commerce inherited from the British Government. Much of that legislation is of little advantage to the Saorstát and even where it has been of advantage the machinery has not always been suitable. Where necessary, the administrative machinery has been made effective, while such early amendments in the code of industrial and commercial legislation to encourage the course of trade are being rapidly advanced. To promote trade we have for the first time in this country a new Statistical Department and a new Intelligence Department. The Intelligence Department collects reports from our trade representatives abroad, reports which should be of great service to the industrialists of this country. Simultaneously, details have been obtained from Irish manufacturing and trading concerns as to their capacity for export trade and their requirements in the matter of foreign markets. The effect of a number of commercial treaties and arrangements inherited from the old régime is being carefully examined with a view to safeguarding the real interests of the Saorstát, and the question of the maintenance or alteration of such treaties and arrangements can in future be decided. It will then be possible to see their defects and possibilities. Effective machinery for the registration of ships and seamen has been set up, and the service for the establishment of wreck salvage and life-saving around the coast is being overhauled.

[Mr. Whelehan.]

Much damage has been done in recent years to the building and equipment of this service, and an inspection of all the old stations is now practically complete. On the East Coast 14 stations have been re-established and are being re-equipped. Practice and drills have been re-started, and the service will be in working order, it is hoped, within a few weeks. Similar action is proceeding in connection with the stations on the South and West, so that before winter comes arrangements will have been completed to deal with wrecks on any part of the coast of the Saorstát. During the past few months continuous attention has been given to the important matter of the future organisation of the railways to determine the best method of procuring a cheap and efficient system of transport for the Saorstát. The problem is a very complicated one, and its conditions are in many respects peculiar to the Saorstát. The damage to the railways and the general disturbance of trade caused exceptional difficulties which necessarily involved delay in examining the problem from every point of view so as to ensure that the policy ultimately adopted will prove beneficial.

Considerable progress has, however, been made, progress which has altogether surpassed our expectations at one time. I may state that two of the larger companies, with some of the smaller companies in the south, have now come to a provisional understanding, and that understanding really forms the nucleus of the whole scheme, details of which are under consideration at the present moment, and, in fact, a conference upon those details is taking place even this very day. The Ministry fully realises the necessity for the organisation of the whole railway system within the Saorstát. It has not felt that it would be justified in using compulsion up to the present to bring about agreement between the parties. In fact, so far the voluntary work of the various companies has been so successful that we feel justified in waiting a little longer for the ultimate voluntary successes from all the companies. It may be understood that the time which will be afforded for voluntary conclusions to be arrived at by the companies cannot be unlimited, and the Government will be bound in the interests of the whole Saorstát to take action if within a very reasonable time from this date the companies do not themselves come to conclusions of their own volition. We do hope that before long it will be possible to announce the main principles which it is intended to adopt. At the present moment as the conference in those matters is taking place, I do not think I should do more than state what I have stated.

Special attention has been given to the repair of damages to the railways, and arrangements were completed to enable companies to carry out repairs with special expedition. Generally speaking, those arrangements have worked most effectively. Where any difficulties have been experienced they have been overcome, and with few exceptions the damaged lines have now been restored, and even where repairs have been necessary on a large scale their early completion is assured. In speaking of the restoration of the railways and of the maintenance of the railways during the difficult times in the past few months I should like to bear very cordial testimony to the whole-hearted support which the Ministry received from the Railway Protection and Maintenance Corps of the National Army. No sooner did the Ministry bring under the notice of the corps any break in the traffic system of the country than it had the immediate attention of the very able Commander of that corps. I think the Dáil will realise that I only do justice in saying that the trade and industry of the country during the last year owe a good lot to the gallant effort of the Railway Protection Corps to keep the railway system running.

Since last October some twelve thousand persons have been placed in employment through the employment Exchanges, and in the same period more than one hundred industrial disputes have been settled, including disputes in the flour mills, certain ports and on the railways. Industrial Councils for the creameries and flour mills have been set up, and are functioning successfully. The administration of unemployment benefit for some 30,000 of unemployed has proceeded with smoothness and expedition. The inspection of factories and workshops has proceeded at a rate of 219 inspections each month. A number of applications to supply and generate electricity, particularly in country towns have been considered, and in most cases have been granted. Proposals for hydro development on the Liffey have been considered and arrangements are being made to assist parties concerned in their promotion.

A number of conferences have been held with harbour and dock authorities on matters ranging from proposals of a harbour for a trans-Atlantic traffic to applications to carry out structural repairs.

Deputy Milroy will be interested in knowing what we have done, and what we propose to continue to do, for the industry of the country, and I am sure the Dáil will share his interests. The Contracts Committee set up by the Government has been functioning for some months past. Our Ministry is not a purchasing department of the Government, but on the Contracts Committee we have two representatives, and the representatives of the Ministry in going to the Contracts Committee have been instructed to see that the interests of Irish industries are fully considered by that Committee, to see that they are fully safeguarded, and to make a case for Irish industries generally at that Committee. That their efforts have not been altogether unsuccessful the particulars which I gave the other day in replying to Deputy Milroy, and which, perhaps, I may repeat for the further information of the Dáil, amply justify. Returns were asked for by the Deputy for four months. I have those returns compiled. For the months of March the money value of all contracts placed by the Contracts Committee within the Saorstát, and for goods of Saorstát origin was 85 per cent. of the total.

Mr. JOHNSON: Would the Minister say the amount?

Mr. WHELEHAN: £131,825 10s. 3d., that is from the 1st to the 25th March. From the 25th March to the 31st May inclusive 94.6 per cent. of the money value of contracts placed by the Contracts Committee was placed within the Saorstát, the amount being £131,609 0s. 10d. For the month of June the total value of contracts placed within the Saorstát by the Contracts Committee was 99.36 per cent. of the total. The money value was £43,499 12s. 9d. It will thus be evident that the policy which I stated last February, the policy of the Government to encourage Irish industry by spending every possible penny economically within the Saorstát has been strictly pursued, and I should say even though the Chairman of the Contracts Committee has been good enough to assure me that I never approached the Contracts Committee except to kick it, we have on the Contracts Committee people who were more than anxious to co-operate and who felt it their duty to safeguard the interests of Irish industry.

The Intelligence Department which the Ministry has set up during the past twelve months has been collecting information as to possible markets abroad for our own products. We have been collecting from traders here at home statistics as to possibilities for their export trade, and at the present moment we have placed before the Minister for Finance proposals for the publication of a monthly journal which will supply traders with particulars of foreign markets to which they may successfully send their own products, and, perhaps, suggest to them, for their own consideration, methods or processes of manufacture that would make some of the industries in the Saorstát at the present moment more likely to meet successfully foreign competition. We hope to have the sanction of the Minister for Finance for that journal, and if we obtain sanction for it, then it should be possible to have it published at the very earliest date.

[Mr. Whelehan.]

I have also referred to the Statistical Department that has been set up in the interest of Irish industries. A Fiscal Commission of Inquiry has been set up to inquire into the whole Fiscal question. Now, there is no more important subject bearing upon the welfare of the whole country than the Fiscal policy of the nation, and the Government could not possibly rush to a hasty or ill-informed decision upon a question of its Fiscal policy. Therefore, it has set up this Fiscal Inquiry to investigate the conditions of Ireland's industry, so that it may be enabled in the future to pursue an enlightened policy in fiscal matters.

We have got to realise that if our industries here are to be successful in meeting competition from abroad, they must be on a sound, economic basis; they must aim at that. Now, to be based on sound economics, they must have modern methods and modern methods must be employed; antiquated methods will not do. During the past six or seven years there has been a veritable revolution in industrial methods, and if our industries in Ireland are to compete successfully, with any possible shadow of success, with industries from across the Channel or from the Continent, they must be reorganised and they must bring their methods and processes up to date. Then, again, in order that these industries may be really economic, the management of them must be efficient. Without efficient management you will have blank failure. Now, if we have inefficiency of management and want of organisation in industry, or inadequate methods or processes, are we to saddle our people with those to make them pay for inefficiency? Such problems, then, as organisation in industry, processes of management, will naturally arise before the Government can feel justified in deciding on any fiscal policy with regard to these industries. The interest of the Government is a wider interest than the interest of any class. The interest of the Government is the interest of the whole of the citizens of the State, and it must not saddle the citizens of the State in paying for inefficiency or want of organisation or inadequate methods, and it will not do so.

The Commission on Reconstruction has been set up, and already a report has been received from that Commission dealing with roadway construction. That report has been published and has been sent to the Minister for Local Government, and we have been pressing the Minister for Finance to foot the bill which the Commission said would be necessary to carry out the work. The Commission is still sitting and taking further evidence, and we are awaiting its further reports.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: May I just ask if, pursuant to a pledge given by the President when that matter was raised before, it is intended that the report should be distributed to Deputies?

Mr. WHELEHAN: If the President gave an undertaking to that effect, I shall certainly ask him about it, but I cannot say. The Canal Commission is now almost concluded, and we are awaiting the report from it at an early date. The Report of the Prices Commission has been considered in part, and is still under consideration, but it is hoped that before the end of the present week the report of that Commission will be made to the Ministry, and the Ministry will be urged to publish it at the earliest possible date.

In the interest of Irish industry, we have also succeeded in having the dues of Irish ships entering into English ports continued at the old rate, and not having our ships treated as foreign ships. The fact that we have been also pressing the Irish railway companies to come to the earliest possible conclusion of their deliberations in regard to amalgamation is also evidence that we are trying to secure for Irish industries the benefits of what we hope the reorganisation of the railways will mean in reduced rates for Irish traffic.

Now, the Estimates submitted for Trade and Commerce in the country are served by a Vote for £41,138, with part of the sum of £13,051, which is also devoted to the interest of trade. In the Estimates of the Ministry generally it would be very hard to draw a line between where the Labour interest ends and the Trade interest begins.

Deputy Milroy was interested to have the figures which we actually devoted to trade interests, and I have now given it to him. That leads me to the further reason for the amalgamation of the old Ministry of Economic Affairs with the Ministry of Labour. Before the amalgamation of these two Ministries, the public did not really know where to go with their cases; they did not know whether it was a case for the Ministry of Labour, or for the Ministry of Economic Affairs. Now, they know where to go, and if their case deals with Trade they go to the one Ministry. I hope it will be agreed that anyone who has come to us, whether from an industrial concern's management, or from the ranks of the industrial concern's employees, has found that he has had attention. There was overlapping in the old days, and the amalgamation has made for more rapid attention to matters. There has not to be a passing from one Ministry to another, or the return from one Ministry to another, of files of correspondence, but there has been more rapid attention and considerable economy, economy in staffs, in premises and, consequently, in rents, and we hope, also, economy in time, which is a very considerable matter. Nothing is more extravagant than to have a number of small departmental units water-tight where, if routine is to be followed out as it must be followed out, considerable delay will arise. Now, these considerations, considerations arising from experience in the old days when the Ministry of Economic Affairs and the Ministry of Labour did exist, led to the amalgamation of the two Ministries, and I think it will be found that generally their amalgamation has been productive of effective results.

Mr. MILROY: I must compliment the Assistant-Minister for Industry and Commerce on the very exhaustive review he has given of his Department. At the same time, I cannot help feeling a little compassion for him because he reminds me of a piece of classic sculpture known as "The Laocoön," which represents three persons struggling with a serpent, and with very little prospect of being extricated. The Assistant-Minister for Industry and Commerce seems to be struggling in the coils of a system of Departmental procedure which was not his creation, but from which he does not feel able to extricate himself, at least, for the moment. However, I want to adduce a few reasons why he should be removed from that unhappy position in which not only he is being strangled, but, I think, the real vital economic interests of the country are being strangled. This Estimate is a most interesting one, but somewhat bewildering. The Minister a moment ago gave me some figures. He stated that in the Estimates submitted the interests of Trade and Commerce in the country were served by a Vote of £41,138, and that part of the sum of £13,051 was also devoted to the interests of Trade.

I have gone through the Estimates dealing with his Department, and I have endeavoured to extricate from the items given under the different heads the items which might be said to be devoted to Industry and Commerce, as distinct from Labour. They are not easily identified, with one or two exceptions. I suppose the item of £150 which is put down for the "Daily Mirror" Fashions Fair must be regarded as an unmistakable attempt to further the interests of Irish Trade and Commerce. Some of the other items are not easily identified either. The total Estimate for the three Departments is £327,803, and out of that I can only locate a sum of £27,000, which would seem to be devoted to Industry and Commerce in this country. Figures are given under the following heads:

Trade Department, £9,000; Stationery, £13,879; Statistics and Intelligence, £4,759.

Assuming that there is £41,000 which I have been unable to find figures for, out of £327,803, that seems to me to be a very small sum indeed to devote to a matter of such extraordinary importance as the Industry and Commerce of the country.

It was urged by the Minister in his concluding remarks that there was economy in many directions by the merging of the two Departments he mentioned. I hope it is not a mistaken kind of economy that is being pursued, and I hope it is not considered wise procedure to economise in the expenditure of money which is essential to the development of the industrial and commercial life of the country. I hope it is not considered wise and sound statesmanship to expend vast sums of money in trying to settle labour disputes and to be utterly and absolutely cheese-paring in the matter of trying to develop these things which will give healthy, social and economic stability to the nation, as well as satisfactory remunerative employment.

[Mr. Milroy.]

We were told when I raised this matter before, that it was not wise to confine the Ministry to the mere question of wages, hours of work and conditions of employment. I think that if we had a Department confining its attention exclusively to those things, and dealing with them efficiently and satisfactorily, it would be a great blessing. I am not at all certain that some responsibility for the fact that we have such regrettable widespread labour disputes cannot be apportioned to the circumstances which compel the head of this Department to have his attention distracted from these things by other matters. I think it would be for the good of the labour situation, and for the trade and commerce of the country if these two Departments were severed and some responsible man put at the head of each. It is a poor argument to say that because there is some economic link between labour and trade and commerce that, therefore, it is essential that they should be merged in one Ministry. It does not follow at all. No conclusive argument has been adduced to prove that. As a matter of fact, if that were so, I think another Ministry might, following on the same lines of logic, be merged in this Ministry, and that is the Ministry of Fisheries.

The Ministry of Fisheries has as much relation, in my opinion, to that of Trade and Commerce, if not more, than the Ministry of Labour has, yet no suggestion has been made that this third Department should be merged in this Ministry. As a matter of fact not only was a Department created, but a Ministry was created for the development of fisheries. I remember the Minister for Agriculture stating that when that was being urged that he was quite satisfied in his own mind that there was a real necessity for the institution of a Ministry of Fisheries. Just as he was fully satisfied of that, I am fully satisfied that the best interests of the Nation will be served by having separate Ministries for Labour and Trade and Commerce. I fail to see what real argument has been put forward to sustain this merging of the two Departments, both of which have distinct functions to discharge. The function of the Labour Department is to see after the hours, conditions and remuneration of labour, and the settlement or prevention of disputes.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE

I must remind the Deputy of the ten minutes' rule. He can make another speech later on.

Mr. MILROY: I did not know the rule applied to discussions on Estimates.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: It does.

Mr. WHELEHAN: The Deputy mentioned a sum of £27,000. We have examined the Estimates very carefully, and I would call his attention to the details which have been supplied him. With regard to the sum of £41,138, on the first page he will find Trade Department. Then if he skips the Industrial Branch which I do not wish to press—some of that goes to trade—there is the Statistical Department, the Intelligence Branch, and further on, Transport and Marine. I should like to know how he computed the sum of £27,000.

Mr. MILROY: Can I make another speech now?

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE: We shall hear some other Deputies first.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: No more important Estimates could come before the Dáil than the Estimates of this particular Department, and one feels it is necessary to congratulate the Assistant Minister on the care he has given to dealing with the various branches included in the Estimates. At the present moment particularly, it is necessary that every care, every attention, and all possible time and efficiency should be given to the work of this Department, especially as it includes so many sub-branches, each dealing in turn with critical phases of the National life. I repeat that every care and all attention should be given, and that there is no matter that could more fully absorb any one single person's attention than the work of this Department. Therefore, I draw attention to what is the most obvious factor in these Estimates. We have stated at the very outset of these additional details that have been provided—and I hope I may take the liberty to say that I think such additional details as these might with advantage be supplied by all Departments—certain increases that are possibly right increases. I take the first figure of these further details in Sub-section 3—the Minister and Secretariat. Last year this stood at a figure of £3,778. This year it has advanced to £5,263. In that sum is included the salary for the Minister. It is unfortunate under the circumstances that the Minister has not been seen in this Dáil for a good many months. I am aware that it can be said that he is taken up with other duties. If he is taken up with other duties, then he should be kept at those duties. All the time and attention of the Minister for Industry and Commerce, as long as he occupies that position, should be given to this Dáil. One has seen him very frequently in the precincts of the Dáil itself, but since the occasion on which he made a speech here, stating that certain debenture shares would not be paid, we have not seen the Minister in this Dáil, and yet his salary is figuring in these Estimates. I start by stating that that is not a satisfactory state of affairs. Further whoever is to act as Minister for Industry and Commerce should, during this period so vital to the future of the country, give it and this Dáil his entire attention. One recognises that the duties that usually would fall to him fall to the Assistant-Minister who has made his statement, and made it well. Those duties have fallen—if he will permit me to say it—into very excellent care. That does not alter the fact that there is a figure stated in these Estimates for which this Dáil has not seen value, and I urge that that is a matter that should receive attention, the more careful attention, because that Minister is a Minister also of the Executive Council.

Mr. WHELEHAN: Before passing from this I think I should just say straight away that at times in the life of every Nation there are matters even more vital than the Commerce and Industry of the Nation, and no man has done greater service to the Nation than the Minister to whom the Deputy refers. In the discharge of very vital services to the Nation he has been absent from this Dáil, and, I think, it is even beneath Deputy Darrell Figgis to refer to an absent Minister as he has referred to him.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I made no reference whatever to that fact, and I have stated already that he has been giving his time to other very important matters. I do urge what I have said, and I repeat and stand over every word I said, that if these duties are so important as to call for his whole time and attention, as no doubt they are, then the duties that attach to the position of Minister for Industry and Commerce should also receive another person's time and attention.

Mr. WHELEHAN: They receive my time and attention. These Estimates were drawn up and were in print before the Minister was called upon to discharge other duties.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I have not interrupted the Minister. I am entitled to state what I have to say, and to put what questions I have to put, and then the matter can receive attention. I have also added that the matter is under the Assistant-Minister's very excellent care. The Minister's salary figures in these Estimates, but what salary is being earned, and admirably earned, by the Assistant-Minister we have yet to find. No doubt it is presented somewhere, but I have not yet discovered it.

Mr. HUGHES: That is the trouble, I suppose.

Mr. JOHNSON: That is so, there is no salary.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: In any case the essential matter I am dealing with, and to which Deputy Milroy addressed himself, is the question whether Trade and Commerce should be separate, or whether they should be in one Ministry. My own personal opinion is, that they should be as they are, but I do state, whoever is in charge, and whoever is appointed, should be kept to the charge at this moment. If it be necessary for any person to be taken to other more important State duties, then some other person should be found to undertake the duties that belong to this Ministry.

On this Estimate I think the opportunity should be taken advantage of by the Minister to make some statement with regard to the various trade disputes that are holding up the economic life of the country. It is assumed that they have all received very careful attention from the Department. There is at the present moment a very serious dock strike that is holding up the entire economic life of the country. I think the opportunity should be taken under the head of this Estimate to give some information to the Dáil, and through the Dáil to the country as to exactly what progress

[Mr. Darrell Figgis.] has been made towards bringing that dispute to an end, or at least to put the salient features of the dispute before the Dáil, and through it before the country, in a way that they have not yet been presented in the public Press. This is a matter that involves a good many other subjects also. A statement was made in the Press the other day that there was a limited amount of certain vital foodstuffs in the city of Dublin. We would like to know exactly what attention the Department is giving to this question as to the position of various commodities of which the nation stands in need, owing to the hold-up of these ports. I am sure such information is being dealt with by one or other of the various branches of this Department. I urge that the information so collected, and receiving the attention of the Department should be put before the Dáil.

There is one other item on which I desire to ask for further information than the Minister has given. I am dealing with the last page of the supplementary information, that dealing with the office of Consulting Engineer to the Government. I have last year's Estimate in my hand. I ask then what exactly was the position, and who was the Consulting Engineer to the Government; whether he was a person or a firm; what is the remuneration; what are the various stipulations attaching to the discharge of the duty; whether he has anything to do with contracts or not; whether he receives fees or a salary. In the supplementary Estimate for last year that came before us this year, the opening words of paragraph 1 after reciting a number of matters, in respect of which a supplementary Estimate was necessary says: "And the fees and expenses of Consulting Engineer to the Government." These words clearly define that there are certain fees and expenses paid to the Consulting Engineer. In the supplementary information the position of his office is dealt with, including an assistant and secretary, and shorthand typist, but he himself is not mentioned. Therefore, I ask if information could be given as to who he is, the terms of his appointment and the method and manner of his remuneration?

Mr. McBRIDE: I regret exceedingly that the Minister seems to have no policy regarding the encouragement of shipping and shipowning in the Free State. Railways, whether owned by a company or by the State, receive their money from the people of that country, and they return the money in the shape of wages and dividends to the people from whom they receive it. The process is quite different in regard to shipping and ship owners. Ship owners carry goods for freight. The goods they carry to the Free State are the goods of outsiders. A certain amount is earned on the carriage of these goods. The profits of these freights if carried by ships of the Free State come to the Free State, and are known as invisible imports. The Ministry is engaged in the encouragement of industries within the Free State, but if the bulk of these industries is carried by foreign bottoms a considerable amount of the profit goes to the foreigner.

Railways and roads derive their importance as a means of inter-communication between the people of a country, but their chief importance is as feeders of the ports which are served by the ships. The aim of all seaboard countries is supremacy in the carriage of goods at sea. One of the foremost countries in the world is spending millions at present trying to get a show on the sea. England derives her might and her pride and her power from the enterprise and the resource of her shipowners and her sailors. Why cannot we make some kind of a bid for some of this sea-borne traffic? Norway, one of the poorest countries in Europe, practically keeps itself on invisible imports. I am very pleased indeed to hear that the Department is to issue a Trade Journal.

Mr. JOHNSON: Do not be too sure.

Mr. McBRIDE: It will be of very great benefit to the manufacturers and traders within the country. While I must congratulate the Minister upon the exhaustive statement he has made to-day, it is my hope that when he next addresses the Dáil on the activities of his Department he will be in a position to outline some policy having for its object the encouragement of ship-owning within the Free State.

Mr. MILROY: To resume now where I left off, what I mainly wanted to say was in reply to a question which the Minister asked me when I sat down. He alluded to certain figures which I quoted, and wanted to know how I got the figure of £27,000. It is probably due to the fact that there are no what I might call identification discs on these figures, or I may have miscalculated them, but the only estimate of figures that I could conclude were for trade purposes were those of Trade Department, Statistical Department and Intelligence Department. He has alleged, I am sure in all sincerity, that Marine Service is also for the Trade Department. I examined the figures, and unless I am suffering from a delusion that this item D, "Services in connection with wrecks and salvage," is trying to salvage the wrecks of our industrial life, I cannot see any other connection, but even if that is the purpose, £550 is a very small item to vote for it. The item "Coast Watching Service, £8,000," is one which, I think, would do with a little illumination. What service does that exactly cover, and what number of people are employed to absorb £8,000? These are small details. The point I want to know is how this particular Estimate can be construed as an expenditure in aid of Trade and Commerce. I wait with some hope of further information on that point from the Minister. I do not know if the Transport Department is also assumed to have any bearing on that, but there are no items unless it be the payment for the acquisition of land for railways. That is the only item that seems to me to indicate any bearing upon actual trade or commerce interests. In that Estimate 55, I find it very hard to locate an item of any serious amount which can be so regarded. "Contribution towards the expenses of the 'Daily Mirror' Fashion Fair, £150"; that is probably all right for that purpose. "Dublin-Cork Steamer, £1,000:" I do not know whether that is an item that could be regarded as I have mentioned. I would like to be informed if it is so. But take all the other figures, they are figures which deal with the administration, so far as I can see, of the Labour Department. Now, I think there is a total lack of proportion in these matters if what I say is correct, and I make these criticisms, not in any acrimonious spirit, but with the desire to get further information, and if what I say is correct, even if the figures of the Minister are correct—

Mr. WHELEHAN: Which they are.

Mr. MILROY: Then if there is £41,000, out of £327,000 spent in the matter of industry and commerce, I say that it is quite an inadequate proportion of the whole expenditure. The other must only be assumed to go towards the administration of the Labour Department and if the argument I made at the beginning is correct, that the Labour Department, in its ramifications, is swamping that section of the Ministry which should look after industry and commerce, it is time that industry and commerce should be placed in a position to look after itself, so that it would not be left to the tender mercies of a Minister who has a sort of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde existence. We are told that a Fiscal Committee has been appointed. There has been, as I said, a Ministry of Professors. We were told that Nero fiddled while Rome burned. Well, I am afraid that the Professors will be theorising while Ireland's economic life is simply ebbing away. I take a very strong and very emphatic stand upon this matter. This Department is the one on which Ireland's future economic life depends, and it is whether or not this Department, with regard to industry and commerce, takes the bold, courageous, broad and enterprising view that the future economic life of Ireland will be virile or feeble. If it is feeble it means that the whole structure and the whole stability of this nation will be feeble, and that eventually our political liberty that we have regained will be a poor safeguard for the welfare and the prosperity of the nation. I think I have nearly exceeded my second ten minutes. If I think of anything else I will reserve it for my third ten minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON: I do not agree with Deputy Milroy that either the Minister or the Assistant Minister should be likened to Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, or either of them. I thought perhaps that An Leas-Cheann Comhairle would have called the Deputy to order for suggesting such a thing. The point that Deputy Milroy has made most of, I think, is his objection to the incorporation of the Department of Labour with this Ministry. When the proposal was made a year ago to merge the Ministry of Labour into the Ministry of Industry and Commerce it was assented to from these benches and I think we were right in so assenting. There is something to be said for Deputy Milroy's point of view if you are to consider labour as something that you can departmentalise in that absolute sense, and that it ought to be something distinct from any other section of the community. When you are dealing with a Labour Department you are dealing with men and women just as though you were dealing with a capitalist department.

[Mr. Johnson.]

You are not dealing with a thing which represents capital, but with men and women who own capital, and it is because of the theoretical ground, which is strong, that we object to the implied indignity that is embodied in the thought that you must have a special Department to deal with labour, as though it was something that must be separated from the rest of the community, and treated as an item in the social organism, but a subordinate item which ought to be treated differently from any other section of the community. It is a question of status on that side, and on that alone, I believe that it is much to be desired that the Minister who is responsible for Industry and Commerce should be responsible for matters arising out of industry and commerce, which incidentally, occasionally means disputes between one section of the community and another, commonly referred to as capital and labour. But you do not desire to set up a special department called the Capitalist Department. Some people will say that the whole Ministry in most countries represents that, but nobody claims that there should be a capital department or a Ministry of Capital. We, at the same time, and for the same reason, object to a Ministry of Labour, and would much prefer that the concerns of the workman should be considered as part of the concerns of industry and commerce. I think that, perhaps, in this initial portion of the discussion on this vote, it is well to have cleared up the question that was raised by Deputy Figgis. Deputy Figgis asked where in this Vote was the salary of the Assistant-Minister, but I think Deputy Figgis is, perhaps, lacking in knowledge in this matter, because the Dáil knows no Assistant-Minister. There is no Assistant-Minister so far as the Dáil is aware, and certainly there is no salary attached to the member of the Dáil who is speaking on behalf of the Ministry.

Mr. WHELEHAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSON: We had a return in respect of members of the Oireachtas who are receiving salaries out of public funds, other than as members of the Oireachtas, or Ministers, and there is no sum opposite the name of Deputy Whelehan. His name does not appear on the list, so that we are quite justified in assuming that the services of Deputy Whelehan are costing the State nothing. I protest against that. I do not think that it is right that we should accept from Deputy Whelehan the services that he is performing without payment of a salary, unless it is quite openly and clearly stated that this is a voluntary service. Many men in the Dáil, and in the Ministry, have given tons and tons of voluntary services, calling for the same amount of attention even as their present duties. They have been done voluntarily, but that is not the kind of thing that can continue permanently, and certainly not in the case of men who have responsibilities of this kind. It is not right that the Dáil should expect to have answering to it for this Ministry a Deputy who has to do responsible work without any remuneration for that work.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSON: The case that was made by the Deputy in explaining these Estimates was very interesting, but really not very illuminating. Deputy Milroy has, I think, complained, and also Deputy McBride, that there has not been any outline of policy, except in regard to one or two items. There has been a report from the Deputy regarding activities of the Department, but we have had no outline of future policy from the Department. We were told, for instance, that there was a legal examination proceeding as to the position in respect of trade marks, designs, and trade facilities. That, no doubt, is very much to be desired and very necessary, but it would have been more interesting and illuminating if we had been able to ascertain the mind of the Ministry in regard to trade marks and the protection of trade marks, and the part they are to play and that they occupy at present. What is the protection that is afforded to trade marks and patentees? I have heard, on what authority I know not, that a clever and ingenious person might be able to do extremely well if he took advantage of the legal position in regard to patents. It would have been interesting to hear from the Minister whether the intention is to continue the English law in regard to patents and trade marks, and also in regard to trade facilities, whether there is to be an adaptation or utilisation of the Trade Facilities Act to any extent; whether anything has been done under that Act, and whether the Ministry has made up its mind to give special facilities such as have been given, and are being given by the British Government, and I think by the North of Ireland Government, on this question.

We were not given very much information about the policy of the Department regarding railways. We learned that it is not the intention to interfere with the companies if they were able to come to an arrangement amongst themselves. I am sure they can come to an arrangement amongst themselves, but is the kind of arrangement they will come to amongst themselves the kind of arrangement that will be approved by the Ministry? Has the Ministry indicated to the railway companies the kind of an arrangement which they will approve of? If so, can we have any information from the Ministry as to what limitations have been put before the railway companies, and of what kind of policy will they approve? I suppose there will be need to come to the Dáil for powers, but it is not fair to the railway companies to allow them to proceed making agreements without having indicated at least some of the lines on which such agreements may be made, and will be acceptable to the Ministry. If the companies have, as a matter of fact, been given some guidance on that matter, is the Dáil not entitled to some information? Can we not hear from the Ministry what is the intention regarding railway amalgamation? Is it intended to allow several railways, but not all the railways, to amalgamate? Is it intended to allow some of them to amalgamate into one group, and some to amalgamate into another group?

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: I understood from a ruling of the Ceann Comhairle that this matter was to arise on Vote No. 56, dealing with the Transport Department. Does it strictly arise on this Vote? I would like to know whether the question of the Railway Agreement is to arise on Vote No. 55, dealing with the Ministry of Industry and Commerce, or on Vote 56, dealing with the Transport Department. If it is to be dealt with now, the Dáil should know.

Mr. MILROY: I think it was agreed that the matter would range over several Estimates.

AN LEAS-CHEANN COMHAIRLE:

This matter was referred to in the Minister's statement, and the Deputy is quite within his right in dealing with it. I would remind the Deputy, however, that his time limit has expired. I will be glad to call on him again.

Mr. DAVIN: I notice that as against no expenditure last year, there is a provision in this year's Estimate for an expenditure of £13,879 for the work of the Statistical Department. I would like to know when that Department was set up. Was it set up on the 1st of April of this year? I presume that that Department is working on the returns furnished through the information supplied in the forms which come through the Customs Department and the Railway and Shipping Companies. If the information that I have had access to, or some of which I have seen, is the information that this Government Department is going to rely on with regard to statistics of trade in and out of the country, then I think that information will be very unreliable. The onus, according to law, is upon the exporter, or the importer in the other direction, and upon the forwarding company, to supply the information asked for in these forms. I have seen in thousands of these forms where the correct information is not supplied. In the case of export traffic, when the returns arrive at the port of shipment, according to the existing regulations and instructions, the traffic should be held up for that particular reason. I wish to draw the attention of the Minister to this aspect of the case, so that he may deal with it and see that the exporter who is supposed to fill in that form will give all the information necessary and so avoid calling upon a third party to get the information required. I suggest that some propaganda work is necessary in regard to the education of the exporters, pointing out to them the necessity of supplying accurate information and all the particulars asked for which, according to law, they are compelled to [Mr. Davin.] supply. There seems to be absolute ignorance on the part of exporters as to the necessity for supplying this information. It is unfair that a third party, on whom there is no obligation except to hold up the traffic at the port when the information is not supplied, should be asked to intervene. Picture traffic being held up simply because people in some interior part of the country do not supply the information that they should supply! Imagine the confusion at the port and the loss to the exporter! Some educational or propaganda work should be done in regard to stressing the necessity for the supplying of this information. The Minister has made a qualified statement with regard to the present position of the railways.

Mr. WHELEHAN: With permission, I will intervene, as the railways are being discussed now, to say that to-day the President had a meeting with Sir James Craig in London, and the railway question was discussed thereat. Another meeting is to be arranged to continue the discussion. It is only fair that Deputies should know that, as the railway question is now being discussed.

Mr. DAVIN: I am very glad to hear that, because I have always felt a solution of the railway question in this country would be the solution to the other and bigger question which we are all looking forward to. I was only going to refer to the railway question in so far as it concerns the failure of the Companies to agree. I presume they have failed to agree to a system of grouping, or to meet the wishes of the Government in whatever policy they lay down in this matter. On the 3rd of January last a very long and carefully prepared statement was made by the present Minister, and he indicated that they had given the Companies what, in their opinion, appeared to be a reasonable time—three months—to agree to a scheme of grouping. He further stated that failing agreement on the part of the Companies at the end of a further three months—on the 1st of July—the Government would be compelled to put into operation the policy which it indicated at that time. That was an additional three months, and even up to the present there is no agreement, I understand, between the Companies. I am quite certain, from the knowledge that I have at my disposal, that if the Railway Companies were called together to agree to a reduction of railwaymen's wages, the same time would not have elapsed in coming to an agreement; they would not have taken up the same time in coming to an unanimous decision on that matter. In this case apparently they have failed to agree, simply because they could not agree on a price for their shares, or agree as to how the higher class positions, created in the future reorganisation of the railways, would be allocated. Presumably they failed also in regard to what Directors would be in control of the railways in the Saorstát.

I will say this much, that we have been very considerate on this side of the Dáil to the Government in giving them every opportunity to do their best to bring about a solution of this very important question. I think sufficient time has already been taken up by the companies to bring about an agreement, if there was any desire for agreement. I think that a time limit should be named, and a definite statement should be made by the Minister for compelling agreement by that time. Then the Government should take their courage in their hands and put their own policy into operation. While all these parlayings have been going on, the railway rates have been working against the interests of the trade of this country, and that is a very important consideration. With regard to the development of trade and exports, personally I believe that under a unified system of railways, many things can be done which would enable the new railway system to give many concessions in that respect, and particularly to help the agricultural industry, and the development of agriculture generally. I could cite cases of articles such as potatoes or barley, or other agricultural produce, for which the railway rates for, say, 100 miles, for carrying goods in this country have been more than the actual price of the bag of potatoes or the barley. I think that is a position which cannot be allowed to go on, if there is any desire on the part of the Government to assist and develop agriculture. The Minister, according to the language he used, hopes that there will be ultimate success in the direction of an agreement between the companies themselves. I think he might make provision for their failure to agree, and to say at what time the limit should expire, and what he will be prepared to do in case of such a failure. He also stated that in the very near future he will be prepared, on behalf of the Government, to announce the main features of the scheme that has been agreed to between the two big companies, and under which many of the smaller companies will be prepared to come in. I think it is very desirable before any legislation is introduced in this Dáil that an opportunity should be given to the Deputies to hear the particulars of such a scheme, and an opportunity also for a full and free discussion of the principles involved in such a scheme as he may outline. The Minister also said that a conference is going on with regard to the details. Now, I am sure the Minister will agree that the details of any such scheme that concerns the future of men who have given very long and faithful service in such public service, are very important as they concern the future of men such as the men who might be affected by the new scheme. I think that aspect of the case should have at least the consideration of people speaking on behalf of the railway employees, and I trust that aspect of the case will not be lost sight of when it comes to be dealt with.

The question of damage has also been referred to by the Minister. I would again impress upon him, and upon whatever other Minister is concerned in the damage to overhead bridges, to consider this matter. There seems to be a dispute between the Government and the Co. Councils on the one hand, and the Co. Councils and the railway companies on the other hand. As this dispute has been going on, no attempt has been made to repair the overhead bridges destroyed during the recent commotion in the country. I trust that the Minister will look after that aspect of the case, realising that the overhead bridges are bridges on very important roads in the country, and that whatever dispute there may be between the parties referred to, the necessities of the situation demand that the bridges should be repaired, and repaired as soon as possible. I trust that whenever any scheme is being agreed to in regard to the repairs that the strengthening of the bridges will be taken into consideration, so that they may meet the demands of increasing road traffic. There is no doubt about it that the Ministry is to be congratulated upon its work in settling many industrial disputes that threatened the life of the country during the past year. I think there is general agreement upon their very good work in that respect.

Mr. SEARS: I should like to say one word in congratulation to the Minister for the excellent statement he has made. At all events he has shown us that the Ministry has taken a very serious view of the task before them. They have set up important commissions to approach the question from many points of view. They have set up Commissions of Reconstruction. They have set up the Canal Commission, the Food Prices Commission, and the Fiscal Commission. Now, it has been admitted on all sides in this Dáil that of all these Commissions the Fiscal Commission is the most important. It will have a greater bearing on the future of this country, and of its trade, than all the others. The Government has been congratulated on the able men it has succeeded in appointing and getting to act on this Commission—political economists of a high standard. They are at present considering, from the point of view of the nation as a whole, what will be the wisest Fiscal policy for this new nation that is now taking its trade into its own hands. The Minister has been blamed for not outlining the policy for his Department. But I think the Dáil will congratulate the Minister and the Government upon waiting to read the Report of the Fiscal Commission before deciding on that very important matter as to what attitude Ireland would take in regard to its overseas trade. Those who have criticised the Ministry on the question of the Railways have approached it from many points of view. Deputy Davin has frankly admitted that the Ministry has been very active in regard to disputes, and has settled numerous disputes. The Ministry has been called upon to state what is its policy with regard to railway amalgamation. The very brief announcement that the Minister made that our President is at this moment in a very important conference upon the railway question, shows that the Ministry is losing no time about this railway matter and is following it up in the closest possible way. No compulsion has yet been attempted, and it will be a matter of satisfaction if such an important question as the amalgamation of the railway lines can be settled without resorting to compulsion. On the question of policy with regard to railways, there is no complaint against the Ministry, seeing at the very moment our President is engaged in a Conference. Until that Conference is decided how could any policy be decided? We can rest assured that the interests of the country will be safely looked after with regard to that Conference. I think the Dáil should be well satisfied with the extremely careful and businesslike statement made by the Minister outlining the policy of what has been done by the Ministry so far. On the most important point of all, that is our fiscal policy, no decision can be arrived at until we have the report of the Fiscal Commission.

[Mr. Sears.]

Mr. JOHNSON: I wish to say that the policy outlined by the Ministry was vague and unsatisfying. In addition to the rather perfunctory reference to trade marks, designs, and trade facilities and to the reference he has made regarding the railways, he touched upon the Contracts Committee. He stated the Ministry for Industry and Commerce was not a buying department, but that it was represented by two persons upon the Organisation Committee, and he gave certain figures as to the proportions of purchases by that Committee since the 1st of March, showing the high proportion of contracts within the Saorstát for goods purchased within the Saorstát. I have no doubt there has been a considerable improvement in that respect, but a very essential figure is required before we can come to a final judgment, and that is out of the £300,000 referred to of contracts placed since the 1st of March what proportion of the £300,000 was that to the total amount of State purchases within that time? In other words, do all the departments purchase all their material through these Contracts Departments? If not, then we are not getting the information that is required to satisfy the general demand of the country to know what the Government is doing regarding the purchase of Irish materials. If it can be said that this £300,000 represents the whole or nearly the whole of the purchase of all the State Departments, then it is a very satisfactory statement indeed. Perhaps the Ministry can tell us whether there are any Departments of the State which are not making their purchases through this Contracts' Committee, and if so, can he state what the policy of those other Departments in regard to purchases outside the Saorstát may be, and in that case give us similar figures for those other Departments as he has given respecting the purchase by the Contracts Committee, relating to the proportion of the total amount of purchases which the contracts, placed within the Saorstát, comprise? Until we get those figures we are not very much nearer satisfaction because it may be that very much more than £300,000 worth of goods have been purchased, and a large proportion of that additional sum may have been sent out of the Saorstát. I hope the Minister will be able to satisfy us on that point.

The Minister has told us that one of their activities has been the setting up of a fiscal inquiry. I thought the credit for that was claimed by the Minister for Finance, but that by the way. There has also been set up a Commission on Reconstruction. There was also set up a Commission on Railways. I hope those Deputies who are looking to the Fiscal Commission with satisfaction will have better reason for that satisfaction than those who trusted to the promises of Ministers when they set up the other Commissions. Deputy McBride expressed satisfaction, joy almost, at the statement of the Minister in charge that a monthly journal was to be issued, but Deputy McBride misunderstood Deputy Whelehan. He did not say a monthly journal was to be issued; he said they had recommended a monthly journal to be issued, which was quite a different thing. I would imagine that it would be almost a matter of course that a Minister of Industry and Commerce would have issued a monthly journal, perhaps a weekly one long ago, but they have merely recommended that such a journal should be issued and published.

Mr. WHELEHAN: We have submitted.

Mr. JOHNSON: I understand. Not only have they made recommendations but the Department has submitted proposals. I wonder whether we shall have the spectacle again of one Ministry or one section of the Ministry submitting proposals and another section turning them down. I am hoping they will have had more success in their submissions with the Ministry of Finance than other Departments have had with theirs, and I hope we shall see within a very few weeks the first issue of the Department's journal respecting Industry and Commerce but I have my doubts. The Commission of Reconstruction was appointed in the early part of the year, and it was very definitely promised by the Minister that this was no means to be a shelving Commission and we were told that when that Commission was set up it was to pay special attention to the question of unemployment. Very close inquiry was made into the question of reconstruction so far as it related to roads, and a report has been submitted and has been printed dated the 31st May. It has been in hands for some weeks now, has been considered by the Ministry of Local Government, and has been submitted to the Minister for Finance. I want just to draw attention to the fact again that this report has been printed for 6 weeks, and is available for official use. It has not yet been circulated to members of the Dáil. That Commission has given careful consideration to this question. The Committee contemplates certain work which may be done this year and for which plans are in being and for which machinery is ready. Every County Surveyor is able to begin the work of re-conditioning and reconstructing the roads at any time. I would like to have from the Minister responsible for this Vote, which was responsible for the setting up of this Commission, some kind of assurance that the Commission's work is going to bear fruit immediately; that when they told us we were to devote our time and attention to proposals which would give employment at an early date to a large number of men, they meant what they said. These proposals are reasonable and have been worked out in practical fashion. You could set to work within a week ten thousand men.

I want to know is the Ministry going to honour the promise of its Minister, and whether it is going to make effective the report of the Commission which it set up on a definite understanding and on a definite promise? I am, perhaps, asking Deputy Whelehan to accept responsibility which he will be loathe to accept, but he is in charge of this Ministry, which was set up under the Minister for whom he is speaking. I claim it is due to the Commission, and more especially due to the country, to know whether the Ministry is going to give effect to this, the first of the reports that have been issued by that Ministry of Reconstruction, or are we to assume that the Minister's intention is not to be fulfilled, and that, having set up the Commission, the fulfilment of the recommendations may await further consideration. I am stressing this matter because it will affect the work of the Commission in future. It is a matter of urgency. The proposals are practicable and have been carefully thought out with expert advice. Money will be required, but it will be required in any case, and it is a question whether money is to be spent now or in a few months' time. I assume that the Minister, at any rate, before the Vote is finally passed, will be able, perhaps after consultation with other Ministers, to give the Dáil a positive assurance that the work outlined in the report respecting the re-conditioning and reconstructing of roads will be set going without delay, and that the utmost number of men that can be employed on this work will be set to work in the shortest possible time.

Mr. GERALD FITZGIBBON at this

Mr. DAVIN: The Minister has referred to the anxiety with which he was looking forward to the production of the report of the Canal Commission. I am not going to say anything in regard to that, except that his anxiety in that particular direction will, I think, be relieved in a short time, so far as the members of the Commission are concerned. I ask the Minister is his anxiety on this particular matter due to the desire to consider the Report at once and bring in the necessary legislation and give effect to the recommendations of the report before the General Election? In asking that question I take this most suitable opportunity for asking a decision on the matter, and, bearing in mind the statement made already that the Government are considering the question of the railways, having in mind the best methods of securing the most efficient means of transport, it may be correct to say that this might be the means to bring about this very desirable end. I would like to know if the report of the Commission would be taken in conjunction with the legislation that may be necessary to be introduced!

[Mr. Davin.] in connection with the reorganisation of the railways. I would like that he would give some definite assurance, if he is able to do so, on that particular matter in his reply.

Mr. MILROY: I want most emphatically to endorse what Mr. Johnson has said about this report on the roads. One thing is going to happen if a report such as this is shelved indefinitely, and it is this, that Deputies and other persons who are asked to attend such Commissions and spend their time in a careful study of vital questions will simply regard these Commissions as a huge farce, if something is not done to put in operation the recommendations made after mature discussion. I think it will be fatal or, at least, a very grave injury will be done to the prosecution of similar enquiries, if it should be the fate of this particular report that it is pigeon-holed until some remote or indefinite date. I am anxious to urge upon the Minister to secure from the Government some undertaking that steps will be taken to put this report into operation so far as possible and as soon as possible. I want also to allude to one or two other things to which the Minister referred in his opening statement. He referred to the fact that an enlightened policy in fiscal matters was absolutely necessary to the life of the country. With that sentiment I am in absolute agreement. I do not know whether our definitions of an enlightened policy would coincide.

I heard with satisfaction, not only in answer to the question last week, but also the repetition of that answer to-day, the figures given in regard to the percentages or contracts within the Saorstát. I think that is excellent. But what is really going to happen in my opinion is that if there is not a revision of the general economic policy of the country there is great danger that there will be no Irish manufacturers to place contracts with. The Minister says industries must be on a sound economic basis to meet foreign competition and he followed that up by a statement or an implication—I do not know whether these were his exact words—that “to secure that sound economic basis antiquated methods must be discarded and modern methods must be adopted and inefficiency must be eliminated from industrial matters.” We agree in the latter, but the inference I draw from the statement he made was that these Industrial Pioneers or Captains of Industry are to be expected to secure that sound economic basis themselves without any intervention on the part of the State to assist them in any way. Now there has been a most extraordinary policy in vogue in Ireland for many years and it is this: That while it is the soundest possible statesmanship for the State to intervene to put Agriculture in a sound financial economic position so as to give it a chance, it is the last word in economic folly for the State to intervene on behalf of the other great arm of the Nation's life—Industrialism. If it is sound statesmanship in one, it is sound statesmanship in the other. If it is erroneous in one is it not equally erroneous in the other? If it is an economic fallacy or delusion that the State should assist industrialists, then it equally follows that the State has been following the most fantastic economic illusion in trying to meet agriculture in its demands.

Mr. WHELEHAN: As a matter of personal explanation, and in order to relieve the Deputy, I might say his inference is altogether in error. What I had hoped the Deputy would infer was in fact that the Fiscal Commission had been set up to enable the State to see whether it could in justice help Industry and not that the State should stand aloof.

Mr. MILROY: I am extremely glad to hear that my apprehensions were not correct. But I certainly think that there was an unnecessary emphasis laid upon the phrases “inefficiency” “modern methods,” and “sound business basis for manufacture.” Taking them on the whole I think they are not inefficient, and they are doing all they can to attain to the best modern methods. I do not know whether many here are aware of it or not, but there are manufacturing industries and manufacturing concerns that are practically shivering on the brink of extinction, and that because of the particular fiscal system that has operated, and that continues to operate. They cannot afford to wait for several gentlemen of academic distinction, meeting in some place remote from these concerns, to arrive at a decision. Their verdict in the long run may be all right, their operations may have been perfectly successful in evolving the soundest fiscal system, but in the meantime the unfortunate patient may have expired. They may produce splendid economic theory for this country, and a splendid fiscal system, but the Industrial basis upon which that system was to operate may have vanished from the scene of things when that report is made.

I urge that this matter cannot brook delay. The Industrial life of Ireland is now practically in the condemned cell, and all we can do is to try and keep it alive by getting at least a respite if not a reprieve.

Dr. WHITE: In common with other members of the Dáil I wish to congratulate the Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce upon his very excellent report. I think that we have been lucky enough in land affairs for some time past, and I venture to say that we should concentrate a little more now upon marine matters. Looking at the particular report on Marine Service, the preservation of life and the establishment of rocket and life-saving apparatus, I see only £550. I venture to say this is a very pressing and rather important matter, and as one who lives by the sea and knows a little bit about it, or thinks he does, this matter of lifeboat and rocket apparatus I think should be very much more fully looked into. We are now in the summer, and winter is on the approach. We have for the last year or two been extremely fortunate, because I do not think there was any loss of life off the Irish coast owing to want of rocket apparatus or lifeboat assistance, but I respectfully suggest that the whole question should be seen to now. I do not know if the men who form the coast watching service have anything to do with this matter, but I think they should be linked up, and crews and all the necessary paraphernalia should be got together as quickly as possible. I do not see any mention here about lighthouse lights. Now, that is a very important matter, and I think some of us would be very anxious to know exactly something about the Irish lights.

As regard the roads, this is a very important and pressing matter, but so far no report has been issued. I am sure when it is, it will be very practical, and we will be all very anxious to see it. As regards the fiscal question mentioned by the last speaker, I am quite at one with him and am still of opinion it would have been better perhaps if some sort of a compromise had been arrived at, and if some practical businessmen were sitting upon that Commission. However, I suppose afterwards the practical businessmen will have the opportunity of meeting these other gentlemen. I sincerely agree with Deputy Milroy that the fiscal question in general is one of paramount importance for the Nation and permits of no delay. While I might say I am in favour of protection myself, I think protection should be practised with discrimination and practised only in such a manner as to protect the existing factories that we have in Ireland. I for one would like to see the Clondalkin Paper Mills working again and the Glass Works down the river working and these are institutions and factories that deserve protection.

Mr. CORISH: I would like to say a word or two in connection with this debate. I agree with the Minister for Industry and Commerce in saying that all industries should be placed on a sound economic basis and I am just wondering what control he has over the different Railway Companies in the Saorstát and whether he is in a position to institute an inquiry into the freights charge because it appears to me that in some instances freights are adopted indiscriminately and out of all proportion to the value of the goods carried. The railways in the Saorstát in the past few years have decreased their servants' wages but they have not so far as I know decreased the freights on goods and that has militated against the State as a whole and against the individual members of the State.

In the Six Counties, I understand, the average increase in freights, as compared with pre war, was 150 per cent., and it is now 100 per cent. We have not got a decrease like that in the Saorstát, and it ought to be apparent to everybody that that will militate against the Saorstát in favour of the Six Counties. That is not a desirable state of affairs at a time when the 26 Counties are trying to find their feet. I would press for an answer as to whether the Minister has any control over the railways, to the extent that he could institute an inquiry, because I have come across cases from my own area where cheap articles of manufacture could not be exported owing to high railway freight charges. We have a factory in Wexford for the manufacture of clay pipes, and at the present moment the proprietor of it is unable to send his manufactured goods outside of Wexford owing to the high freights that prevail. These are articles which are manufactured cheaply, and their manufacture gives a good deal of employment in the area, but for the reason I have given it has been found impossible to develop the industry, simply because of the high freight charges that prevail. If, as the Minister stated, it is his desire to assist to put the industries of the country on a sound economic basis, I think the proper thing to do at the beginning would be to institute an inquiry into the question of freights. There are many people in Ireland at the moment who believe that the present high freights are actually killing the industries of the country. The cost on the people of the country for food stuffs, because of high freights, is enormous. I would like to know from the Minister if, in the evidence tendered at the Food Prices' Commission, this aspect of the situation was taken into consideration. Like Deputy Johnson, I would press on the Minister that the report from the Reconstruction Committee, in connection with the roads, should not be allowed to be shelved. Everybody knows that the roads in the Saorstát are a by-word. They have been neglected during the past four or five years, and owing to the conditions that prevailed in the country it was not easy to give them the attention that they warranted. I hope that the Minister and the members of the Dáil, irrespective of the Parties to which they belong, will press on the Ministry of Finance to see that the roads in the Saorstát are attended to. This is a very important matter just now, when motor traffic is being developed to such a large extent in conveying manufactures and food stuffs from one part of the country to another. I think that the report that has been sent in from the Reconstruction Committee should engage the serious attention of the Government, and I urge on the Assistant Minister for Industry and Commerce not to allow the Ministry of Finance to shelve this important report.

[Mr. Corish].

Mr. COLOHAN: I desire to draw the attention of the Minister to delays that have occurred in the payment of unemployment benefits. Some claims that I know of were sent in 8 or 9 weeks ago, and so far the men have received no benefits. It is very hard to expect men to come in day after day to sign up the forms in the offices of the Labour Exchange, and at the same time to receive no benefit. I am sure the Minister will attend to that matter. Yesterday I put in a question about the Newbridge Exchange which is in my area, and I hope the Minister will see that the work in that office is speeded up a bit. For the last twelve months I have been listening to complaints with regard to that office, and I think the work done in it ought to meet with the Minister's earnest attention. I understand that the office is understaffed, and that the present staff is not able to deal with all the claims sent in. As far as the roads are concerned, I think the report from the Reconstruction Committee should be proceeded with at once. If that were done it would have the effect of providing much needed employment for a large number of men throughout the rural areas of the country, and especially in the constituency that I represent, which embraces important trunk roads leading to and from practically every corner of Ireland. The County Council in my area did all that it was possible for it to do in keeping the trunk roads in repair, even though it did not receive very much financial support from the Ministry. Therefore, I would urge on the Minister to see that the recommendations of the Reconstruction Committee, as regards the roads, are put into operation at once.

Mr. DARRELL FIGGIS: On a point of order, the Minister will now, I presume, reply, but, I take it, it is not to be inferred that he is concluding the debate. I am asking the question for this reason, that I have addressed certain questions to him as a preliminary to certain comments that I wish to make. It has generally been considered that, on the estimates, such information could be provided, and when I have that information I shall then be in the position to deal with the matters that I propose to raise.

